The nearest army opposed to them just now was the one at Norma Run, and the newly formed one under general Omania. However he had learned that Hansons next move would be upon the city of Norma, still held by a large army of 100,000,000 Glandelinians under general Phelan Evans. The long succession of battles at Norma Run was still in progress and Evans hoped that Hanson would soon force the Glandelinian positions there. Knowing that general Vivian would be forced to be inactive for some time Evans had wanted to go to Hansons army, but receiving overwhelming reinforcements general Vivian now having an army of 200,000,000 men had also concentrated upon Norma while he had ordered Wienstien and Viviana to make forcibly, Wienstien to watch Omania viviana to cross Andrea, and Viviana to move against Francis Atlanta at all speed. The christian armies fighting so stubbornly at Norma Run for those past four three years and three quarters of a month without a days respite, was already sadly depleted, but learning of Hansons advance, and general Vivians intentions, and maneuvers of the other two christian armies, upon Cross Andrea and Francis Atlanta their commanders spread the good news, and decided to hold on a while while longer. Evans was now with Violet and his sisters more frequently than even before and when the christian advance commenced he sat on the large wagon with them, talking to them and showing them the scenery, and telling them how he got away from Julio Gallo, and of his experiences before and when he was on the train.

Violet and her sisters listened with great interest to Evans story and the Catherine told what she and her sisters had experienced. "It was during the time that our army armies were moving through the flooded regions, when one day I and my sisters were seized by the Glandelinians and carried off to Francis Atlanta. The Glandelinians had intended to make slaves out of us there, but so many christian soldiers were looking for in us in disguise that the Glandelinians became alarmed. Many arrests were made but it did no good and so the Glandelinians after trying to massacre us during a great slaughter, brought us with our sisters to Francis Atlanta again under heavy guard. But here also we were closely followed, and shadowed by the many christian spies, who finally rescued us and brought us back here. All of us had great experiences among the Glandelinians in Francis Atlanta, but the greatest was when the Glandelinians under heavy fire drove back the christians in a driving counter attack, and when the Glandelinians poured through the streets like a flood. Many christian soldiers whose first successful were now fleeing through the streets panic stricken. Their cavalry and artillery forces, made a great clamor dashing in their rout through the streets, while the infantry forces retreated, and even setting many buildings on fire as they could.

Some of the victorious Glandelinian soldiers burst into the mill room we were confined in, and tried to make us go with them, but knowing that the Angelinians were beaten, we became defiant to allow ourselves to go any further with them, and so refused under any conditions to go with them. They were then going to grab us when a shell exploded in the doorway, killing every one of them. In fact thousands of shells and even high explosives were bursting in the streets, and among the houses, and the yelling of the panic stricken soldiers, the noise of the cannon, cannon, dashing through the streets, and the clattering roar of the fleeing cavalry forces almost made us deaf. If we had not been crippled we would have taken to courage to flee with them. It then happened that a score of other graycoats came into the doorway and before we could say anything had us in their grasp. But instead of joining the christians or even the Glandelinians they went in the direction of a stranger part of the city, assuring us that they were christian soldiers in disguise looking for us. They had left the city and gone a certain distance outside of it when we heard the wild clatter of thousands of swiftly approaching horses and in a few minutes through the thick curtain of smoke, from their burning houses, and exploding shells, a large force of Calvinians came dashing upon us. Then in the main main section of the city there was a series of the most terrific explosions we have ever heard, and showers of wreckage and shooting arches of fire seemed to extend to thousands of feet into the air.

It was only an hour after when we found ourselves in the heart of the christian lines, and back with our sister Violet, who had thought that we were dead. Then that morning you came back to us after we thought you had been killed by the Glandelinians at Julio Gallo so far away from here. Oh how happy we were when you came back. We felt sad and lonely all the while, and oh how we did feel when we heard that you had been arrested by the Glandelinians at Julio Gallo as a spy, and they shot. After their news we certainly did feel friendless and forlorn. Papaw was so startled at our quiet quietness, that many times he thought we were dying and got the doctor doctor. And my were not we surprised when we saw you return."

"Well I am sure that I am here to stay." Said Evans. "General Vivian has even commanded me to stay with you little girls during further battles, but he has advised me to get Omania at all costs, and under any conditions whatever."

"Well if you must get him you must, that's all." Said Joice. "But if any thing happens-----"

"I'll be very careful and you may lay to that." Said Evans hotly. "There are no Glandelinian skinned skunks around here or anywhere that can get the best of me when my temper is up, and have proved it and will right along."

THE BATTLE OF NORMA RUN. FEBRUARY 22TH. IT'S FRIGHTFUL FURY.

It was not long after the return of Jack Evans, the guardian of the Vivian Girls when the immense christian armies under general Robert Angelic Vivian were hurled down against the Glandelinians defending the banks and positions of Norma's Run with speed that was unprecedented in the history of the whole Glandelinian war. Before the scores of thousands of the christian guns, the hundreds of Glandelinian fortresses on Norma Run great concrete masses crumpled to dust. Indeed nothing in this terrible war was more horrible than the disillusionment of the first Glandelinian armies who went to repel the christian advance. In the first of the battle any one could have been treated to the spectacle of large masses of Glandelinian infantry surging, charging across open country, toward objectives which had scarcely been touched by their own artillery. The Glandelinians were foolishly, for the Angelinians rained down such a storm of artillery that the sadly depleted attacking forces did not even get within striking distance of them. The furious Glandelinians had advanced in open formation, into a horrible shell storm of the christian artillery fierce enough to rout the damned and the evil legions together, nearing always at a double quick.

Behind the first wave of assault came bodies of troops armed with knives, automatic pistols, and pikes and bayonets. But wave after wave of the Glandelinians fairly melted away, and the main surge extending over forty miles, and over ten million strong, was blown to routed fragments by the blasting christian artillery fire, and the surviving columns recoiled in a frightful panic. Monsterous masses of christian soldiers fifteen times surged furiously against the Glandelinian works at Norma Run each succeeding wave being millions strong, but however fifteen feeble times they met a crushing repulse, and in retiring left a sea of dead and wounds as wounded behind them.

The fearful battle had raged a full day. Several times to the main portions of the christian line swept upon the Glandelinian front in general fury but line after line was swept back and torn to pieces, but the rest nevertheless had come on, and though meeting the same horrible withering fire they had succeeded in reaching the Glandelinian position, and swarmed over them, but the strong concentration of the wicked Glandelinian forces became too much for them and they had to withdraw before overwhelming numbers.

All the time the assaults had been in progress, the christian cannoners had rained a hailstorm of shells and high explosives upon the Glandelinian fortifications, doing incalculable damage among the gray lines. But the Glandelinian batteries were just as effective and returned the hail of destruction with a tenfold vehemence and the din of hundreds of thousands of cannon was terrific indeed. General Vivian had intended the to capture the Glandelinian fortifications at Norma Run in one day, but indeed he had found that the Glandelinian positions were a great deal stronger than he had thought. During the afternoon of that day when the engagement was general, general Vivian had passed his whole entire left wing, against a section of the Glandelinian positions. A perfect flood of christian troops poured successively against the Glandelinian front, making titanic assaults in the face of a fearful drum-drum fire of cannon, and a general desolating fire from the Glandelinian musketry and machine guns. The enemy's position was very strong by the time general Vivian had arrived and now general Vivian felt that his success was very far indeed in taking Norma, for he indeed saw how his most massive columns were being so frightful y descinnat ed-For every repulse over whelming numba of glandelinians would counter charge in avalanche like fury cutt ing the surviving christian columns to piee pieces and rout ing the rest.A portion of general vivians center late in the after noon made a more vigorous asault then previously seen in actual warfare, and though running deep into a scathing infilade of thousands of cannon and millions of musketry, which destroyed hundreds of companies at one general discharge, the surviving christian forces nevertheless fought desperatly like demons to force their way out, and other columns coming on to the rescue, the infuriated glandelinian colu columns were driven back a mil: mile the thousands of guns were captured and against heavy odds.

A portion of of the glandelinian works were also carried.The carnage was indescribly terrible, a wholesale slaughter of hundreds of thousands of troops per hour-General Vivian being apparently victorious decided to press his advantage under all conditions and not waiting for Hanson to come into the action, which he should have done to avert disaster, he drew o up some of the other forces not yet in the action, and soon concentrating the main line he threw all his force upon the enemy.

For three hours a cruel sanguin sanguinary struggle threatening to dominate the world with its fury, raged, but the glandelinians along the main center center came back with the hailish fury of demons mil lions strong to a try and recapture al' what they had lost and with their general fire smote and bent t'the whole christian front---at this section, tearing many whole divisions and brigades to fragments and hurled the survivors back for two miles and--still further.

Fearful concentration of glandelinian columns was now made against the rest of the christian line, and t the glandelinians soon attacking in overwhelming numba caused a general swift withdrawal of the whole christian line, sweeping them back clear to their own positions with the most fearful loss.

Even then the glandelinians did not stop, but made the most desperate attempts to carry the christian works raging the battle with might and main, but finding the christian works too strongly strongly defended finally gave it up recoiling behind their own works, but keeping up heavy fire of artillery for some time.The battle of Normas run with general Vivian and Mc-Holleston Phlea Phelan was indeed sanguinary/ for awful was the losses of both sides.The whole batt le field was strw strewn thickly with the fallen, the explosions of shelloshells had damaged the woded regions in a general chase of destruction and indescribly wreckageand the whole hilline of glandelinian fortifications and stockades made of wood were ablaze the conflagration reddening the night skies for miles.

The christian losses al alone were a great deal heavien than the glandelinian losses, on account of the desperate assault made by them but nevertheless some brw branches had been made in the strong glandelinian fortifications by the hammering of the christian guns and general Vivian was now confident that general activity against t the wicked glandelinians would soon force hem off from Norma V Run and probably hasten the end of the war evart- everywhere.During the night general had the remains of the eeg selge guns brought into position and by mork morning was ready to let loose a general artillery duel. So fearful had been the engagement the day before and so extensive and far reaching, that general vivian had been appreh onsalenout his little girls, and so had them with Evans transferred to the rear under heavy guard.

General indeo d knew that the persecutions of his little little girls was not as yet over and that Germania had offered a reward to any glandelinian general or private under his command who would either cause the capture of the Vivian girls or their assassination.And so extra precautions had to be taken to guard poor Violet and her sisters.

SECOND DAY OF FIERCE FIGHTING AT NORMA. RUN. THE DESPERATE FIGHT FOR THE VIVIAN GIRLS.

It was at this point that the liveliest times Evans himself had seen came, when unexpectedly a large force of glandelinians mostly all horsemen made a desperate desperate rear flank movement in overwhelming numbers the following numbers morning. The assault had indeed been a sledge hammer driv ing avalanche of men, and the christians at this point being overwhelmed were routed in fearful confusion with the loss of three hundred and sixty six thousand in fifteen minutes and with the death of general Cornwell Evansville.

Jack Evans seeing the fearful tide of ret retreating christ ians coming tried to rally them frantically yelling;

"If you retreat the little darlings of the Nation will be captured and slain as they are still crippled and cannot get away."

But even his this did not do any good, and Evans was borne along with the tide of men.Fighting desperately through them, Evans managed to reach the place t place the little girls were in and urged them to l leave, but he being being crippled yet, and having all they could do on crutches at that, the little girls had no hopes of getting away whatever.He had however rallied a good por portion of the chr christian forces by desperate desperate efforts, and many of these went into the place where the Vivian girls were, determined to fight to thelast man before yielding and allowing them to be captured.However it happened to be to be, that a force of ret retrr retreating christian cavarly men came dashing up, and seven of them realizing the peril of the vivian girls, dashed up to the gate of the Base Hospital and in a remarkably short s a space of time were rushing off with Violet and her sisters.sint ers.

General vivian indeed had seen this catastrophe, and knowing that it hup happened just at the point where the little girlshad been he was apprehensive.He frantically brought up ten to thirty squadrons of chirs christian cavarly, mostly mounted Concentinians and furious Galverinians and he ordered them to rout the enemy if possible and stop the rout th of the christians.The christian cavarly had to ride furiously against the retreating hordes, but inspired by emotions, and the sight of the pleading faces of Violet and her sisters most of the demoralized forces had been rallia before the cavarly came, and the cavarly had no trouble whenever whatever to rally the rest and within another hour the whole assaulting force of Glandelinians were out down and routed by both the rallied christian infantry and by a vigorous dash made bythe cavarly squadrons. In his desperate attempts to get Violet and her sisters out of the way of the enemy Evans had been slightly wounded, and had three horses shot under him. Evans brought the Vivian girls to general Vivians headquart ers, reporting the incident and having his injuries attended to.

Indeed general Vivianwondered where where the flanking force came for from for he had the glandelinians at Norma Run so furiously active all the while that morningthat he was sure that none could get to him by the rear.But Evans had realized the cause.

"General Vivian if you are wise, and will follow the advice of a good fr friend for the sakeof your daughters, you wis all at once sent a force to seize Normas R Bridge. Said Evans. Heavy forces of the enemy are continually moving upon us from that region in an endeavor to flank your army."

While general vivian was pondering on this advice advice as a second b but unsuccessful and general attack was going on in the re rear, the enemy being stayed by this time and general vivian sending force after force to the support of his his rear, sent a messenger to Hanson who was advancing upon Norma Run with his command;

"I am in severe action at Norma Run.Hurry forward if possible and seize the strong positions at Normas bridge, as my whole line being engaged I'm unable to do it.I have force s strong enough to give a hot time to the enemy, having been already engaged for over a twenty four hours but am unable to concentrate any force upon Normas Bridge.

GENERAL VIVIAN.

An hour after Hanson recieved the mes r message though the messenger was severely wounded and reading the contents said to his staff;

"I Normas bridge was the very point I was heading for.I'll carry that position alrralright or God may take me for a liar."

THE FRIGHTFUL CARNAGE AT NORMA'S BRIDGE.

His forces force now moved forward at the double quick and within another hour Hanson's army was near w enough to hear the thunderous roar of the battle along general Vivians lines. This inspired the christians with greater ad ador and by ten o'clock the action for Norma's Bridge was on.

Fourteen times amid frightful slaughter, frightful enough to appall heaven and hell together, the monstrous Glandelinian surges were hurled back and so fearful was the storming to fire of both sides that all the regiments had their flags and banners torn to pieces by the hurricane of bullets, and a thousand Gettysburgs seemed to rage in one, in only half an hour's time. The immenseness of flooring on the great bridge was heaped with the dead wounded, dying and so forth from both sides, the Glandelinian positions for thirty seven miles were in a conflagration of musketry and cannon, but finally the Christians were fully in possession of the bridge, and the enemy fighting for the bridge also having suffered the loss of two million million in a four hours engagement withdrew for the distance of a mile leaving the scene of desolation, death, chaos and of battles havoc behind them. After a brief lull Hanson moved his force forward against the strong Glandelinian positions in the vicinity of the bridge at Norma Run but his armies were so confused by the desperate struggle that morning at the bridge, that though they fought desperately for hours they did not make much impression on the infuriated Glandelinians, and they finally withdrew from the assault having suffered exceedingly heavy losses.

GENERAL VIVIAN'S LINE IS SHELLED.

Violet and her sisters had received quite a shock over the suddenness of the attack on the main Christian rear and probably if it had not been for the Christian cavalry men there is no telling what would have happened. The soldiers who had intended to hold against the Glandelinians if they attacked the base hospital would never have been able to do so, and if they could have for any reasonable length of time, the Glandelinian Glandelinians would finally set fire to the hospital and butcher all who would have tried to escape from the flames, when the building burned.

Now the battle on the second day was so inconceivably furious and bloody that once again the little girls endangered occasionally by shells exploding near by had to be moved to the field in Infirmary under escort of troops commanded by Jack and John Evans together. Along the whole of the Christian line the enemy was making it hot for them with the most fiercest artillery fire they had ever put in and the explosions of shells of every calibre along the Christian line was so constant that it made a wild salvoes as constant as the popping and snapping of thousands of corn in a popcorn shaker. Such incapable damage was done by the heavy storm of shells that general Vivian had to withdraw a portion of his lines further further back a movement the Glandelinians were watching for indeed, and a short time after the enemy's columns came rushing forward in the strongest human waves and struck against the Christian line with all their fury.

ANOTHER BUT UNSUCCESSFUL FIGHT FOR THE SAFETY OF THE VIVIAN GIRLS.

The battle became exceedingly violent, and raged with bloodcurdling fury for two hours, but the Christian troops being overwhelmed finally gave way in the greatest confusion, and retreated from their position in a panic despite every effort of their officers to rally them. The advancing lines of the enemy was storming with a severe withering fire that was general. A part of the onrushing Glandelinian horde scattering the panic stricken Christian troops came suddenly upon the infirmary and without warning a ragged volley of many thousands of guns was poured into the ranks of the Christians entrenched there. Scores of the Christian soldiers fell, and while the others drew back and answered with a withering storm of fire, the remainder were for charging the attacking Glandelinians, but Evans being a cautious, as well as brave man knew the futility of charging mounted, men armed with lances, sabres, carbines, and automatic pistols, so he withdrew his forces behind the artillery of what was once a garden.

To very parts of the ground surrounding the Infirmary, he dispatched hundreds of good soldiers, soldiers as bushwhackers, while half a thousand he sent to the infirmary itself with the instructions to keep the wretched Vivian girls within doors and to protect them with their lives. Adopting the tactics of the Omani fighters from whom he sprung, general Jack Clayton led his Glandelinian cavalry troop at a quick gallop in a long thin line, describing a half circle, which drew closer and closer in toward the defenceless defenders, the brave Christian Christians among the shrubbery and boulders. At that part of the circle closest to the two boys called Evans, a constant fusillade of shots was poured into the bushes by the Glandelinians, behind which the Abhimannian warriors had concealed themselves. The latter on their part loosed their destructive withering fire at the enemy, and justly famed for their accuracy, found no cause to blush for their performance that day.

Time and again hundreds of swarthy horsemen threw hands above their heads, and toppled from their saddles pierced by a deadly bullet but the contest was an uneven one, for more and more of the brave Glandelinians kept coming until there were scores of thousands of them, and still still and still they came. The Glandelinians ever multiplying in force outnumbered the Christians defending the Infirmary a score of thousands to one, their bullets penetrating the shrubbery and finding scores of marks that the Omani rifle men had not seen and then Clayton circled inward a half mile above the infirmary tore down sections of the maze of barbed wired fence and let his marauders within the ground.

Across the fields the flood of Glandelinians charged at a mad mad race. Not again did they pause to lower fences, instead they drove their wild mounts straight for them clearing the obstacles as lightly as winged gulls. Jack Evans saw them coming and calling those of his Christian warriors still remaining, ran for the infirmary and the last stand upon the veranda. Hundreds of Christian sharpshooters had knelt and more than a score of hundreds of Glandelinians had accounts to their steady nerve and cool aim, for his mad dash and over a thousand ponies dashed and raced riderless in the wake of the charging horde of the frenzied frenzied, maddened yelling Glandelinian savages. Evans seeing the little girls pushed them back into the greater security of the interior and within his sadly depleted force and with the help of the men patients who were able prepared to make a last stand against the foe. On came the Glandelinians shouting, and waving their long guns above their heads. Past the veranda they raced at a mad clatter pouring a deadly fire into the kneeling Christians, who discharged their own volleys of bullets, while from beneath the half raised shutters of the infirmary other Christian soldiers did more of the effective work in greater security moving the Glandelinians down by the hundred per volley, and now slowly Evans drew his entire surviving force within the building.

Again and again the furious Glandelinians charged at last forming a stationary sea of horsemen about the little fortress, and outside the effective range of the defenders, and from their new position they fired at will at the windows, riddling the building with a frightful storm of bullets. One by one of the Christian soldiers fell.

Fewer and fewer were the shots that replied to the guns of the Glandelinians and at last Clayton felt safe in ordering an assault.

Firing furiously as they ran the blood thirsty horde raced for the veranda. Three hundred of them fell to the bullets of the defenders, but the majority of the foe reached the doors, and soon the crash of splintered wood mingled with the reports of rifles, came as heavy gun butts fell upon the doors. Upon both sides of the doors scores of men fell but at last the frail barriers gave way to the vigorous assault of the attackers they crumpled inward, and dozens of swarthy murderers leaped into the wards. At the far end of one of the wards stood the apprehensive Vivian girls surrounded by the remnant of their devoted guardians. The floor was already covered with the bodies of those who had already given up their lives in the defense of Violet and her sisters. In the front of these protectors stood Jack and John Evans. The Glandelinians raised their rifles to pour in the last volley that would effectually end all resistance, but general Clayton roared out a warning order that stayed their trigger fingers.

"Fire not upon those child patients," he cried. "He who harms them dies. Take those dastardly Vivian girls alive. They must be given up to Germania for their past spying exploits." The Glandelinians rushed across the room, the Angelinians meeting them with fixed bayonets. Swords flashed, bayonets made a tumult and longbarreled pistols roared out their sullen death doom. Evans launched a cowardly lance he had grasped from a Glandelinian, at the nearest of the enemy with a force that drove the heavy shaft that drove the heavy shaft completely through the gray coats body, then he seized a pistol from another and grasping it by the barrel brained all who forced their way to near him his little charges.

Stimulated by his example the few warriors who remained to him fought like demons, but one by one they fell until only Jack Evans remained. He remained to defend the crippled little Vivian girls. From across the room Clayton watched the unequal conflict and urged on his minions. In his hands was a jeweled revolver, and slowly he had leveled it waiting until another move should place Evans at his mercy without endangering the lives of the Vivian girls or any of his own followers. At last at last the moment came, and Clayton pulled the trigger, and without a sound to the terror and horror of Violet and her sisters their brave guardian sank to the floor at their feet. An instant later the little girls were surrounded, and without a word the Glandelinians dragged them from the building, seven of them lifting the little girls to the pommel of their saddles, and while the Glandelinians searched the building for plunder the seven rode with the Vivian girls to the gate, and waited for the coming of the rest.

Violet and her sisters saw the Glandelinians lead the horses from the corral, and drive the herds from the fields. They saw the building plundered of all that represented intrinsic worth in the eyes of the foe, and then they saw the torch applied and the flames lick up what remains remained. Five times the little girls strove desperately to get away from the Glandelinians and go to the rescue of Evans, screaming and pleading frantically but in vain, and at last when the Glandelinians assembled after glutting their fury and avarice, and rode away with them the little girls saw the rolling smoke, and the flames rising far into the skies until the thick wooded country hid the sad view from their eyes and now they believed sure that they would never see Evans again.

As the flames ate their way into the main wardroom reaching out its forked tongues, to lick up the bodies of the dead, one of the grooms company, whose bloody welterings had long since been still moved again. It was Jack Evans who rolled over on over on his side and opened bloodshot suffering eyes. Evans whom the Glandelinians had left for dead still lived. The hot flames were almost upon him as he raised himself painfully upon his hands and knees and crawled slowly toward the doorway. Again and again he sank weakly to the floor but each time he rose again and continued his pitiful way toward safety. After what seemed to him an interminable time during which time the flames had become a veritable fiery furnace at the far side of the room, the guardian of the Vivian girls managed to reach the veranda and roll down the stairs to some near by shrubbery. For seventeen minutes he lay there alternately unconscious and painfully sentient and in the later state watching with savage hatred the lurid flames which rose also from the other buildings. The distant battle still roared furiously, the Christians having recovered their lost ground. But Jack Evans was unmoved. There was place but for a single thought in his now savage mind. He will recover the Vivian Girls at any cost. And also, REVENGE. REVENGE. REVENGE.

THE FURY OF THE GREAT BATTLE.

In the meantime when the Glandelinian assailants, had forced a good part of the Christian center, they had drove the confused Christian troops back for near three miles. Even general Vivian had been forced to abandon his headquarters, so far did the Glandelinian columns supported by many squadrons of cavalry drive in. Indeed the Glandelinians in overwhelming numbers had made a titanic assault upon the Christian line, and breaking it at one point, and rushing in as far as the location of the infirmary confining the Vivian girls, and where they had been carried off, carried all before them.

During the fearful rout thousands of the Christian soldiers had been shot down by the wily foe, and scores of officers of all rank had lost their lives in their desperate efforts to stem the tide of confusion. General Roswell Fuster Johnston had seen this disaster, and massing all his artillery he concentrated his main forces backed by his reserve, halted the rout which threatened total defeat to the Christian armies, and met the surging wave of the foe with a most galling fire from both his long lines of infantry and artillery depleting the Glandelinian columns in a shocking manner and driving the survivors into confusion. The Glandelinians at this point being utterly outnumbered gave way after offering Roswell Fuster Johnston titanic resistance, and the moment they gave way the Christian troops pressed after them, recapturing the positions abandoned by the other Angelinian columns and drove the enemy back clean to their own works, which three times he himself captured only to lose again.

In the engagement in which he recovered the lost ground Roswell Fuster Johnston had sustained the heaviest losses heaviest losses ever inflicted to his army, but nevertheless he had struck the enemy a terrible blow and smashed up their strength considerably. The battle in the meantime had raged with redoubled violence along other parts of the Christian line, the brave Glandelinians keeping up their desperate assaults with unceasing fury. General Windermere's army standing its ground stubbornly against a fearful attack was threatened with annihilation, and had been forced to withdraw, but relief had come to him in the line of more artillery and heavy reinforcements and he was then able to hold his ground to the last. But still unlucky for general Vivian himself the enemy had finally concentrated in overwhelming numbers upon his whole line and drove it gradually back forcing upon the Christians a slow but general retreat. The whole Christian line was completely driven out of its position and general Vivian seeing that his main left was turned had to order a general retreat. The whole Christian line withdrew seemingly about to abandon the attempt to force Norma's run but it happened to be that only a small part of general Vivian's main army had been in action and that now another part of it under general Maurice Costello and other Christian forces were hastily advancing again and again the Glandelinian forces were compelled to retire their whole line forty miles long being sadly depleted by the terrific Christian fire. Heavy cannons were also brought up in great numbers, and opened upon the Glandelinian columns still attacking but instead of retreating the Glandelinians insisted desperately and stubbornly for a time to capture these guns, and once succeeded, but lost them. Their columns were torn and mangled by the score but nevertheless they rallied to the charge again and would have captured the guns a second time but for general Sengine who brought up his cavalry forces which counter charged the Glandelinian forces with all their fury, cutting the Glandelinian forces to pieces and routing the survivors. However this did not end all matters the situation of the whole Christian line was still terrible and who could have been able to realize how terrible the situation was going to be.

PART TWO OF CHAPTER TWENTY.

THE FULL PROGRESS OF THE BATTLE OF NORMA RUN.

7

Millions upon millions of the Glandelinians swarmed over the shell torn fields despite the high power explosives hurled among their most massive columns killing thousands and thousands per minute. But still the infuriated Glandelinian columns in their most overwhelming numbers kept driving straight against the Christian line, wiping out general Renious divisions, and carrying all before them once more, only to be hurled back again with the main line crushed to fragments or into thousands of fragments, and with the losses of many of their generals. The Christian guns had in the meantime crushed many other of the Glandelinian fortresses in a few hours which had been believed impregnable, hurling tons and tons and thousands of tons of lead and steel and explosives among the Glandelinian fortresses but failing to silence the earthshaking salvos of thunder from the many Glandelinian batteries still storming with their dominating drum-drum fire.

But despite all this horror along General Vivian's lines the main scene of the titanic conflict was with general Hanson, and the enemy who was lined up against him....

THE FEARFUL FURY OF BATTLE IN THE VICINITY OF NORMA'S BRIDGE.

The Glandelinians were determined to force general Hanson back from the ground he had gained and after a two hours lull, after Hanson had forced Norma's bridge Hansons whole line was assailed by overwhelming numbers of Glandelinians mostly the fierce Gargolian Caribos. All day long with unceasing fury the battle raged, both the Christians and the Glandelinians suffering awful loss losses that was indiscriminate. His left was hurled out of its position, several times of headlong assaults and driven into great confusion, but Hanson always had enough troops to fill in the breaks, when over they were made, and six times a whole line of graycoats, extending for four miles, was driven back half withered to remnants, and the small remaining columns, crushed to fragments. The center held its ground throughout the whole battle without yielding an inch of ground, smothering every big Glandelinian wave, that came surging forward, and amid the frightful slaughter counter-charge again and again, routing their assailants. Indeed Hanson was the fiercest engaged. Many of his strongest divisions had been reduced to remnants, but he had won ground, when his brother was still held back by the Glandelinians. He captured some of the most important positions of the foe, when he made a series of bloody counter-attacks driving the Glandelinians pell-mell from their positions, blasting their fortifications into total ruins, with his cannon, and capturing hundreds of thousands of prisoners, indeed he advanced far into the enemy's territory, wiping one of their wings off the map and forcing the main line back with the most stupendous carnage. Indeed the enemy had played poorly for attacking Hanson's lines. The number of battle here had been frightful and went far above the din of the battle along general Vivian's lines. In fact despite the noise of his own action, general Vivian could plainly hear the noise of the battle with Hanson's army, and wondered how he was making out. Twenty times with horrible fury, and a devastating volcano of flame of flame of flame and din that crashed horribly in a reverberating uproar heard for hundreds of miles the Glandelinians came rushing forward millions strong; in their fierce determination to recapture their positions. Hanson's whole line all that time was in literal fiery conflagration of hell of war devastating fury.

The mightiest Glandelinian columns four miles in extent, were smashed down and routed four miles with indiscriminate, wholesale slaughter, that appalled the Glandelinians themselves. Torn and tattered battle flags were seen by scores, so fierce was the storm of masonry fire on both sides, but the greater number of torn flags were seen among the Christian regiments, which had faced the most terrific fire ever delivered upon them by the infuriated Glandelinians.

On this day the battle had been very severe, but nevertheless the whole Glandelinian army, facing general Hanson, and Vivian, and the other Christian forces, which had engaged them for over two years, without a day's lull, was now badly depleted, and their main commander general Minocent as his nickname was, from his horrible cruelty, appealed aid from general Mc-Hollister Phelan, declaring that if reinforcements were not sent as quick as possible he would not be able to hold out against the mighty armies attacking him and Hanson, and Vivian and would have to abandon his positions or be annihilated. General Phelan or Mc-Hollister Phelan did not know what to do at all, for if he weakened his own forces at Norma he would be in a bad fix himself. He promised reinforcements however, advising general Shields which was his right name to hold his ground until the reinforcements came. But also in a note he ordered the following:

General Shields;

If you find it advisable; try all means to destroy Norma's bridge so that the Christians under any conditions cannot make use of it. See to it that general Camilla Fillman continues his attack upon the Christian forces, under general Hanson for the lost positions must be recovered at all costs. For if that Christian dog sees his chance he will make a sudden movement and come down upon your rear when least expecting it. Yours truly,

General Phelan? Mc-Hollister.

Shields read this note with alarm and immediately notified general Camilla Fillman of Mc-Hollister's order, stating that Norma's bridge must be destroyed. . . . And that Hanson must be forced back from all the positions, he had captured, even his own. In the meantime during a lull in the bloody action a troop of concentinians cavally came dashing up to where Jack Evans lay, bleeding of a serious wound in his shoulder. The soldiers noticed the field of dead graycoats in the vicinity of the ruined infirmary, and other buildings, and with the charred bodies, and guessed at once what had happened. Evans was hastily picked up and laid across one of the horses, and immediately taken before general Vivian, by four of the soldiers, while the rest inspected the ruins, the charred bodies, and searched the clothing of the dead Glandelinians.

VIOLET AND HER SISTERS ARE HASTILY RECOVERED.

The captain of the Concentinian cavally force, had Evans wounds dressed and then slanting general Vivian said:

"Your excellency colonel Evans force of two thousand men men at the infirmary, he had been annihilated by the attacking forces of Glandelinians, who have burned the infirmary with the other houses in its vicinity and carried off your daughters. Their guardian here, Jack Evans has been severely wounded."

General Vivian was thunderstruck at this news, and after Evans was taken care of and put into a bed the general drew from the guardian of Violet and her sisters the whole story.

"You did gallantly though you were unsuccessful," said general Vivian with emotion. "It indeed was a gallant stand you made for the defense of my crippled daughters, and so shall be rewarded by their return. I'll get them back all right, and will give Mc-Hollister Phelan no quarter for this occurrence, if I do whip him and surround his army."

The captain had at general Vivian's request remained in the hallway, and when he came out general Vivian said:

"I have drawn from colonel Evans the whole story. My daughters in the possession of general Clayton Glandelinians and I know just where his lines are situated. I'm going to entrust you to some thing important. I want you to lead your force of troopers out in the fields and surround general Clayton's movements. Try to draw him to attack if necessary, and when he charges I'll man my cannons upon his force and cut it to pieces piece or wipe it out. Then I'll harge his main line scatter it and recover my daughters."

"All right your excellency I'll do that," said the captain and he dashed off to do the general's bidding. He gathered his company as quickly as possible and made the advance out into the now covered field. It was snowing very hard now, one of those March Glandelinian blizzards setting in, but despite the white shroud it made, the captain with the aid of his powerful glasses was enabled to see that the Glandelinians under general Clayton was already advancing. Far in advance of the large column was a small detachment of men probably officers with general Clayton at their head. Among them he saw what appeared to be the little Vivian Girls. This indeed was a strange sight to him but he acted quickly.

"Boy," he said. "That little detachment is about half a mile away from the main linear columns. The little daughters of general Vivian are among those Glandelinians. What they are going to do I do not know, but as they are heading this way we will lay a trap, and bag the whole of them."

"Yes we'll form an ambush," said the first lieutenant, and he at once issued the orders. In a minute the whole space was cleared of every purple coat, not one being in sight. The column of Glandelinians having the Vivian Girls in their midst, was advancing at a slow gallop, every man being on horseback. Within fifteen minutes they arrived at the spot and halting under a tall oak tree, the soldiers having Violet and her sisters in their possession halted. The little girls were at once taken down from the horses, the Glandelinians having taken the crutches with them.

The captain of the Concentinian force watched every movement and at last he gasped as he heard general Clayton say:

"Here is the very spot to hang the little birds. I have been always watching for my chance to get the dog daughters, of that pig-dog and skinflint general Vivian. Their just execution will teach all the Christian dogs a lesson, and when he passes by here I suppose it will cool his ardor, and prevent him from moving against our position, when he sees them hanging here, with their eyes bulging and their tongues protruding. We will show the Christian dogs something."

In the meantime the circling Christians were drawing nearer and nearer to the unsuspecting Glandelinians. Already seven ropes had been thrown over the strongest branches, the Glandelinians intending to hang all of the little girls at once, and make a quick job off. They had just lightened the nooses around their tender necks, when the Glandelinians being near enough to see fire at without hitting the little girls, suddenly at the command of their captain blazed away with careful aim and a hundred Glandelinians dropped simultaneously. Then the Glandelinians rode out of their hiding places, dashing madly at the Glandelinians who seeing the overwhelming force of christian cavalry took to their heels like a crowd of panic stricken sheep, dashing madly away in all directions, and every man was for himself striving to see who could be the first of the rangers. At V once Violet and her sisters were dragged from the ropes and placed on the horses of the Angelinians, and after delivering a withering fire at the retreating Glandelinians, the christian cavalry wheeled and dashed off in the direction of the christian line. Violet and her sisters, were surprised at their sudden deliverance, for they had not expected any one to come out and rescue them. They wondered how the Angelinians knew it, and when Violet looked inquiringly at the captain, he told her how he and his men had found Evans, taking him to general Vivian's headquarters, of general Vivian's orders, how Evans saw, how he had seen the approach of the curle butchers, and of his quickly formed ambush.

"If it had not been for some of my men finding your guardian, colonel Jack Evans lying on the field wounded, you little girls would have remained a prisoner, and really have been hanged by these assassins. On what charge were the Glandelinians going to hang you?"

"It was only an intention to murder us," said Jennie. "Their general called Clayton had declared that when we were strangled to death, he was going to send us back dead to papa, with a note telling him that Glandelinians do to christian dogs for attacking their positions, and wrecking their fortifications."

"Well their plans did not succeed very well," said the captain. "As for your guardian he is very badly wounded, having been shot by one of the Glandelinians in the shoulder. He will have to undergo a serious operation."

"Oh Good God," cried Violet and her sisters in distress. "And he stood his ground against the Glandelinians, even when the last soldier in his command fell. We saw him fall, and he was shot by general Clayton himself. And we thought he was killed. We must go to him."

They had not trotted on for a certain distance, the roar of the distant battle making a great din. The captain was indeed overawed at the beauty of the little girls, he had rescued, and wondered that children could ever be so beautiful. While his forces trotted on slowly, he held quite a long conversation with them, and finally asking them about their experiences, during the war and before, and how they got crippled. They answered all his questions in story form, as readily as if reading to him out of a book, and he wondered at their cleverness. He had traveled for about half a mile, when he met another large column of his company, and then Major Bavarin arrived with his forces of cavalry. The major was surprised when he saw the little girls but he was not in the knowledge of their rescue, thinking they were just riding with the captain and his column back toward the lines.

In the meantime general Fisher Clayton, which was his full name was enraged at the slaughter done to his men during the interference of his wicked purpose, an indiscriminate wicked purpose indeed, and being revengeful over his failure, he rode back to his advancing army, and select ing over 25,000 out of his cavalry forces, he went off in pursuit of the captain and his regiment.

THE DESPERATE CAVALRY HELD FOR THE RESCAPTURE OF THE VIVIAN GIRLS.
THE GLANDELINIAN'S ARE CRUSHINGLY SUCCESSFUL IN THE ENGAGEMENT, BUT FAIL THIS TIME TO RESCAPTURE THE VIVIAN GIRLS.

While major Bavarin had rode up to Violet and her sisters, and playfully scolded them for going with with strange christian officers who he said: "May grab, and hug and kiss the, without warning." He heard the clattering roar of horses hoofs, and turning saw through the shroud made by the falling snow, a large force of Glandelinian cavalry advancing at an indiscriminate rush, and then the graycoats gave forth a wild demoniac yell that thrilled them all to the marrow. And at the sight of the christian soldiers the Glandelinians set their yell to its height and came dashing toward them with a thunderous deafening clatter the Glandelinian leader shouting: "GET THOSE FOOL VIVIAN GIRLS, AT ALL COSTS. GET THEM WITH YOUR BARRELS OR LANCES, IF YOU CAN'T GET THEM ALIVE, EVEN SHOOT THEM. TO HEU, WITH THE ROTTEN CHRISTIAN DOGS."

"Quick ride the Vivian girls off toward the lines," Roared the major. "The rest of us will try to hold those screeching fiends off." The Glandelinians who had the Vivian girls on their horses started to dash off, but all at once there was a tremendous roar of pistols, and these christian soldiers with many others dropped dead. The Glandelinian troopers proving to be the fierce Mc-Hollistinians, Zimmermannians and Gargolian corses were dashing forward furiously and relentlessly, and from their fierce yells it seemed as if their charge was at no mans command, these furious wicked Glandelinian troopers being so furiously moved and enraged over the first failure to kill the Vivian girls despite their sudden volley abandoned themselves to fully to rage, fury, revenge and excitement, and they hurled themselves forward like a living wave of gray demons on horseback of such momentum, that once launched was forever beyond recall, that it is stopped battle destroyed.

The Glandelinian horsemen were crowded two hundred deep and hoot to hoot, in a roaring, thundering screeching, yelling and blaspheming and cursing mob, which swept toward the christian cavalry like the first tidal that washed Lisbon, whipping clouds of snow aside in wild gusts, and all the while disclosing the tossing mains and the distended nostrils and the red eyes of the steeds, the flash of sun on sabres, the flying snow or the heavy standards streaming their blue, red, and yellow cords behind them. There was nothing else in the world like the deafening roar of the pounding hooves, which drowned completely the distant roar of battle. As the christian cavalry let loose with a withering roar of pistols, the foremost of the Glandelinian cavalry men, reeled from their saddles, and every one of their columns seemed to fairly wither in the face of the deadly fire delivered by the christians. Their officers tearing into the chaos, shouting commands and waving sabres. In one tremendous the survivors of the mad Glandelinian cavalry struck the first column of christian horsemen, and as they closed with a frightful storm of yells the crash was audible above anything else, as the tumult of sabres, lances, pistols, and carbines broke loose, hundreds of horses who were still untried, went end over end in the air, sabres and lances clashed together, pistols and carbines were fired at point blank, the mixup being indescribable a regular conglomeration of confusion. Men were seen trampled under the horses hooves, and the groans of the wounded and dying could be heard above the tremendous din.

Hundreds of horses gone mad, reared up on their haunches, snapping and fighting with hoof and tooth and fiddle. The soldiers even exchanged blows, with fists when armed unarmed and even pistol butts and daggers were used. At the line of tremendous contact, hundreds of sabres and men, lances and hats, were tossed up like spume on a wave crest. But the first column of christian cavalry amid the dreadful carnage, had been literally trampled into the dust, and the yelling holt hunting gray columns still pressing on, went on over the fallen and straight toward the rest of the christian cavalry with a den on demoniac dog like yelping roar. From the other columns they met more serious resistance, but the howling hacking gray columns, fighting the with the energy and desperation of all the wild mobs of demons, pressed stubbornly forward, and a bristling hedge of pikes, and lances, and again there was an indescribable conglomeration like mixup, the Glandelinians keeping up the attack amid the most indiscriminate slaughter, with the most appalling fury.

The slaughter was so terrific that only a remnant was left of the 12,000 christian cavalry thus assailed, but the rest fearing the peril threatening the Vivian girls, fought like demons, and now some of the other purple coats who had jumped on the horses, containing Violet and her sisters, fought off their desperate assailants with revolvers, lances, and sabres, and in this desperate melee managed to break through the wild slashing, thrusting yelling mob of graycoated horsemen, and dash down the lances fast as their horses could carry them. Desperate over the escape of the Vivian girls the Glandelinians pressed the attack with tenfold vigor finally scattering and annihilating the remaining christian cavalry and scores of the Glandelinians raced after the fully fugitives in full force yelling and firing one tremendous volley after another.

The soldiers snorting violet and her sisters saw the four squadrons of Mc-Hollensteinian cavalry racing after them at a mad speed, and they urged on their steeds to a tearing rate keeping up an incessant fire at the foe meanwhile. The glandelinians however were gaining swiftly on the fugitives, and Violet and her sisters being crippled, could not accomplish any of their recent feats, and so their escorts were at a loss of what to do.

They knew now that if they were overtaken, the glandelinians now maddened to the highest pitch would rent the little girls to pieces if they captured them. They were bound to get away at all costs, and raced on madly down the road, the glandelinians yelling like demons as they lunged after them at breakneck speed. General Fisher Clayton was far in the lead brandishing his gleaming sabre and urging his men on. They were drawing nearer and nearer to the fugitives, when one of the soldiers seeing a strange horde approaching toward them, suddenly gave an order and the whole group of fugitives suddenly wheeled their horses and dashed across a field. The hooded horde were the fierce Gargolians, and they seeing the fugitives, joined in the chase dashing madly in a desperate effort to intercept them, and brandishing their long guns madly. But the christian soldiers were indeed bound to escape with the christian girls at all costs. These very soldiers being long many recounting tales had been pursued by the worse Glandelinians many times before and had succeeded in escaping.

Seeing the Gargolians racing off in several directions to cut them off from escape, the christian soldiers dashed swiftly for a stone bridge apparently with the intention of crossing it. The glandelinians of both columns perceiving this, made for the bridge with a roaring gallop but the christian soldiers immediately dashed on under it, and dashed beyond, and then one of them immediately hurled a grenade to him with him, the terrific explosion blowing the bridge to pieces, and killing and wounding thirteen of the wicked Glandelinians.

By the explosion the rest of the glandelinians were thrown into confusion, and during the confusion the fugitives gained considerable headway. The rest of the christian soldiers had with them in boxes carried on their backs four light detonational grenades, each which they quickly unsling and placed in front of them so that they could, in case the foe would resume the pursuit, the bullets would not hit the grenades and explode them, and kill both the soldier and the christian girl. The Glandelinians were enraged over the losses caused by the exploding grenade, and while they dashed after the fugitive the foremost columns kept up a steady fire of pistols, in a desperate effort to bring down the christians and capture the little girls. However God was with Violet and her sisters and did not allow them to be caught. The christian soldiers had frightfully decimated the ranks of their desperate pursuers, with the grenades, and having only one left a loud detonator at that, the soldier possessing it let fly at general Clayton who was far in advance of his troop and though the shell went far beyond its aim, the explosion making a reverberating report heard for a mile plainly, slew eight of the Glandelinians brought him and his horse down wounded, and frightfully mangled thirty others. Now with on all the grenades used, over four hundred Glandelinians had been slain or wounded, and each detonation had been heard for miles.

The glandelinians enraged rather than appalled over their losses were now doubly incensed, over the wounding of their general, and knowing that the fugitive had exhausted every one of their grenades, the Glandelinian columns separating in many squadrons, tried frantically to overtake the christians.

At this time the fugitives were quite close to the christian lines, and the glandelinians realizing it, and seeing an army of christian troops advancing toward them at a mad dash, finally gave up the pursuit.

GENERAL VIVIAN SEES HIS LITTLE DAUGHTERS COME HOME.

The captain who was one of the seven fugitives, went straight to general Vivian's headquarters, his followers bring bringing Violet and her sisters in with them, having taken their crutches along. General Vivian indeed was surprised at their sudden appearance.

"The captain rescued us," said Joice. "The glandelinians had brought us under a tree to harm us, when he rushed out our would be murderers and rescued us."

"Good work my lad," said general Vivian extending his hands to the captain and shaking him warmly. "I'll shall promote you exceedingly for rescuing my little girls, and allow you much privilege with them like I do Evans."

"It was my duty your excellency," said the captain. "I lost over twelve thousand men for them too, for as major Bavaria joined me with his cavalry brigade, general Clayton drove his force upon my few squadrons, annihilated them and chased us clear to the christian lines."

"So the glandelinians pursued you ah?" said general Vivian.

"How many chased you?"

"His whole cavalry force, and a reinforcing column of Gargolians."

Said the captain. "They rode after us like mad demons, but we managed to get away from them."

"And so thank you with all our hearts for your kindness to us," said Violet suddenly throwing her arms around the captain's neck. "We were in great danger and you sacrificed so many of your men for our safety. We don't know how to repay you."

"I believe Evans will be jealous of me if he see this," said the captain laughing, and he soon had Violet in his arms while her sisters crowded around him. They all thanked him warmly for his kindness to them and then their thoughts went to Evans. The captain brought them into the room where Jack Evans lay, the operation after all, notwithstanding having been performed as it was not needed. He was not suffering much and felt relieved when the captain strode into the room followed by the little girls on their crutches.

"Well I have brought your little charges back to you colonel," said Jack Evans. "Said the captain saluting as he stood at attention at Jack's bed. I had my regiments annihilated in my mad endeavor to get away with them after I had rescued them. His beautiful Lordship, general Clayton, thought he would hang me, but he changed his mind when I came. And the captain told the whole story from start to finish."

"Well you did better than I did in their defense though I was wounded," said Jack Evans. "Those little girls on account of their pure hearts and saintly actions are as dear to me as my own are to their father, and I would have done something right away if I had not been wounded. Those scoundrels left me to burn alive after setting the place on fire. The glandelinians annihilated every soldier I had defending the little girls and after their wicked general shot me down the glandelinians left me laying there in the building and set it on fire."

I managed to get out of the burning building after some difficulty and dragged myself to where your Concentinian soldier found me. The bullet in my shoulder and leg was removed without an operation. They feel very weak though, and I am unable to move even in my bed, without considerable pain for reward."

Violet and her sisters in the meantime had worked themselves around to where Jack Evans lay, and they looked compassionately at him. They knew that he and the captain had fought furiously against the wicked glandelinians in their behalf, and though both had suffered the annihilation of their commands, one of them who stood to their defense to the last had been wounded, and they almost wept. When the captain was gone they drew close to his bed on both sides, and praised him warmly for his gallant stand. Evans made nothing of it, declaring that the captain had done the most for them, for he lost more men and he was more successful, though the captain got worsted in the fight.

"But you got wounded," said Violet sadly with tears in her eyes.

"And he did not. Not a single man of your command escaped, and about seven of his did."

Evans however did not say anything more on the subject, but nevertheless he talked a long while with the little girls, and played some card games with them, while the battle was raging far off, letting them win on purpose. Violet and her sisters had a good time while they were with him, until near bed time, and then bidding him good night, and God's best blessings they left.

What dear little thing. He thought to himself, as they went out. "I knew that God would not allow the poor little girls to be captured by the rascally glandelinian savages, and they said that I did more, for the captain in effecting the rescue had seven men left, while all my men were killed and I was wounded, and they who wished me God's best blessings when in fact they deserve the blessings more than me. What I do wish for then poor little girls I cannot explain. But some day they will be happy again, for I mean to see that they do and who is to hinder I wonder? And I know one thing that would make them happy and joyous, and that would be the return of their mother and aunt. But I forgot to tell them that they are or were not in Julio Gallo, but as I found out, had escaped long ago and found refuge in the city of Angeline long before the battle of Gledernine raged. I'll tell them to-morrow the good news, and enjoy their happiness and glee."

Evans fell asleep an hour after, and toward midnight he happened to be awakened by a slight noise, and turning his head in the direction of the sound he saw one of the little girls sitting by one of the windows...gazing steadily out. She had been sitting there only a short time, and now she arose and seeing that Evans was awake, she came up to his bed, and sat down on it near the head, within reach of Evans who had sat up, and he had her in his arms before she knew it and pressing him close to him said:

"My but it feels good to have one of you little girls in my embrace again. How I do wish you and your dear little sisters would quickly recover so that you and your sisters could walk without the use of old crutches."

"Oh Evans," sighed Jennie; for it was she; "What would we do without you! And she threw her arms around his neck. After a moment of silence she said:

"The reason I was by the window, was because several Glandelinians sent by Germania to try once more to get us, had been arrested, within my room by the guards, and locked in the guardhouse. I heard papa remark that he will give any price to any one who gets Germania."

"I will get him," said Germania. "He has made a dangerous foe out of me on account of his treatment of you little saints, and his soldiers will not get you again if I can help to prevent it."

At last after bidding him good night of the more again and again hoping him God's blessing, she returned slowly to her room and nothing more happened until morning. During the latter part of the night general Vivian had held a council wishing to find out whether his officers agreed on the continuation of the battle, and the resumption of the attack on the enemy's lines, and positions at Norma Run or not. He knew that he had made very little impression on the enemy's lines there, and that the Glandelinians late that evening had steadily received reinforcements, more artillery and that the main line under general Phelan Mc-Hollester, was advancing to reinforce general Hel Shields at Norma Run. Indeed general Vivian was in apprehension over the threatening outcome for now he found himself heavily outnumbered by the Glandelinians and that the foe's positions were greatly strengthened. During the council a good number of his army generals were for making a desperate assault, others decided on forcing the enemy to attack, and the rest for annihilating the Glandelinian army.

But did this general Vivian did not think he could do. Anyway he had gained thus far, was very close upon Norma Run, and was about to capture the first main stronghold at Norma. On the early morning he decided to have an interview, with his brother general Hanson, Vivian the main commander, and do as he advised.

It was a long distance to the region of Norma Bridge, but he rode all the way followed by some of his staff, and reaching Hanson's headquarters at six thirty. During his absence general Roswell Buster Johnston was placed in main command, to take care of his army should the enemy make up their mind to make an attack while he was away.

General Hanson had all his own officers assembled in his room having been giving advice and instructions as to their maneuvers in attacking the Glandelinians at Norma bridge. Seeing his brother arriving general Hanson went out to meet him.

"Our forces are outnumbered by the enemy and general Mc-Hollester Phelan and Phelan Mc-Hollester, are reinforcing Hel Shields army at Norma Run," said general Vivian. "For my part I am for attacking, or compelling the enemy to assume the offensive, by making a strong demonstration, but most of my officers declare that it is more safer to destroy the two main Glandelinian army than abandoning the enterprise.... Now that is something I'm sure I cannot do, and I came to ask your advice on the matter."

"I saw the reinforcing all the time during the night," answered general Hanson. "And was myself surprised. I for my part do not intend to retire under any conditions whatever, and am now bound to capture those fortification if it takes till doomsday. After all the progress we made now it would be absolute foolishness to retreat now. And for my part, I believe your plan of forcing the enemy to attack by making a strong demonstration, is the wisest of all. From that we can deplete or annihilate their attacking armies, and reduce their numbers completely. But to annihilate those two big Glandelinian armies I believe is impossible...."

"I'll do just the very thing," said general Vivian excitedly. "I'll draw their attack in full force by making a showy demonstration, and then I'll mass all our artillery, the heaviest guns on both their columns and all fortifications, when they charge, and blow everything to Kingdom Come at that."

It was another hour before he came back to his headquarters, and assembling all his officers, he told of Hanson's advice telling them how he could crush the foe, when they attacked, blow up all their fortifications make a general counter advance, and carry all before him, capturing all the Glandelinian positions at Norma Run and rout the foe. Knowing the danger the immediate attack might bring on the little girls, if left at his headquarters, and realizing the inability of Evans protecting them in his dis-able condition, general Vivian decided to place them under the care of general Roswell Buster Johnston....

VIOLET AND HER SISTERS ARE PLACED IN THE CARE OF GENERAL ROSWELL BUSTER JOHNSTON....

He met the great general as he galloped up to his lines. The mighty general was glad to see his old time friend, general Vivian and gladly accepted the Vivian girls, declaring that his whole army would defend Violet and her sisters....

"The little celestial children are entirely welcome within my ranks any time they wish to come," said general Roswell Buster Johnston. "It will be a great pleasure to have them with me, and I can assure you that within my ranks, the Glandelinians will not be able to capture them...."

Not long after a squad of soldiers, came for the Vivian girls, and Evans announcing playfully that they were under arrest, as foolish christian spies, and that they were to be taken within general Roswell Buster Johnston's lines as quick as possible to be tried, and sentenced to heaven for all eternal eternity. Then to be more serious he told them the truth, the reason why they were to be taken and of Roswell's intentions....

They readily obeyed the summons, being helped into the waiting army wagon, and then off they started, with two squads of soldiers and six officers and three hundred thirty Concentinian cavalry men, following them armed to the teeth. The Vivian girls were indeed under heavy guard, for general Vivian always feared that large parties of the scouting scouting columns of the enemy would be roaming around, and if the little girls were sent off without a strong escort the Glandelinians would easily capture them again. And in fact it was the case. A large force of Glandelinian dragoons, a thousand in number, saw the wagon with the little girls in it, and a portion of the column dashed after them till the rest going in another direction to head them off. At once the driven lashed his horses to full speed, the christian cavalry dashing after the wagon, and delivering a withering fire at the pursuers bringing literally thirty of the resolutely Glandelinians down. The Glandelinians pursued vigorously, returning a fire more furious, but at random and none of the christian soldiers were hit. However luck was again in favor of Violet and her sisters.... At five this time a large force of general Roswell Buster Johnston's divisions, had been transferred to the right wing, during some slight action that early part of the morning and a large portion of this christian column came suddenly upon the pursuing Glandelinians. As it was a part of the main christian command that was advancing, the Glandelinians did not deem it wise to contend with such overwhelming numbers, and their first thoughts was to see who could be the quickest in getting away. The Glandelinians abandoned the pursuit and retreated in a total rout, the christians pouring in a parting volley, mowing a score of them down.

Violet and her sisters with their guiding escorts, reached general Roswell Buster Johnston's lines safely, the great general receiving them warmly.... The great generals did not know at first where to place the little girls, but nevertheless decided to keep them in his headquarters under heavy guard.... His headquarters was about a mile from his first line of position positions, and earthworks, and as this point was heavily guarded by his strongest batteries, and all kinds of mazes and obstructions, and mines, there seemed no probability of the Glandelinians gaining any success here.

DID THE DEMONSTRATION FAIL!!!

In the meantime general Vivian prepared for his demonstration, and started it about 10 o'clock, and had it in full swing by ten thirty. The Glandelinians generals however mistook this for a severe concentration upon their lines, and they at once ordered their commands into action, and in a few lines, and they at once ordered their command into action, and in a few minutes or within fifteen minutes I mean, the whole Landellinian front roared and thundered in a terrifying manner, with their fearful artillery and musketry fire. The Christian forces suffered heavy casualties and general Vivian wishing to avoid as much loss as possible, had to order the column to withdraw, believing with a sinking of the heart that his demonstration was a failure failure failure.... The withdrawal of the Christian troops was swift, their officers feigning confusion, but the enemy made no advance and the firing gradually but quickly slowed down and finally ceased altogether. Violet and her sisters heard the noise of the conflict which had lasted half an hour, but knowing it to be general Vivian's intended demonstration, made little of it, and being tired out from their former experiences, laid on the beds arranged for them and were long dropped to sleep. General Roswell Buxton Johnston suspecting something from the weird silence following the half an hour's action, reinforced his men at the works and massed his biggest guns toward the direction of the enemy. He had during this work of reinforcing, went into the room where the little girls had been taken to, but finding them asleep he did not bother them, and went out to watch and direct operations. A whole hour passed, and still another another, and all was still strangely quiet, and he wondered whether there was going to be any action after all. He sent a messenger to general Vivian to inquire whether his demonstration was a success or not, and within fifteen minutes the soldier came back, saying that Hanson's whole line all that morning since seven thirty, was in fearful action, having been attacked by the Landellinians in heavy force..... So this accounted for the quietness along general Vivian's lines.

HANSON AGAIN IN FIERCE ACTION... ..

This was news indeed, and yet through the awful silence, general Roswell Buxton Johnston had fancied that he had heard a strange thundering sound, which made the ground tremble continuously, but had not been able to make out what it was. And how did it come that general Hanson succeeded in drawing an attack, when general Vivian failed..... But as it was general Hanson though he intended to, had not made any demonstration, in fact he did not have the chance to do so, for the assault of the desperate foe came without it. Stung by the capture of "Norma's bridge" and even one of their main positions, the Landellinian generals had launched against general Hanson's lines their heaviest numbers in a driving onslaught of the most indiscriminate violence, and intensity of fury. Hanson's line at all points for four hours, had held firm cutting into pieces scores of monstrous waves of the surging graycoats, reducing three times their main assaulting line to fragments, and routing their survivors, but the sadly depleted columns had only rallied again and again, and swept forward to the attack, and supported by heavy reinforcements for reward of every repulse, the Landellinians had kept up the frightful onslaught, and the battle was raging with fearful fury along Hanson's line when the messenger discovered it..... The messenger had discovered this when returning to give general Vivian answer to Roswell's inquiry. Indeed the whole thing was puzzling to general Roswell Buxton Johnston, and learning that general Vivian did not know that his brother Hanson was attacked, he sent the messenger to tell him right away, advising him to be on his guard. The messenger did as he was told, telling all he saw to general Vivian, and how stubbornly general Vivian was holding out against the pugnacious assault. General Vivian was indeed indeed surprised, for he did not know that general Hanson was assaulted, though in the direction of "Norma's bridge" he had seen since seven thirty, even with his naked eyes, a shower of smoke mingled with puffy columns, and had believed at first that it was a far distant forest fire, as it looked like one. But though he had and was holding tenaciously against the Landellinian assailants, he Hanson's losses were terrific, more terrific than before in any action since the drive against Julio Gallo began and though he had managed to hold his ground for ever for four hours, Hanson had great doubts if his lines so badly depleted would be able to hold out against the assailants any longer. The battle was terrific raging all along the line with inconceivable violence, the Christian fire and that of the naval assailants being so intensely heavy, that the whole scene looked like a smouldering conflagration, among the fields and woods. Hanson had at his command in action against the assailants who were raising hell and Cain as to say against the Christian line in their desperate endeavors to force Hanson's whole line back, and recapture "Norma's bridge."

ROSWELL BUXTON JOHNSTON IS PUZZLED OVER THE SITUATION.

As the distant battle grew in force and violence Roswell Buxton Johnston could hear it more plainly, but still the Landellinian armies along general Vivian's front did not attack, and he wondered what the reason was. He felt nervous over the situation fearing that it was in some way a planned concentration of half of the Landellinian army against his own lines and went off himself to see general Vivian. The great general himself was pondering over the situation, and it was now two hours since the demonstration had been made and not a single sortie even was made against general Vivian's line..... If they were making such desperate assault against Hanson's army why was it that the Landellinians did not move against his own lines? General Vivian feared that his scheme was discovered some way perhaps, through a Landellinian Secret Service man, and believed that the Landellinians were attacking Hanson so furiously as to try and draw from him most of his troops to Hanson's aid, and thus weaken would as to bait him.

Unknown to the enemy however as general Vivian knew Hanson had large reserve forces close at hand, which he could use in case any part of his lines being reduced to fragments would drop back, and believing this the case general Vivian decided to pretend to weaken his forces by withdrawing a considerable number of divisions, from each of his three wings, and sent them apparently in the direction of Hanson's lines, and if the foe then attacked to immediately recall them.

GENERAL VIVIAN'S PUSE WORKS.

General Roswell Buxton Johnston declared it was a good plan all right, but nevertheless quite risky, and advised him that if he intends to follow it out he had better concentrate his strongest batteries for an emergency. "I'll do that," said general Vivian. "The forces I'll withdraw will not go very far and I'll leave their leaders instructions to come back as soon as the roar of battle crashes along my lines..."

General Vivian then started to telephone or telegraph these orders, while general Roswell Buxton Johnston hastened quickly to his lines, and prepared them for the coming attack which he expected..... giving the strictest orders possible. Then he went into his headquarters to see if the little girls were awake and found them all sitting up on Violet's bed playing an interesting game between themselves, while Evans was sitting up in his bed reading and at times writing what was in his book. He did not care to disturb them, but he watched long enough to see which one of the little girls would win the game....

Finally it turned out that little Jennie was the successful one, and they all started arguing with her.

"I told you you would win," laughed Violet. "And you said you wouldn't."

"She won five times out of six games," said Joice with a pretty smile.

"And it is a new game too," cried Evangeline.

"She surely knows how to play," said Hettie.....

Catherine and Daisy alone looked on pleasantly as Jennie protested that they let her win on purpose, and finally Evans putting down his book and writing materials said:

"Let's all of us indulge in a game, and see who wins this time."

"Oh Evans what is the use," said Violet reproachfully. "You never win because you purposely allow us to get the best of it."

"I do not care to win on such little dear as you," said Evans as they crowded around him laying the game board on his bed. "I would not be polite."

At this moment general "oswell" interrupted saying:

"My friends I'll have to place a special number of guards in this very room with you, as I do not like the looks of things just now. Hanson's lines for four hours has been desperately assaulted by the landelinians and out lines may relieve it soon according to your fathers immediate action. So I guess it is best for you eight righteous persons to keep on the watch for yourselves, and lay the game aside for the present. The battle along Hanson's line is an indiscriminate fierce fight, and there is no telling how it will be when it starts along your fathers lines, which they may assault also."

Violet and her sisters were silent for several moments, and then Hettie said:

"Your excellency, we wondered what the strange noise all the while was. We heard it since seven thirty, but later on it had been growing worse. It had sounded so strange and awesome, that we brave as we are at certain moments felt queer. Sure we will stop the game and watch proceedings, and even pray that your lines do not give way."

Roswell had a few more words with them, and then after bowing respectively went out. General Vivian followed out his plans, and about eleven thirty the selected columns were hastily withdrawing, and Violet and her sisters could see them passing, believing of course that they were being sent to Hanson's relief. Of course general Vivian's fears about the landelinians attacking Hanson to draw considerable numbers from his lines so as to weaken it to enable them to attack it with great success was completely wrong, it was only a preparation of the main landelinian generals to send the most overwhelming numbers against Roswell's Gustavus Johnston's lines as these rascals had heard of the Vivian girls being transferred there, but nevertheless Shields seeing general Vivian apparently weakened his lines became alarmed, for he feared he was sending reinforcements to Hanson and so determined to stop the Christian advance in that direction at all costs. So instead of driving any landelinian forces directly upon general Vivian's front as was expected, he sent forces by a left wheel and they came upon the Christian forces advancing apparently to reinforce Hanson and made a fearful attack upon them, driving them into confusion by the suddenness of their appearance.

THE DISASTER TO THE CHRISTIAN TROOPS AND THE FIRST BATH ASSEMBLY
REMARKED WITH FRIGHTFUL LOSS..... (A. 1. 1. 1.)

These Christian forces being attacked without warning by overwhelming numbers were routed, the landelinians driving forward with might and main, and to make matters worse, as the fighting was mostly with musket balls, sabres, lances, pikes, and bayonets, the noise was not very distinct, and general Vivian was fully unaware of the disaster. His whole line was now endangered.

For the other Christian troops had been scattered, and the landelinian scouts signally signalling the situation to general Shields, this great landelinian general decided to take advantage of it, and strike general Vivian a terrible blow and rout his whole command. He had even learned from the signals where the Vivian girls were located, and decided to make the most violent part of the assault upon general Roswell's Gustavus Johnston's lines. Within half an hour more the landelinians came forward in overwhelming numbers, and made a fearful attack driving like a sledge hammer against a weak point upon the Christian line. Fortunately general Vivian had done just exactly as general Roswell's Gustavus Johnston advised about the massing of artillery, and the enemy met an annihilating cannon and musketry fire all along the line a fire that made a terrific crash and uproar that shook Roswell's headquarters so suddenly that all the glass in the windows fell out, and the entire main first line or column of the enemy fairly withered away before this murderous discharge of forty one batteries of artillery. So frightful was the slaughter that the surviving waves of the enemy being almost bathed in the same destruction retired in confusion, leaving a sea of dead and wounded behind them. General Shields was indeed amazed over this terrific repulse, and had a belief that the Christian line was stronger than he had thought, and that it was only a trick of general Vivian's to draw his forces into an annihilation fire.

From this attack the Christian losses were about 100,000 while the landelinians had suffered the loss of 556,000 in killed and while over 275,000 landelinian soldiers had been wounded, making a total of 831,000 altogether. The frightful attack had lasted twenty twenty minutes and among the fourteen landelinian divisional commanders who had also fallen who had been killed, were a score of officers of other rank. Indeed indeed the Christian fire had been terribly devastating and the forty-one batteries having each 600 guns made a tremendous din which as stated before shook the headquarters of general Roswell's Gustavus Johnston shattering all the glass in the windows, leaving all the dishes in the pantries shaking beds, vases, chairs, tables and other furniture leap up and down, while Violet and her sisters who had been sitting on Evans had had been precipitated headlong to the floor by the concussion but fortunately not injured, though slightly scratched and bruised. The total number of Christian guns which opened upon the assailants was about 24,000 and it just can be imagined what a terrible fire it must have been when it mowed so many landelinians down in so short a time.

THE OTHER ROUTED CHRISTIAN FORCES ARE RAVAGED.....

In the meantime the other Christian forces which had been attacked and routed had been succored by a portion of Heddas ninth corps, and these landelinians were also repulsed with decimated columns adding to the total which amounted in the engagement with them singly to 293,000 to that of the Christian troops 50,000. Indeed this had been a fearful calamity to the landelinians who had been fully unaware of the Christian guns but the sight of hundreds of his mangled columns only enraged general Shier Shields who reported the slaughter to general Roswell's Gustavus Johnston who ordered him to pour a storm of explosives upon the Christian lines and resume the action with his main force, and to also try and turn general Vivian's left grand division.

THE SECOND FRIGHTFUL ONSLAUGHT AND THE WARFARE OF TITANS.

Shields did so, and soon there was a perfect barrage of shell explosions among general Vivian's lines which committed incalculable damage, and again the large fresh landelinian surges lunged forward again to the storming. This time the attack was of redoubled violence, the battle making a din which caused a concussion that again hurled the Vivian girls from the bed they had went back on throwing them to the floor. The whole forty one Christian batteries broke loose in a blasting ear-splitting roar mingled with a general general flame and din of musketry and hundreds of machine guns, and scores upon scores of jagged gaps were torn in the gray lines, but these were rapidly closed and the shrieking yelling cursing hacking horde drew nearer and nearer to the Christian parapets. The Christian line or infantry alone were inactive while their artillery and musketry played upon the foe, but now as the landelinians drew within their range, they let loose with their storm of all in a general simultaneous discharge and hundreds of the jagged parts of the main front line in gray dissolved away. And the general uproar the survivors pressed on, but all silently now, and came upon the position, striving with might and main and with the fury of desperation to cross the works but were met with bayonet and pistol shots. In fact so pugnacious was the resistance of the Christians that the hundreds of landelinian ranks were dropping faster than any one could count them.

At last appalled at the indiscriminate slaughter the Glandelinians finally withdrew in confusion, this hot contest having lasted three hours with the losses equally heavy on both sides.

THIRD ASSAULT AND ITS INDISCRIMINATE FURY.

B

But nevertheless this was only a lull in the attack. The Glandelinian batteries had increased their terrible thundering and within half an hour more general Shields led another assault in person. This attack was completely general, the Glandelinians pushing on like an avalanche, and finally carrying the position held by the infantry after a desperate hand to hand combat in which hundreds of thousands fell on both sides.

But to face those thundering christian batteries, was like snow drift facing a blast furnace or trying to form on top of a roaring furnace, columns by the score flaring melting away, whole lines ten miles long reached that volcano of flames and din, only to sink down in heaps. It was frightful. A score of times the main waves of Glandelinians surged against those thundering batteries but only to melt away.

It was just like suicide for the Glandelinians..... to face those thundering batteries, but general Shields confident that his great numbers would tell, would hear of no turning back, and so the assault was continued against the christian batteries which kept up about that shook the heavens.

Unknown to him general Shair Shields right grand division a portion of which was attacking general Roswell Ruster Johnston's lines his storming seething lines of fire, was annihilated, and other columns confused by this bloodcurdling slaughter of their comrades, were on the verge of giving way. Their chief commander was dead, their mightiest and largest columns were shot to pieces in a very short time, every regimental standard was mere taper poles even broken and thousands of their officers of either rank were killed or wounded. Nothing could be seen of the christian position so thick was the smoke of battle..... And Violet and her sisters themselves were appalled at the havoc raking din, and they wondered if Hanson could hear it. Violet and her sisters having been tumbled off their beds twice by the concussion caused by the tremendous firing of general Vivian's batteries were more cautious this time, and remained sitting on the floor rather than run the chances of being hurled down once more. Even from the concussion the plaster of the ceiling in their room had come down in bushes full, covering their beds and the floor and the very walls were even cracked. Evans himself had been hit by fragments of plaster and his bed was covered with it thickly. They decided to have the guards move them to safer places for fear that the concussion of the battle would shake the house down about them next.

THE FEARFUL ACTION ALONG GENERAL ROSWELL RUSTER JOHNSTON'S LINES.

ROSWELL RUSTER JOHNSTON IS SEVERELY WOUNDED.

And adding to it Roswell Ruster Johnston's lines being the hardest hit returned the blow with tenfold vehemence. Not once had the wicked Glandelinians been able to piece pieces his lines and the terrific fire along the christian front swept the Glandelinians down like a great typhoon does a tropical island jungle. The Glandelinians had attacked fiercely for three hours incessantly against the christian line, but time and again the large squadrons of Continentals and Abolitionists cavalry would break through the Glandelinian columns in a maddening counter charge, yelling and roaring with the fury of the damned in hellfire.

The Glandelinians had been assailed by the ferocious sight of hundreds of thousands of charging horses, and when the cavalry would charge the cavalry would brace themselves, hoping to smother the turning surge of brutes with their thin bayonets, but the cavalry forces crashed through the grating lines and would smash the attacking Glandelinian surge fiercer enough to make all the silent and dead sick in their graves. Each time the Glandelinians were charged by the cavalry they would flee and up and down the through the rout the horses would play, hearing the shrieking shrieking riders through the hellish maelstrom with the rush of a thundering avalanche. But nevertheless the appalling losses inflicted by the cavalry, or the prodigious christian artillery, and musketry fire, did not appear to spell or shunt the Glandelinian hordes.....

They only returned to the attack in floods of men, redoubting their efforts but the christian fire, had been picking off their thousands of men faster than any one could count, by three scores, and now threatened with annihilation, they had played, their headlong advance was halted, and now it seemed at a standstill.

In the frightful slaughter however, general Roswell Ruster Johnston, early in the action, after having ten horses shot under him, had been borne from the field severely wounded, and general Francis Smithson who took his place fell mortally wounded half an hour later..... His losses despite the enemy being threatened with annihilation, was three times heavier than the enemy's, and still the murderous carnage continued on. General Schloeder Stanck had taken command of Roswell's sadly depleted lines with Lindenburg Collyer, the latter who sent general Vivian the news, that Roswell was down, his line overwhelmed, badly torn to pieces but still holding its ground against uneven odds, in a furnace of fire, and fiery hell of battle..... General Vivian however, at that time was unable to send any reinforcements as he had to use every available command to throw against his own assailants. The battle was a terrible one, more terrific than the engagement with Hanson, which was lasting longer and so terrible was his own losses that general Vivian felt harried.

He had went over to general Roswell Ruster's Johnston's lines, to examine the situation there, and then went to see the wounded general who had been brought into his headquarters and laid on his bed.

The poor little Vivian girls were saddened, and even fearful of danger on account of his fall, and had prayed fervently at his very bedside to God, asking God's protection, on the end him and his brethren not to allow the foe to win. Everything outside to them seemed a fearful conflagration, a conglomeration of disasters, charges and God knows what. General Vivian himself was apprehensive, and almost wished that he had not caused the enemy to attack after all. He himself had never seen the enemy attack in such a fearful manner and never had he ever seen such frightful slaughter, since the battle of Little Bighorn. "Glandelinians...."

However he said to general Collyer:

"If the enemy are about to force your lines, and you are sure you cannot hold out against the Glandelinians any longer, see to it that my daughters, Evans, and Roswell are safely out of danger before you yield. I had placed them in the charge of Roswell, but as he is wounded he is unable to protect them any longer and so their safety is looked for from you. But do not yield ground, unless you see it absolutely necessary, it do so. Probably I may be able to require my desperate assailants, by and by, and then I can heavily reinforce your columns."

"I'll hold on to the last man," cried Collyer.

"Those Glandelinians are more sadly depleted than it seems, and those are the assailants of general Shields right grand division, which my scouts have been signalling to me about, being threatened with annihilation. So that gives me a hope of a successful stand. But of course I do not want to cause annihilation to my forces, and if absolutely necessary I will have to withdraw, I'll do so. But I'll assure your excellency, that those little girls will be protected, and before I'm forced to retire, in case of being worse worsted, I'll haul them far to the rear, before beginning the retreat..... Those Glandelinians will never get them, if I even die in their defense."

After this interview general Vivian left, and indeed to all the almost horrified christian generals, the battle was the fiercest they had ever witnessed, and heartshaking and awful indeed, was the prodigious losses on both sides.

Thus was the results..... General Vivian during the night decided to find out from general Anson his brother which was the best to do. He went over to his headquarters, that night, and held a council with him over to with him over the situation. Anson's decision was to assault with all his force supporting the strong concentration concentration by a fire from all the strongest christian batteries, which were to hammer at the fortifications. General McHollister Phelan was indeed apprehensive over the situation and deemed it wise to make the most violent assaults ever mustered against the christians lines and still having enough reinforcements to give the christians all the battle they were looking for he waited until midnight, and during one of those violent thunderstorms which come suddenly during a summer month, threw all precautions to the winds and went to it once more and during this great struggle the landelinian assaults every time were general, the landelinians continually facing a deadly and fearful fire from the christian batteries, which tore down their surging columns one after another like the torn tornado does the corn.

FRIGHTFUL FURY OF THE MIDNIGHT STRUGGLE...

Division after division, had been torn and mangled, but despite all their losses it seemed for a time, as if the landelinian onslaught could not be stopped. Several times the landelinians reached the christian works, which sometimes if they had been turned into rivers of fire, and smoke, but so often were the many landelinian divisions torn and mangled that the survivors were only too glad to give up the struggle and retreat. This action had been very bloody and raged with a cruel fury for two hours, and ten times the main line of the assaillants, had been swept to pieces and driven into confusion, by the merciless christian fire, which carried all before it.....

THE SECOND BLOODY MIDNIGHT ASSAULT.

But this was not all, and after a fifteen minutes lull, fresh forces of Glandelinians went to it with all might and main and for an hour both sides fought with all their might, the landelinians making some of the fiercest fiercest onslaughts ever seen at Worms, and scores of divisions of Glandelinian columns were torn to pieces and swept back, but scores of more still came on to the assault, never allowing the christians any respite, hammering away with the force of avalanches, and crushing the massive christian divisions again and again, making terrible slaughter.

The action had raged for a full hour the Glandelinians storming the christian line with the greatest violence, and throwing at last the whole christian force under general Maurice Costello into a conglomerate of confusion and routing the christians from the trenches with the greatest loss, the Glandelinians following a considerable distance, storming the other christian works with the most frightful vehemence, sweeping forward in one great division after another, but the other christian forces incessantly met them with a most destruction fire, decimating the gray lines frightfully, tearing whole armies to fragments, and once more hurling the Glandelinians back pell-mell, the christian cannon pounding the Glandelinian armies to pieces, and supporting the christian columns as they counter charged to recover the lost position, the battle field looking as if the mouth of hell had opened and was roiling in its sulphurous fumes, the battle making a loud clatter heard for many hundreds of miles.

It was more like murder than war and the christian themselves recovered the trenches with terrible losses, the christians crushing their assailants every time they came forward on the rally, smashing down whole armies and scattering their surviving columns like chaff, and again the many battle flags were torn to shreds.

All the while both sides were active in severe artillery duels, the christians massing all their available guns, again against the Glandelinian batteries the artillery duel being like a deafening warfare of thundering roaring titans, the crash of artillery sounding like great rows of volcanoes extending for scores of miles on both sides blowing themselves to pieces in the greatest violence of their eruption.

THE VIOLENCE OF THE BATTLE AT THE BREAKING OF THE DAY..... THE ADVANCING CHRISTIAN AVAUNCH, AND THE FEARFUL GLANDELINIAN RESISTANCE.

At the breaking of day, the christian generals launched the fiercest attack against the Glandelinians forces, and so the battle raged on with the mightiest fury indescribable, horrible the christians storming with the fury of their attack at times, almost shattering the Glandelinians columns, and sweeping them with their own cannon, the full length of their line. Despite the fury of the christian onslaught however, the Glandelinians were able to repulse it, and counter charge against the christians with the raging fury of the demons of hell, and crushing the christian divisions as fast as their own were crushed. As fast as the Glandelinian divisions were mangled, a rushed, and wiped out, and sent back in flying fragments, fresh divisions only came on anew, and mingling with the christian lines, amid a volcano of flame and din of cannon and musketry. Now the christians were worsted at one section of their line cannot be stated here, as it would take too long, but nevertheless the christians were beaten, and beaten shamefully at that, being shameful crushing defeat.

THE ENEMY THREATEN TO BE SUCCESSFUL.....

The loss of the christian position of this line was caused by the frightful slaughter on the right wing of general Mulberry's corps, and especially among the main leaders, twenty eight of which fell, general Maurice Costello being among the dangerously wounded. The poor christians at this section of the line did all in their power to win this terrible battle, exerting all their strength, massing all their strongest guns, and cutting the Glandelinian columns down in the most frightful numbers but they may as well have tried to stop an advancing cyclone. The Glandelinians charged successfully crushing this portion of the christian army to pieces without dismount, and putting it out of commission entirely. In this action the furious Glandelinians lost 912,848, in killed and 1,197,963, in wounded within one hour.

General Vivian himself had suffered fearful losses from the continual hammering onslaught of the enemy under general Zimmermann and McWhirther McHollister Thompson, and many other commanders.

Kinderline's and Perdrue's armies were annihilated, in holding the fatal Worms Run woods, and two of general Veddas main forces were dislodged, three others were cut to pieces and routed and the rest were threatened with annihilation. General Doubly Day Johnston made a final stand, with his forces, but was also driven back with his army in tatters and he himself severely wounded.... The great main action of the fourth days battle was very extensive the whole christian line of general Vivians being violently assaulted, by both the enemies in infantry, batteries, and hundreds of squadrons of cavalry, the shell fire of the Glandelinian batteries tearing the woods to pieces and shattering good portions of the main christian line.

GENERAL VIVIAN'S LINE IS ALMOST ENTIRELY DRIVEN BACK.....

The whole christian line for three hours managed to hold and repulse with the most frightful slaughter, ever seen three th terrific onslaughts, made by the glandelinians under various other commanders, who led the Glandelinian onslaught. Put when general Edward "Immermann" "Mc-Thirther", and Mc-Thirther "Mc-Hollester", fell dangerously wounded, "Mc-Thirther" Johnston, and "Mc-Hollester" Henryson and Federal Johnston, who led terrific avalanche like charges against the christian line, also fell wounded, but nevertheless the christian troops were thrown into confusion, and Hanston's whole army, with verdrude Johnston, and "Mc-Hollester" Henderson, who covered the retreat of these panic stricken columns were annihilated, and as these christian generals very superior generals fell severely wounded, the rest of the main christian line was thrown into a panic, and finally the enemy made a most overwhelming rush, which cut up the remaining christian columns, which dared make make stand, as a stand, and with a tumult of fixed bayonets, crashed down upon the hundreds of thousands of demoralized and terror stricken masses, carrying all before them and changing the following retreat into a total rout.

General Camillia had also been beaten back, after very very sanguinary fighting, and though for a time the glandelinian victory trembled in the balance, a final onrush of new glandelinian columns, broke Camillia's and Vivian's line all to pieces and he also was routed though half an hour afterwards, inspired by Federalson's noble deeds stand rallied a good part of his disordered command and gave the enemy more resistance though finally he was routed again and with sanguinary losses, he and Vivian being seriously wounded. Federalson's noble deeds stand saved the routed christian forces from destruction, or from a serious demoralized condition, and had Federalson's noble deeds not been wounded, his army could probably have made a successful stand, until the routed command could have been fully rallied.

But when the whole of Federalson's line, was shattered, torn and mangled, and driven into confusion, this great general fell seriously wounded in trying to rally them, and so his whole line gradually went to pieces in a vain effort to resist that terrible tidal wave of glandelinians which swept upon them with irresistible force and fury that a tornado does upon a town, and the remainder that did not go to pieces like that wrecked town, were routed like sheep and forced to retreat without any hopes of further reorganizations or further stands against the foe under general Shields and "Mc-Hollester" Phelan.....

A BIG GAP IS FORMED AT GENERAL VIVIAN'S LINE.
..... THE FIGHT AT THE GAP IS SUCCESSFUL FOR THE CHRISTIANS.....

The surge of glandelinians poured through the gap in general Vivian's line made by the retiring christian divisions, like the waves of the sea in a hurricane, the firing on both on both sides roaring, crashing, and banging like a trillion cannon explosions at once. Shell explosions by the thousand per minute, made great geysers of earth and melting snow and smoke and the whole battle made a great scene like some mighty prairie and forest fire together.....00000

All the glandelinian fortifications were in an uproar like the thundering ridges of volcanoes in eruptions, by the plains appeared as the vastest volcanic craters, or like the valley of a thousand smokes in Alaska, Alaska, and the heavens seemed split from the terrific din. The glandelinians indeed fought bravely during this great battle keeping up the assault with the most stubborn fury, going at it hammer and tongs and smashing up the christian line every time they charged. General Vivian made the most desperate effort to prevent the glandelinians from pouring through the gap, the action at the gap being very sanguinary, and serious in its consequences. The glandelinians made a heavy onslaught against the christians striving furiously to capture the gap made by Camillia the christians indeed being kept busy in trying to prevent the glandelinians back from the positions.....The cannon thundered on both sides at close range at this section, the noise being very large and clamorous and the shell fire of both sides seemed to tear down everything before it. The christians counter charged as furiously and as the glandelinians made their own onslaughts but finally such a strong concentration was made at the gap that the Angellinians whipped the glandelinians to a finish. Indeed from between the tremendous gap made, the christian armies suffered a serious disaster, and general Vivian's whole right wing was driven into confusion and cut up many times with a frightful loss in christian officers. Two thousand one hundred forty six generals had fallen killed or wounded and only one hundred forty six of them were named. One of the greatest tragedies of the battle occurred at ten o'clock in the morning. It was during the seemingly highest fury of the battle when the enemy was making one of the worse on onslaughts upon the gap that general Vivian's headquarters was blown to pieces by an explosive shell and reports came that he was dangerously wounded and buried in the wreckage.

2514

WAS THE REPORT TRUE?.....

The tragedy startled the officers of the whole army, when they got the report one after another, and at first it had been believed that the great general, the chief of the main christian army at this point had been either killed outright, or mortally wounded, as every one in the building had perished. Indeed this part of the battle was one of exceedingly great violence and bloody fury, starting forest fires, and hundreds of thousands of both sides perished in the fire, without there being any hope of rescue from their comrades, who had been forced to retreat before the fierce heat of the conflagration.....One of the greatest disasters of the fourth day of the battle, was the capture and surrender of the main glandelinian divisions under Bavaria and Archibald Johnston, which happened at the same time that general Vivian's headquarters was wrecked by a shell. This command had been under the command of general Braggard Paltwin, Braggard being one of Shields' chief acting generals Braggard having fallen mortally wounded. One of the main christian generals Hanson's Mendon was also wounded, another very superior general Joseph Hadley was killed, and even general Phelanburg the chief commander of general Vivian's main center was severely wounded, but had retained his command despite the serious condition of his wound, until forced off the field by one of his assistance officers.

Thirty two other christian generals also fell mortally wounded and now indeed the killed in christian general generals was greater than the killed officer generals on the sides of the glandelinians, who lost only fifty one during the entire battle for from the first days start. Nearly thirty six christian officers, three of them generals were killed, and also millions of prisoners in men, and officers were taken by the enemy.

The battle was so violent that afterwards it was reported to have shook the country for over a thousand miles, for the concussion of more than a hundred hundred thousand cannon, was terrific and the din could be heard for hundreds of miles.

The charges were made back and forth by both sides and in titan throes of firearms and cannon, but the greater number of onsets were made by the enemy. There is no doubt if it was not for the continual stand against the foe by general Vivian, while his right wing was cut up scores of times, and driven into confusion the glandelinians would surely have been victorious, and swept the whole christian lines or from the fields right and left.

Fortunately the left of the christian line, had overlapped in a way to cause a withdrawal of general Shields' main right grand division thus enabling general Vivian to make a severe turning movement which rolled back the desperate assailants with frightful loss, thus enabling him to successfully cover the reformation of his right wing, which finally stood its ground to the last, and drove the foe back in confusion.

But nevertheless the christians still were to have no respite for large fresh forces made sledge hammer onslaughts, smashing themselves against the christian front, receding and then coming on again with redoubled violence but seemingly in vain. It had been general Shields ambitions to capture Violet and her sisters and slay them, and to do so he had known that the christian armies firmly under the command of general Roswell Puster Johnston, would have to be routed out of their position, and having reported the case to general Nelson McColleston, the result was a more desperate assault upon this portion of the christian line than anywhere else.

Headlines whole christian army, counter charging the foe was ambushed and annihilated, but Hanson McColleston organ arriving to the scene gave serious resistance, though the advance of his first grand division had been thrown back with the most frightful loss. The Gandalfinians after charging and repelling desperate counter charges, managed to capture the first line of christian redoubts. Nelson Staneklin falling mortally wounded at this moment.

The fall of their general however did not demoralize the Gandalfinians and as the main line of the foe made a general attack upon the whole line of Hanson organ, the very world seemed to burst to pieces as great was the deafening din of the firing of both sides.

However the result was that the first assault was fairly desolved to nothingness, and the other columns that were coming on desolving into fragments retired in utmost confusion. Reinforced however the Gandalfinians had made a second desperate assault with redoubled violence. The gray line even surged above and clear over the whole christian works, but in the bloody hand to hand encounter the enemy's lines were again almost annihilated, the survivors forced to recoil taking a few of their wounded with them. The Gandalfinians however were not discouraged, and made a third assault more violent than the last two.

It resulted with them angling and cutting up of the whole line of assault and again they recoiled the christians pursuing them and recapturing the redoubts. In the action all along the line on both sides over 600,000 guns were now in action making a world splitting din..... The Gandalfinians were now again assaulting Logan Hansons lines, and three big waves of Gandalfinians were annihilated by the christian curtain of artillery fire but again the redoubts were taken.....

ALONG GENERAL, ROSWELL PUSTER JOHNSTONS LINES
THE FIERCEST OF THE BATTLE RAGES, LIKE ANOTHER GREAT CONFERMINE.....

Here for the possession of the vivian girls staged the fiercest action of the worst battle ever seen around Norma, and so frightful was the struggle that it cannot be depicted in full account. The Gandalfinians in these the desperation of their assault annihilated Hanson Logans left wing, with the death of Hansonia Johnstonia. The sound of the battle was terrific and hard for many hundreds of miles.

General Hanson Logan though his best and largest divisions were driven back in confusion many times, finally stayed that inrolling tide of success for the enemy, and sent their lines back crushed to fragments.

Over twenty million Gandalfinians faced a terrified drum-fire of christian artillery, and driven back crushed to fragments, had joined with another twenty million and again rushed forward to resume the furious assault, but were frightfully decimated and driven back in the wildest confusion, repeating a scene equally as terrible as that of the terrifying horrors that came that following November at Aronburgs run. A third time a column of the same number of Gandalfinians rushed to the storming, but more than one hundred thousand cannon were opened upon them. Whole lines of men twenty miles long were literally blown in the air and the rest of the main column though it got within reach of the christian works and closed with the Angelinians with a fierce storm of their devil yells, could not force the christians back from the position, and the hurr hundreds of thousands of mangled survivors started to withdraw in a pandemonium of confusion, and such a fight did the christian generals lead against Shields attacking columns, that general Hastings Stanek of the foe including Harold Johnston Parinling, and every chief staff of note in all their hosts were left dead upon the field, the surviving Gandalfinians breaking their ranks and fleeing in a panic.

But even then Shields was not discouraged, and again fresh forces of Gandalfinians swept forward in all their array to attack the christians, the Angelinians still keeping side by side in the longest massive lines which were all aflame, and when three million Gandalfinian horsemen, consisting of Gargolian surdes, Omarians, Omarian-Gurdes, and the like rode against the christian line like an avalanche they were annihilated, men and horses together, and as the main line of the foe started to give way the christians pressed forward with the wildest yells that beat the Gandalfinian "Devil Yell", while not a cry went up from the Gandalfinians that general Shields was killed. But as he came up with fresh troops and rode along the line encouraging his men as they turned to face the christian assailants, some of their horse brigades divided the advancing christian line from the main body, but instead of destroying the christians they themselves met annihilation from the sudden storm of the christian fire.

The main body however still remained firm headless of the scorching Gandalfinian storm of fire, and with their own guns cutting down the Gandalfinians in crowds of ranks repulsed the Gandalfinians for a time, but when the christian line again surged forward Shields formed an immense body and led on a furious counter onslaught, and hundreds of thousands of the christians holding on as firm as a rock fell fighting to the last, heaps of dead men being strewn all over the ground.

ANOTHER BLOODY REPULSE!!!!

Twenty seven Gandalfinian divisions whose battered line had flashed fiery flame of musketry for hours, now dashed forward to seize the tattered christian banners, and soldiers still faithfully collected at about the smoking trenches. Another of the main christian generals, He Heran Herald Bermingham recieved a mortal wound, and dropped while at the same time a blasting fire of christian guns tore the twenty divisions of the foe so continuously, that they were reduced to small fragments the survivors breaking and fleeing.

The whole christian line rallied, and yet the day would have been won sooner had not a blunder occurred. The blunder caused one of the withdrawal of the main christian divisions on Hanson Logans right, and the furious Gandalfinians only returning to the assault again finally broke the whole christian line to fragments, and drove them from the hard fought field.

General James Salamander, also had led his forces forward to attack the christian lines on the left of Hanson Logans army, but however his army of three million fell into a trap was frightfully infiltrated, by the christian guns, and threatened with annihilation, but still Salamander did not give up. His officers began to complain and to threaten threaten, and so when he had only five hundred thousand left, Salamander got out of the circle of fire and retreated.

This part of the battle indeed was a horrible struggle and Zimmerman Gumbillin fought most of it against the foe. Thirty more officers were wounded. Put all these scenes were not the worse as bloodier ones occurred, the cannonading being inconceivably terrific the din seemingly to fairly blast the air. In fact the battle along general Hanson Logans line was a literal massacre, as divisions, brigades and corps had been annihilated, shell bursts pierced the sky in ear-splitting explosions per minute, and frightful scenes of bloodshed continued on in which the christian armies under generals Maltonia Jensen Hansonia, Schloeder, Viviana Hennine, and Nero Crowley were also annihilated... for the fury of their desperate stand.

The battle indeed raged with inconceivable violence along Hanson Logans line, never had a minutes intermission and was continually an inhuman slaughter. Thousands of Gandalfinian officers were killed or wounded and so fierce was the action that the whole world seemed to be a fiery conflagration.

gration, and it looked as if the last judgement was nigh. This part of the battle indeed was becoming a fearful one, the christian troops under Hanson began fighting in the hardest manner, countercharging again and again but to no avail. They tried all that brave men could do, charging and repelling charges in return, but numbers and losses was telling on them terribly.

Now and then Hogan began to withdraw his main left grand division these christian columns retreating as quickly as possible. So many of the "landelinians" assailing musters lines fell in those few hours, a loss that seemed too incredible to be real a loss so heavy that at first the "landelinian" survivors were appalled and would have been thrown into confusion had it not been for the bravery of their surviving officers, who rallied them again and again. Winton of the "landelinian" general had been killed and wounded for another addition. The main line of Hogan's army still held however, millions of the glandelinians charging against the christian columns and mingling with them in titan throes and cutting the christian columns all to pieces, but failed as yet to break the main line.

Great explosions soon made to tear the earth asunder as the christian and glandelinian canons hammered at each other in drum-drum selves, and the sky and plains, nay the whole battle field were shrouded in smoke of musketry and cannon fire and bursting shells. On the "landelinian" side general Nolan, general and Helleston had fallen mortally wounded, while many other generals had also fallen. It was indeed a fiery fiery fighting, a contest of the most terrible description. It was a battle that made a terrible clamor and one indeed to test the bravery and courage of the Glandelinian and christian soldiers.

The Glandelinian Glandelinian general Shoemannia Philinson sent his mightiest forces forward to the support of the other mangled glandelinian columns, storming the christian lines with the fury of hell, but the whole christian line seemed like thousands of the mightiest volcanoes in titan eruption, the christian guns supported by flaming sheets of musketry and machine gun fire pouring a storm of devastation, that tore all the Glandelinian divisions to pieces, which dared charge upon those fatal works. Three or four times many millions of "landelinians" charged the christian lines with all their courage and fury, fighting with the fury and stubbornness of cornered lions, but the christian fire swept all before it in avalanches of screaming roaring destruction, and the shattered glandelinian columns had to recede, with all their mightiest divisions routed in total disorder. In fact general Maxwell's Johnston's lines were the only ones holding their ground.

GENERAL VIVIAN'S WHOLE LINE IS DRIVEN BACK.

In fact nearly the whole of general Vivian's line, was time and again torn with thousands of gaps, and had now been rolled up right and left. General Vivian seeing indeed that before such a driving attack of the foe, it was impossible to hold his positions, and fearing a disastrous rout should his main left wing get turned, he had withdrawn leaving behind all his cannon and lots of ammunition in the possession of the foe, who was following closely, tearing his columns to pieces, with their harassing withering fire. The Glandelinians had captured seven strong christian fortifications in quick succession in a fight of the most frightful description, the brave "landelinian" generals continually throwing forward heavy forces against the christian lines, amid a roaring blasting artillery fire of the greatest intensity from the christian batteries still in the possession of the "landelinians", these christians holding their positions very stubbornly, as stubbornly as men can hold their ground, against an onslaught of the most severe violence, but in vain the "landelinians" overran both the first and second line trenches, capturing many hundreds of thousands of prisoners.

All along the line the thunder of battle had raged with the most frightful fury ever seen the "landelinians" making the most violent counterpunch, but had as many times crushed themselves against long lines of blasting artillery fire, before they gained the great success they had made.

In counter charging the christians made the hardest attack against the whole charging "landelinian" front, but whichever way it raged it seemed to turn out a great victory for the christian army.

who showed great bravery during the great battle cutting down scores of the highest christian ranks, every time they countercharged, and sending them back with many of their columns in tatters. General Brooks "landelinians" had been crushed to fragments and though receding under an annihilation fire, many other christian columns had tried to hold its ground, but the overwhelming Glandelinians attacking like a storming hurricane "tore the deadliest christian fire as if it was nothing at all. This part of the battle made the scene resemble some great conflagration, and as fast as the foe was checked at some points, the rest still pressed on, crushing themselves against the solid christian line. Twice amid the dreadful carnage before the general withdrawal of the glandelinians had about as it seemed gained the day, and swept the whole christian line back, but twice with the advance of heavy reinforcements, and heavy runs the Glandelinian assaults had been finally checked with great slaughter, but not even then driven back, and they only returned as heavy fire as they received, thinning the christian lines fearfully, and repelling every counter assault with a sweeping success.

The scores of thousands of christian guns made horrible havoc among the newly arrived glandelinian forces exposed to it, cutting wide swaths in every direction, tearing whole lines down and deforming the whole landscape.

One Glandelinian general after another led assault after assault but only met frightful decimation. The guns of the christians every time opened a veritable volcano of flame and din, and these Glandelinian forces shattered and broken up, were compelled to give up the assault, but still other main forces swept to the storming, but only met the same horrible fate.

The battle raged with the utmost steadiness of a hurricane storm, while the foe swept forward steadily like storm waves against a crumbling breakwater. So violent were the Glandelinian onslaughts that it seemed incredible that the christians were able to stand their ground, as they did, for at every sweeping assault whole christian lines were cut up and thrown back, but nevertheless they held on for a while against all these fearful onslaughts, cutting down the Glandelinian columns one after another and finally routing the survivors altogether. The Glandelinians though routed totally as they were rallied at receiving reinforcements, and only resumed their assault, and though the christian positions were manned by strong batteries, and strong lines of infantry had for a time seemed impossible to be carried, and only committed wholesale slaughter. One of the most noted points of this action which caused the forced withdrawal of general Vivian's lines was a death dealing stone wall similar to that at the second battle of Mc-Hull's Run, but worse for here millions fell.

ANOTHER COUNTERCHARGING DEATH DEALING STONE WALL.

The "landelinians" had succeeded in driving general Costello Hanson far from a portion of this seemingly impregnable position, but not without serious loss and about one quarter of all their generals fell in that fearful onslaught. Men on both sides had been mowed down in scores of thousands per minute, and though for a long while the christians defending the stone wall were able to hold their position, a portion of the whole line had been swept back and turned, the glandelinians carrying all before them, until checked by the main christian batteries. How the forces on the opposing sides charged to and fro in titan throes cannot be well stated here, but the foe did most of the violent attacking, launching assault after assault. But for a while these assaults were in vain, for the christians beat them back every time smashing their columns to pieces, and routing their survivors every time with frightful loss. At this stone wall and its vicinity the scene was like a great conflagration, the din of the firing seeming to split the heavens, there being a cannonading at these stone walls that shook the heavens, made the city of Jule Cello tremble to its foundation and arouse all the glandelinians and child slaves in Gromer and broke thousands of windows in the buildings from the concussion.

The battle after an hours duration at this point, had become a regular conflagration of horror. Tens of millions of glandelinians forty times crushed themselves against the christian line, the glandelinians columns being torn to pieces, the battle line in this action being very extensive the battle being very cruel in its blasting fury, the glandelinians attacking in a frenzy of violence and savagery, crushing down all opposition in their path, but again at this point also the christian fire carried all before it, sweeping whole plains of men to their deaths and destruction driving the abhorred Glandelinians into a wild panic and routing them. But rallying the Glandelinians only redoubled the fierce attack with all the violence they could, Zimmermann Mc-Hollister throwing forward his left grand division and meeting the greatest resistance. His losses were so horrible that they exceeded all others, but in the heat of the conflict he had suffered the annihilation of one of his best divisions to the flow flower of his army and in trying to rally the parts that were in confusion and cut to pieces by a christian counter charge, his he was killed twenty of his best officers going down amid the dreadful storm of fearful warfare.

Through the annals of general Cedernine Cedernine Mc-Whitherand Thompson Mc-Hollister, who brought up heavy reinforcements the army of Zimmermann was saved from destruction, but for a time the violent thunderous onslaughts of the christians could not be checked, until Johnston Fed Federal threw forward his main armies and finally won the ground after terrible slaughter, though he himself was badly wounded. But finally the whole command defending the stone wall was routed, with the loss of three quarters of their numbers, and general Johnston Vivian, who continued to make a desperate stand was also taken prisoner in detail his army being cut to pieces and routed. General Butterfield and noble Day Dargin, who also made a fierce but unsuccessful stand against the Glandelinians suffered the loss of 1,116,553, to that of the enemy 2,000,000 wounded and 23,432 dead. General Vivian's whole army would have been crippled and displaced, and annihilated in the bargain, and even Hanson himself would have seen his own armies jeopardized and crippled so as to be useless in further activities in the war entirely after general Vivian's whole line had been driven back and the very war would have been lost right then and there if the forces under Roswell Buster Johnston had not held firm when the rest of the line gave way. Thirty more christian generals were wounded and forty five were killed making a total loss unheard of in the history of these great battles.

The Glandelinians throwing general Vivian's line back had apparently won a sweeping victory carrying all before them. It can never be described the inconceivable violence of the battle, which had explosions as to tears seemingly bottomless craters in the battle smitten plains, set forest fires despite the deep snow on the ground that turned two cities to the ground and wiped out many towns. The cannoning thunders of the battle had such terrific vibrations as to cause severe earthquakes which shook down many towns, the Glandelinians making some of the most terrific charges, and though their whole line was rolled up in great confusion and cut to pieces, other lines came on anew, driving against the christian line like monstrous tidal waves of men only to melt into fragments as if on a wave charging against a breakwater. The terrific storm of shells on both sides shattered woods worse than the worst tornado could have done, and the windrows of wreckage was literally yintwined with the dead wounded and dying of both sides the many wounded being left to perish in the conflagrations that followed. All the while general Vivian's lines were in confusion the Glandelinians had continued their violent assault against Logan's lines, pouring across shell swept plains and plains, and though whole columns went to pieces the survivors continued the frightful onslaught smashing up the whole christian line again and again and driving them into abject terror and consternation, but the christians only rallied to the defense of their works, driving back the foe with frightful losses, but on they came again with frightful violence cut in up the christian line once more and again driving them into confusion.

Again the christians rallied and drove back their desperate assailants, but on came the Glandelinians again, and once again the christians recoiled in confusion the main counter charging line being annihilated.

Tens of millions of christians were crushed to pieces in their endeavors to check the merciless Glandelinian onslaught which had continued such a long time with inconceivable violence and fury against the massive christian line.

GREAT WAVES OF GLANDELINIAN'S SLAUGHTERED.

It was the first time in the war that the foe was fought as stubbornly as he did in this battle and truthfully as I said before they almost deserved it if they had won the victory. The Glandelinian infantry charged furiously despite the panorama of horror prevailing everywhere, the heavy concentrated concentration of christian troops again against the Glandelinians failing to check the Glandelinian onslaught and soon again the works were carried but as the enemy swarmed his whole line was torn and mangled, scores of monstrous waves ten miles long being annihilated, and again once more the Glandelinians recoiled appalled at the frightful slaughter.

In one great charge the enemy had succeeded in crushing the whole of general Vivian's christian line annihilating general Vivian's right wing. Here monstrous waves of the Glandelinians made a terrific assault, which turned the whole battle field in that region into a volcano of flame and din, these waves being wiped out one after another but simultaneously the Glandelinians had swept upon the main forces under Jensen Hanson, whole waves or lines stretched for leagues making astounding a mass assault of four hours duration, this Glandelinian assault becoming so irresistible that the whole christian line was forced from the works and only when almost annihilated and outflanked did the few remaining Glandelinians finally give way only to be also shot down during the retreat. Indeed the timely arrival of reinforcements at this point checked the Glandelinian storm and the battle raged on at this point for the rest of the time, the new forces holding their ground as best as they could. Along general Vivian's whole line the furious Glandelinian assault was continued with such tremendous fury that he had to concentrate all his available guns to stop their maddened hammering attack, hundreds of thousands of cannon of every make being massed upon the assailants and such a havoc was never witnessed before as now followed. Whole portions of the main line being torn to fragments by the mad tornado of shells but still on they came though one of their whole wings was threatened with complete annihilation. During the height of this great battle many of the Glandelinians were surged heavily against the solid unbroken christian line though they were mowed down in frightful numbers by the chain of christian batteries. General Salamander on the side of the foe in leading his three million men against the christian front fell into a trap and threatened with annihilation was compelled to surrender to general Humancher one of the main christian commanders who with 10,900,000 men had been engaging him.

However this terrible blow did not daunt the main Glandelinian forces who charged upon the christian line and retreated, annihilating a christian which pursued them and destroyed many more divisions during a rally. The highest fury of the battle was seldom heard for a thousand miles and as the mighty christian forces counter charged the main forces of the foe had made a pretense of retreat, and then rallied slaughtering so many divisions of the christians that again they rallied the Glandelinians as before said throwing the whole of general Vivian's line back in confusion the engagement very frequently having been fought at close quarters with bayonets pike and weapons of all descriptions.

However however though the foe was apparently victorious along all points of the christian line under general Vivian the Glandelinians failed seemingly under any conditions to force the christian line under general Roswell Buster Johnston who gave frantic commands to the generals who took his place from his headquarters to hold their ground at all costs. Of course Roswell and even his officers directing their desperate fighting lines did not know that general Vivian's whole army had been cut out from its two lines of positions and that three armies were desperately standing their ground against the fury stricken Glandelinians.

THE CONCLUSION OF THE BATTLE, AND HOW GENERAL VIVIAN WON. AND THE ROUT OF THE WHOLE GLANDELINIAN ARMY.

But nevertheless they felt a strong foe forboding of evil somehow and neither one of the great generals did not think it wise to allow the Vivian Girls to remain in this region any longer. General Roswell issued orders for their immediate withdrawal from his headquarters commanding that ten thousand cavalry men to march out them out of the zone of danger. Evans of course was to go with them. Indeed his instructions was carried out as swiftly as possible for the soldiers did not want the dear little darlings of the nation to be taken by the enemy under any conditions whatever, and turned over to their wicked brother German in Vivian. Violet and her sisters were helped with their crutches while Mr. Evans limped out of the line and was helped to dress himself.

They had heard the terrible noise of the battle all the time and yet Violet and her sisters felt some way that there was no need of fleeing fleeing for they believed that the enemy would never force the enemy's line lines that the enemy would never force the christian lines under Johnston and indeed they were tremendously wrong for Hanson Logan led exhausted all his reserves and the enemy was all that depended on the stand of Roswell Gusterson Johnston's lines to save general Vivians line from defeat was the winning of the battle along his point and that it also depended fully upon the safety of the Vivian girls and their guardian Evans.

HANSON MOVES TO FLANK GENERAL VIVIAN'S ASSAILANTS. HE ALSO CAPTURES A PORTION OF THE ENEMY'S LINES OF POSITION IN THE LOCATIONS OF NORMA'S BRIDGE.

Hanson all that morning had heard the tremendous din of the battle and wondered indeed what it all could mean for it was unusual and foreboding, and why did the enemy assault his brothers lines and pass him by completely? He decided to find out right away and went out scouting himself with a party of generals. What he saw indeed surprised him... beyond description. Mc-Holleston Phelan had exhausted most of his army, the entire force which he had thrown against general Vivians lines thus leaving small garrisoned forces to defend the fortifications. He had also seen that general Vivians lines had been rolled back for two miles from their works and almost annihilated, the survivors being in terrible confusion, saw the brave but now unsuccessful stand of Roswell Gusterson Johnston's army and hit upon a plan immediately.

"If quick enough I can rush my forces between the enemy and their fortifications, and sent large force to take their fortifications and flank my brothers assailants at the same time." He said to himself and wheeling his horse he dashed quickly to the lines followed by the party of general's generals with him. All of his best officers were ready, and to them he told what he had seen laying out his plans. Most of the officers however dreaded that the enemy's numbers was superior to Hanson's, that the battle was already lost and so did not agree, but nevertheless Hanson declared that whether they agreed or not he was not going to let no opportunity slip by whatever, and that he was going to follow out his plans at whatever cost. He even stated the danger general Vivian's lines was in, and to prove it he went out again taking them with him and showing them the situation. Even from where they were scores of leagues from the christian line under general Vivian the roar of battle was terrific and then Gertrude Angeline herself who had finally escaped the enemy's clutches at Julio Gallo and who was now with Hanson in her girl scout uniform rode up to general Hanson she herself having been out scouting alone and having observed the same terrible situation.

Gertrude Angeline's decision over the situation.

"I have observed all that's been going on and though I doubt if the enemy can carry those redoubts under Roswell Gusterson Johnston, I'm surely afraid that they glandelinians can and will annihilate them." She said saluting; "Just see how the glandelinians and christians are firing."

"Maybe it can be done without annihilating them if time enough is given though it is risky work." Said Hanson. "The poor fellows are continually dropping in hundreds of thousands, though the survivors seem undaunted. But it will take hours yet to force them, and any way I'm going to give the enemy a little surprise of my own."

General Hanson in fact had the same doubts that these many divisions of glandelinians were under such a murderous fire could be repulsed by the desperate desperate christian defenders for he had seen that general Shields having almost annihilated and forced general Vivian's lines, had sent other divisions from his own right to aid those assaulting Roswell's, these glandelinians being under general Camillian, with seven other divisions under general Sanderson which were attacking in three long lines far deep moving across the wide shell torn fields, while large divisions of general Logan's men were posted with seven battalions of artillery. Hanson Logan had more men than General Camillian, with the general Aronburg, and though these generals had escaped the enemy their forces were annihilated, and though the red and purple coated christians along the rest of Roswell's lines went down like the leaves in a forest during a typhoon the glandelinians fell just as fast and for every christian column going down a forevery division of glandelinians going to pieces both sides together yelled like demons.

Hanson had seen that Aronburg had been in the lead of his first brigade, his gallant manner having filled his men with greater nerve every time his men were giving way and again and again so many scores of avenues were plowed in the enemy's ranks that Hanson had been appalled. General Hanson with the rest had already seen that general Vivians lines had been cut to pieces and that the survivors were giving away at all points, and Gertrude alone agreeing with Hanson's plans the great general going back to his lines rode up to general Charles Brown who had struck such a terrible blow against the glandelinians at Omondson and said;

"The glandelinians are annihilating and hard pressing the whole of general Vivians lines, though since the attack began they had held their ground for four hours. You know my plans and I want them executed executed well done. You take about two quarters of my army and like an avalanche descend upon the enemy's rear while I will assail the fortifications." "I'll attend to the divisions under Phelan and Mc-Holleston and I'll leave Roswell's Phelan and as I know of your ability of winning Omondson I depend fully upon you to crush the enemy assailing my brother general Vivian and annihilate the glandelinians if possible."

BROWN ADVANCES HIS FORCE'S TO STRIKE THE ENEMY'S REAR REAR.

General Brown immediately cast a scout in the direction of the enemy's army and galloped off, and taking some command of two quarters of Hanson's army as directed ordered them forward swiftly to general Vivians rescue and to strike the apparently victorious enemy on the main flank.

All this while general Vivian's few survivors were retiring in panic and confusion when reinforcements reached them and then some of their shattered columns tried to rally opening a withering fire upon the advancing enemy.

"FORWARD. FORWARD." Was Brown's command being bound to crush the enemy at all hazards. "Forward charge. We must strike their rear as quick as possible before it is too late."

All the while Brown's men were advancing he could see the engagement with Roswell Gusterson Johnston's christian line the enemy still attacking them with great fury. He saw that overwhelming columns of the enemy were pressing on the fearful struggle increasing furiously the battle here having been in full sway for over five hours, he could also see that the christians were managing to hold on for a very good reason indeed. The christian columns were in possession of a series of long stone walls which the enemy were striving with all their demon like fury to capture and on two sides of the stone walls the dead and wounded glandelinians lay in high piles or windrows, and streams of blood was visible on the stone masonry. The struggle as he saw was something fearful along these stone walls every minute scores of thousands of glandelinians having fallen, the glandelinian generals bringing many monstrous divisions again and again against these positions and at times to Brown's view the whole scene would become wreathed in smoke.

BROWN'S DESPERATE ASSAULT BEGINS.

He saw despite all the havoc that the enemy did not give way, but retained to their assault, keeping up their murderous attack without pausing, and time and again he saw fresh forces of christians swarm to the aid of the depleted ones defending the stone walls. Brown realized indeed that Roswell Gusterson Johnston's generals was having it all in their own hands and wondered why there was such a strong concentration of glandelinians upon that position, as he saw fresh divisions arriving continually, thinning the christian reinforcements terribly and galloping over to Gertrude who was going along with him to watch the proceedings.

he asked;

"Well do you see how the battle goes there Gertrude?"
 "Pretty serious n." Answered Gertrude with a shake of her pretty head.
 "Put is it quite dangerous. General Roswell Buster Johnston had sent over twenty brigades recently to make a counter charge as I heard and they never came back. Oh it is terrible the annihilation of whole divisions. And I know the reason there is such a strong concentration. Roswell has the Vivian girls under his protection and the enemy are exerting his utmost to force the christian lines and get them if possible. Roswell Buster Johnston is even wounded."

"Well if that is the case I wonder if it would be better to throw a good portion of my line forward against Roswell's assailants at the same time?" Said Brown. "If you my little girl friend agree I'll give the order. The poor Vivian girls must be saved you know."
 "Yes." Said Gertrude Angeline. "It would be a good thing to storm their flank before they force Roswell's lines. If they do Hanson's plans will be disastrous to him, and probably cause his army to meet destruction than success."
 Brown sent the word all along the line to fix bayonets and giving the officers instructions he screamed;
 "FORWARD" And in fifteen minutes one quarter of the line was rushing toward the enemy like a monstrous thundering surge. Scores of shells from the christian volleys burst among their columns but little damage was done and as the christian cannoners saw them coming they withdrew their cannons further back increasing the fury of their artillery upon the assailants decimating whole columns.

However the foremost Landolinians saw the flankers coming and poured a fire that committed such havoc that it horrified Gertrude Angeline and a general Brown, and which now increased as the Angelinians came within full range, but as Brown feared that to retreat would mean disaster, he ordered the charge to continue, while advancing the rest of the force at the same time.

"We when you get near open fire." Shouted the christian officers at the top of their voices and signaling the order as it was unheard above the din. The Angelinians soon came within full range of the Landolinian infantry, and though the purple coats began to drop in such frightful numbers that it seemed as if they were falling down the survivors pressed on gallantly, but as whole columns went down Brown became horrified, but now as the Angelinians were within easy musket shot range they opened fire themselves and now the whole scene seemed to have broken out like a vast inferno, a scene more terrific than the worst damned hell. Whole lines in gray seemed to go down amid the bloody chaos, the gray columns being thrown into confusion, and as the Angelinians paved the ground with dead and wounded Landolinians Roswell Buster Johnston's generals who saw the occurrence, sent large forces to crush the panic stricken Landolinians and these crashed upon Pandemoniums of confused graycoats hurling them back against the christians assailing them in the rear. Gertrude saw the swiftly approaching overwhelming numbers and said to general Brown;
 "I believe we can hold them there for a while now so I will sent for general Camillia or Henry Darger Camillia and Fallon Brown to advance their forces upon general Vivian's assailants."
 "No! I'll do it you stay out of the danger zone." Commanded Brown warningly. And he at once dispatched a messenger with these instructions,

TO GENERAL CAMILLIA AND FALLON BROWN:

Have assailed the enemy's flank assailing general Roswell Buster Johnston's lines; and have thrown them into confusion. So now is your chance to advance your large forces to the rescue of general Vivian's lines, which have been almost wiped out and the few survivors driven back. We are overwhelming the enemy at Elisha's Run, and amid fearful firing and great carnage have vanquished the foe. Get your forces into immediate action.

GENERAL CHARLES BROWN.

In the meantime a luck would have it Fallon was advancing with fourteen divisions and twenty brigades toward the locations mentioned and seeing through his glasses that Brown was winning his advantage over Roswell's assailants was resolved to see that he should keep it and threw all his forces against general Vivian's assailants striking a terrible blow on the Landolinian flank. The Landolinians were thrown into confusion and fell back into a panic the Angelinians pressing hard after them. The sudden unexpected blow struck by Hanson's three armies, and the sudden and gradual rallying of the christian columns under generals Sherman Johnston and his brother Shuvanna filled Shields with amazement, and seeing his own divisions now now threatened with annihilation he begged Mc- the two Mc-Hollisters to watch out for their armies sending this note to one of them by wireless;

7-222

"TO GENERAL PHILAN MC-HOLLESTER: ::

I'm completely outnumbered ten to one by the Angelinians, having general's general Vivian's routed but rallied commands in front of me and Hanson's army striking fiercely against my flank and must have heavy reinforcements or the battle and woman's Run is lost. I cannot repel such heavy forces with success and must have success. Please hurry.
 GENERAL NOLAN SHIELDS."

Sherman with his seven million men had moved on to take the place of the shattered divisions divisions on general Vivian's right and general Shields seeing the grand advance of Sherman's fresh columns decided to fall back through the gauntlet, and sounded the word, but the Angelinian commanders realized his purpose, and while the Landolinian columns were called by a withering fire that wiped out monstrous masses at every sweep they dominated every avenue and advantage of retreat with a horrifying drum-drum-fire of every kind of artillery.

GENERAL VIVIAN'S ARMY RALLIES AND REFORMS. SHIELDS DISADVANTAGE AT BEING PLACED BETWEEN THREE FIRES OR INFILADED AS IT GOES.

General Vivian's lines had been retiring toward Gracie Run, while from a high rise of Ground Gertrude could now see the brilliant advance of Sherman's divisions, his troops which were swarming across Elisha's Run at a mad charge, five million of them sweeping toward general Walter Brown's retiring Landolinians under the support of an annihilating shell fire of Bicknell's cannon which was pouring a murderous fire at every point.

"Those Abheannians are certainly advancing in grand array." She thought thought to herself. "And most of those Abheannians are Concentinians and Calverinians, those furious Calverinians whom when once they started nothing can stop, not even an annihilating fire. And indeed Brown's Landolinians do not want to encounter such heavy numbers of Calverinians and Concentinians and in retiring across Hogann's lanes much against Shields will. Hanson's plan has turned out wonderfully. The enemy are caught between three fires and Shields is wounded."

In the meantime general Henry Darger Camillia saw this incident and despite the wild protests of his staff decided to advance his unflanked Omi Omi forces and he immediately ordered the onward rush for Hogann's Lanes.

"We must check the advance of those christian dogs, for if we hold back they will over-run our lines and will make them think we are afraid to fight when outflanked as we are. I intend to check them despite the odds."
 He then wrote this note to general Phelan Mc-Holleston;

"YOUR EXCELLENCY; GENERAL PHILAN MC-HOLLESTER:

Big counter advance of Sherman's christian dogs, mostly Concentinians and Calverinians, the fiercest Abheannian fighters there are in the dog-gasted christian armies. It will be entirely unwise for you to advance your forces any further, and if you do all is lost, as the whole of Shields' lines in outflanked, crushed, placed between three fires, thrown into confusion, and threatened with annihilation. Shields is dangerously wounded, Brown's Landolinians are falling back at the loss of their own leader who is killed and so is Shields. They cannot hold and so I am going to their rescue and probably my death, as the carnage is now

IS indiscriminately fierce, terrific, and inconceivably horrible in all its scenes of vast spread carnage and destruction. I'm never the less bound to prevent general Vivian from rallying.

GENERAL CAMMILLIAN.

Then with sixteen million two hundred and fifty thousand men Cammillian advanced against Shoemans advancing right grand division, his movements covered by almost frightful cannonade of the captured cannon which tore columns of the advancing christians into fragments, fearful musket volleys adding to the carnage, and Browns landelinians began to rally. Cammillians landelinians now as they assailed the christian columns with the greatest violence and vehemence forcing their main columns back by the fury of their immense impact, but nevertheless the rest of the christian columns held their ground stubbornly, obstinately, every man fighting with devilish fury, until they were all annihilated, the struggle all along the main line being more fearful than the other four hours carnage.

WILL BROWNS OLANDELINIANS WIN!

Browns massive lines had broken into fierce reaction with redoubled fury as soon as his men had been rallied, and though they were mowed down like windrows of grain, divisions after divisions of Angelinians, Salverinians, Continentinians and Abbeannians rushed forward, into the frightful storm but the rallied Olandelinians unconscious of the strength of the Abbeannians forces attacking them and the flank of the other Olandelinian forces did not give way and soon the whole region became like a hell storm of maddened demons fighting each other, but soon a portion of Browns landelinians fighting behind a regular wall of dead purple coats were borne away in the pressure of the onrushing christian line. The advance of the christian forces under general Shuvannia was also furiously repelled by Browns landelinians the ground being strewn with dead and wounded to a depth of several feet, and as the fighting became more terrific and persistent Brown was still determined to hold his assailants back at all costs.

The christian officers themselves were doing all they could to keep up the courage of their men, keeping the flags waving, and exposing the cruelties among them. Indeed the Abbeannians were a holy terror to the desperate Olandelinians, a regular yellow jackets nest for the Olandelinian fog, but the Olandelinians proved themselves to be the fire and smoke, the landelinians being aroused by their demon yell and as more and more troops arrived showing that general Vivians lines were rallying the Olandelinians themselves soon met at the onset of bullets which mowed down many sections of men. They even stormed the landelinian columns with the greatest fury, driving whole divisions back crushed and mangled and torn, but the rest of the landelinian columns countercharged to revenge it and the battle raged with still greater fury. Browns gray line held all right, but like enraged mobs the Angelinians rushed on furiously and finally crushed and almost wiped out Browns men and drove the survivors back in terrible confusion cutting down their few ranks and routing them. All this while Cammillians whole line kept up a ravaging ravaging fire of the greatest intensity, but the surviving christians increased the fury of their onslaught pressing Camm Cammillians right grand division back pouring an annihilating fire upon the Olandelinians.

CAMMILLIANS VAIN DESPERATE EFFORTS TO HOLD HIS GROUND.

Shoeman's orders were bound to carry all before him if it cost even his own life, the fury of the battle having increased minute by minute with appalling fluffy hundreds of gaps appearing in the christian lines as fast as they were closed, but nevertheless from the driving fury of the attack hundreds of thousands of the Olandelinians were driven back and their many dead and wounded lay all around. Windrows-General Cammillian saw this confusion among his hordes of Olandelinians and gave the word along his lines: "FIX BAYONETS".

7-223

The whole line fixed bayonets almost simultaneously and as the christians crashed down upon his lines they met a bristling wall of bayonets. But by this time the flankers flankers had started to carry all before them and now that Shoeman was rallying large parts of general Vivian's line the Olandelinians became disheartened. Cammillian saw all this, and also saw the force of christians creeping upon general Browns flank.

"This must not be," he said to himself. "If in such danger why don't that foul of a Brown notify me so that I can reinforce him here." Just at that moment when the christian flankers were carrying all before them the first two messengers reached the two Mc-Hollester generals.

"We cannot send reinforcements as we have all we can do ourselves." The two great Olandelinian generals said; "But go tell general Mebie to train all his cannon on the christian dogs flank flanking Browns Mebie alone is inactive. Hurry before it is too late."

The soldier hastened to obey but he was too late. A merciless cannon fire was cutting down Browns men like grass, from two sides and Browns men recoiled recoiled the Angelinians pressing down upon them though suffering fearful losses in the men meanwhile. Ricknells great christian divisions also charged, with the fury of titans, increasing the fearful struggle to redoubled fury, and finally carrying all before them, and the whole gray line being caught between two fire was being driven completely from the field, in the wildest confusion ever seen among men before. During the action Ricknell had received heavy reinforcements, and so had Shoeman who had withdrawn his shattered center, to better ground during the fighting, and now heavily reinforced he advanced his right grand division across Danioannas run where he had placed a long chain of cannon in concealment which had covered his terrific onslaught.

Hanson had indeed accomplished his purpose, the assailants having been outfanked and routed, and he himself had seized the fortifications taking all the Olandelinians there as prisoners. At one thirty general Vivian having rallied his whole shattered force, planned to counter attack the enemy immediately, but Hanson's officers declared that though Hanson had captured the Olandelinian fortifications at Norman Run it did not mean that the battle was won yet, that the enemy's center itself was strengthened and reinforced, and that it would be useless to attack them just now.

"Why not deplete the Olandelinian force further and then crush Mc-Hollester, right wing?" Asked one of the officers.

"But that wing is too stringly placed," answered general Vivian sadly. "We hold the advantage of defense by being on high ground with our right wing entrenched in the wheatfields, guarding a line of batteries, but all that could not crush the Olandelinian right wing."

"Well then why not be completely on the defensive then as before?" Said general Brown. "We got to do something before the battle resumes again. Their left is more stronger than their center in numbers, and the right wing is the only one I depend upon as the only chance of success."

"I'll remain on the defensive then," said general Vivian. "We may as well repel all the other attacks, until the opportunity to attack ourselves comes."

Seeing that most of the officers agreed he determined to be on the defensive his whole line having reformed to meet the next onslaught of the enemy, but no signs of an approaching attack came. However there was strange action among the enemy, which made the Angelinians think that the attack was coming, but still nothing happened though the Olandelinians were in constant motion. Gertrude watched all this through her glasses, and declared that it was the arrival of reinforcements her messenger reporting this to general Vivian.

"I wonder why they don't attack?" She wondered to herself. An hour passed since the terrible rout, and then the attack came and on Ricknells line at that. In a few minutes the struggle was as fearful as it had been before, the Angelinians meeting the Olandelinians with titanic fury causing the enemy no more frightful losses. The agonizing conflict within another hour had extended along the whole christian line the Olandelinians charging against the christians in the most frightful numbers, the struggle raging with unabated fury, and then from her point of observation, Gertrude noticed that Ricknell's whole line was crushed to fragments the few survivors being pressed backwards , and being determined that general Vivian was to hold his ground this time and seeing that the men were going down in thousands, she notified general Brown who galloped over to his force for aid and once more ordered them forward on the double quick against the assailants. His whole christian line advanced in solid columns in the formation of long wedges, and yet when they neared the scene of carnage, they saw that millions of trees were cut by bullets, and everything was in wreck and wreckage from the terrible rain of shells and explosives. Indeed the brave Glandelinians were attacking with indescribably fury upon the christian line, but Brown soon reinforced Picknell, and who soon held the Glandelinians in check.

Reinforced still more the christians now held more stubbornly mowing the enemy down in hundreds of ranks. It was a frightful scene for General Brown and she hid her face in her hands. All the central divisions began to press forward the struggle became fiercer fifteen million muskets and scores of thousands of cannon already being in action on the christian side which dissolved whole myriads of the unfortunate Glandelinians every minute. The enemy now began to recoil again having made all the desperate attempts ever mustered, to force the christian lines, but had been again driven back with the most severe losses, indiscriminately terrible. It was now over entirely along this part of the line, but meantime five million Glandelinians under General Sam and under Robert Campdenakis stormed Brown's main line where maneuvering furiously they managed to surround and infiltrate his army. Division after division of the Glandelinians were sent back with three quarters of their numbers shot and cut down, and reinforcements arriving to Brown's assistance, General Sam's army was caught between two murderous fires, and compelled to fall back, the losses of the Glandelinians being awful.

A scene of more frightful slaughter was along General's lines, of 9,999,000 Angelinians under the main command of general Joseph Heller who as he proved at Omondosson and other great battles, was not only a brave man, but his earlier lines situated on a slightly rising slope, and far apart the others and above each other a considerable height at least, so that when firing they would not hit the men in front of them finally stormed with a fire as the Glandelinians came rushing up like frenzied multi multitudes that devastated their columns.

THE PROGRESS OF THE WILD BATTLE AND ITS SURPASSING HORRORS.

General Logannia led seven hundred thousand up the shell swept sides though scores of thousands up upon scores of thousands were fairly torn down and as the survivors continued on up the slope, the main divisions of the Glandelinians suffered the most and became mangled suffering the most frightful losses, but nevertheless the main columns getting nearer and nearer, kept up the fury of the struggle without any intermission at all. In two hours division after division reached the summit only to be annihilated, and now as the few survivors reached the Angelinians counts charged like a thundering howling avalanche carrying all before them and devastating whole columns by the score. However general Logannia was still undaunted and receiving more reinforcements he rested for thirty minutes and though a whole multitude of his ranks were mowed down he again advanced to the charge. Indeed his losses were stupendous but nevertheless his surviving columns pressed on up the slope as fast as they could charge facing indeed an indescribable death dealing storm of volleys, that scathed their main line.

For four hours the fury of the struggle had increased with the most redoubled fury, the Angelinians under a general named Heller without intermission keeping up an annihilating fire and officers on the side of the poor Glandelinians went down by the score.

The slopes were completely obscured in the bodies of the dead and wounded Glandelinians and all the widely scattered trees on the sides of the slopes resembled hickory brooms. All the brave Angelinians were lying down, standing up behind him behind countless trees, or behind ledges of rocks and boulders and they kept up a fearful fire from this defense ravaging the Glandelinian forces fearfully. But nevertheless the Glandelinians kept up the attack, having rocks, boulders and trees as a fire from behind themselves but in due time as more troops came to support Heller's aid used their musketry with frightful bloodcurdling effect cutting masses of the assailants down. Logannia fell mortally wounded and as more and more divisions arrived the firing became so fierce that even all the dead and wounded were dreadfully cut up. A large portion of general Heller's men had defended themselves behind a long wooden fence or embankment three feet high, but the attacking enemy had poured a fire from so close to the side and back the boards that they looked like hickory brooms and many of the boards you could even see through, and all the defense defenders were annihilated. Not an Angelinian lived to tell the tale here but now as the christian batteries were roaring in greater fury the gray lines once more started to waver, as the frightful aspects of the hundreds of thousands who were riddled by bullets unnumbered them.

Hundreds of thousands of the Glandelinians were closest to the christian works who had their ears, arms and legs almost cut away by shell fragments, and so frightful ly dense had the smoke been from the incessant fire of cannon and musketry that it had fully coated the uniforms quite thickly.

However this time the Angelinians did not dare follow the retreating Glandelinians but remained where they were, appalled at the sight of so many hanging dead. Yet the fiercer attack was not over for General's divisions reinforced these retreating columns heavily and the Angelinians did not even have the time to clear away the wounded of their own, when the heavy Glandelinian columns again advanced to the attack and it was seen this time that the enemy was advancing in overwhelming numbers, yelling like devils as they came on. Several several big batteries of machine guns had been brought up during the lull and now opened fire upon the furiously attacking Glandelinians with double charges of canister and grape all the other cannoners also were serving at their guns opening fire with an effect that was destructive and terrific, ravaging the gray line as through and through.

But yet rushing up like wild beasts the Glandelinian assailants came on the artillery now bringing them down faster than any fire opened on them before.

Hundreds of thousands of Glandelinians rushed from shattering trees to shattering trees, and from boulder to boulder, firing in their return, and though thousands fell dead or wounded seemingly at every rush the survivors came nearer and nearer while the whole slope was like a volcano in eruption from the din of the firing. The main line of the Glandelinian columns made an attack that was repelled stubbornly by the christians but the resistance by the christians and their appalling losses only enraged the Glandelinians who were not disheartened and they redoubled their exertions though they went down in masses at each discharge. But yet as the Glandelinian forces went to pieces in the face of this incessant fire they continued the attack passing thousands of the wounded christians and prisoners to revenge the stubborn resistance they met.

The Angelinians now made a fierce counter charge shattering the gray line once more and routing it with frightful loss, yet the furious Glandelinians only rallied and yelling like millions of devils crashed upon the Angelinians causing a frightful massacre. This time in the order christians were demoralized, the generals doing their best to rally the Angelinian columns, whose men were falling in hundreds being badly mixed up and like panic stricken mobs. But despite all the efforts of the officers they retired in confusion up the hill the enemy pressing after though the cannoners poured deafening broad sides human upon the shrieking human fiends driving them back again with frightful slaughter to be horrible to be described.

The other christian columns now had time to rally, while the fresh divisions moved on up the hill the enemy again making a storming attack the whole gray line rushing once more up the sides of the hills, the battle being three times as fierce as before, and increasing every fifteen minutes with redoubled fury. All of the many Glandelinian columns were engaged but all of the confused christian divisions were now rallied and they poured a most horrible storm of musketry and the slaughter now really became terrific but yet the Angelinians despite their thrust trust in God were being forced to yield their ground inch by inch the sides of the hills being heaped with dead and wounded Angelinians and indeed the dead and wounded Angelinians were lying thicker than the gray coats now.

THE WICKED GLANDELINIAN DEFY GOD.

During the action general Vivian had learned from his messengers that the wicked Glandelinian generals had declared that God himself could never take their christian enemies win, and declared that the christians always remain on the defensive because they were afraid to attack the Glandelinian armies themselves for fear of being annihilated. This wicked assault insulted and enraged general Vivian and alarmed him also and he had nevertheless before planned to attack the enemy's lines and drag the enemy's other wings into the open and smash them up. It was awful to commit such a massacre but general Vivian was determined to win the battle at whatever costs--- and the Glandelinian assault now having been repulsed at every point, over 17,000,000 were ordered forward against the main Glandelinian center and all these columns in many deployed brigades, with their already badly torn battle flags flying marched forward to the right of general Vivian's entire line and then rushed on in formidable array toward the main Glandelinian center. The Glandelinian cannon were continually volleying and mauling the whole of the batteries of the Glandelinian cannon becoming one long line of flame and fire. General Vivian was dismayed at the horrible slaughter for his men were going down in massive lines, but yet he was not daunted, and hurt by the recent wicked words of the Glandelinian generals, he determined to show them whether he was afraid to make a general attack or not, and continually sent large reinforcing columns forward to aid the assaulting lines, which were being shattered, or decimated by the Glandelinian artillery.....

THE RESULT OF GENERAL VIVIAN'S DESPERATE ASSAULT..... BRIDGING ABOVE THE ENEMY'S LINES.

Through his glasses he could see that the main line of the Glandelinian batteries had been placed on an extensive high plateau, and which were now raining shells like hell-fire upon the lost souls and that also many of his various and largest divisions seemed to melt away. The whole Glandelinian front was in a preternatural uproar, and became almost obscured in long wreaths of smoke. Indeed as this was now the final issue of the battle, the Glandelinians were repelling the unexpected christian assault with all their energy of despair, and with the fury of desperation and general Vivian began to have doubts if all his combined christian forces could be able to carry the wicked Glandelinians before them. So he sent scores upon scores of messengers to the christian officers with the orders to advance the main christian forces at once, and even the reserves.

The open ground which the other christian columns were pouring across like floods of purple weeds seemed dominated by the many Glandelinian guns, and never did infuriated cannibals yell so horribly as the distant Glandelinians as they set up a universal cry of derision while maintaining a murderous fire, which tore many great gaps in the christian lines, galling their cool columns and appalling their survivors..... across this wide open ground worse and more dangerous than a thousand No Man's lands, and drive the almost insane Glandelinians from the horns which they had held so stubbornly during the entire war up to this scene, was the hardest problem before general Vivian.

He discovered that it manifestly was impossible to cross in the face of the furious Glandelinian army under such a murderous fire, which was firing frightfully annihilating. All the mightiest forces endeavoring to sweep across were almost destroyed, so he made a most conspicuous preparation.

preparations had been made for bridging above the enemy's line early that morning and indeed it had taken a long while before the attention of the Glandelinian generals was attracted to that one point. Then large forces of the christians by two columns crossed quickly by the bridge and in half an hour his entire half of the army was practically placed on the south and then north of the Glandelinian army before the herculean feat was known to the Glandelinians. Mc-Hollester found himself in a tickless position and under two general fires of great intensity. He still held Norma Run despite his fortifications being in the hands of Hanson's army, but the strong christian advance not only threatened to hammer his lines to pieces, crush his flanks, and smash up his lines of batteries, but his communications with all his base of supplies at the south was cut off.....

MC-HOLLESTER PRELAYS WITHDRAWAL FROM NORMA RUN FAILS TO END THE MIGHTY CONFLICT.....

Therefore he was compelled to evacuate the Norma Run region, but never nevertheless though severely wounded, and his army badly cut up from its frightful losses, foolish general Shields would not yield his ground and his surviving troops fought like an army of fiends, the battle surging back and forth once more in a bloody fury that was indeed horrible..... A squadron of one hundred thousand cowardly men, met nine hundred thousand christian Glandelinian dragoons, which during a hell of carnage at close quarters, for a quarter of an hour was driven back onto supporting infantry, crashed and mangled, the christians stubbornly pressing on. Simultaneously and a million cannon like roar of firearms a neighboring point of Shields' lines, was attacked by an overwhelming force of Abissinians, and thrown into great confusion and the Glandelinian left was about to crush and crush away before heavy odds, when heavy reinforcements suddenly arriving beat back the christian forces right and left a sea of dead and wounded lying thickly strewn about everywhere.

Assisting forces sent by Shields arrived about two thirty to late to be of any service in mending the original success, and a new and heavy concentration of christian troops drove back these furiously advancing Glandelinian troops crushing them to fragments. All this while general Vivian's best opportunity was coming, for a big gap three miles long existed between Shields on his right and Mc-Hollenberry on his extreme left and an overwhelming force of attacking christian cavalry divisions supported by nine batteries of artillery and dragoons was thrown into this gap or unoccupied space, while in the meanwhile a simultaneous overwhelming assault of the most hellish fury, was maintained on Shield's main center, and success hovered between the contending forces. A large division of general Vivian's corps was driven back under a raining storm of christian artillery fire by Rowels a Glandelinian. Sanguine also arriving in heavy force to the assistance of the successful and though heaven seemed to be venting its rage and vengeance on the Glandelinians, the infuriated Glandelinian columns showed that they could return vengeance ten fold by pouring in a fire that almost desolated the christian line and slew their two commanding generals. Toney Sanguine with his storm of hell, and despite the death of his two general generals turned the tide of battle nevertheless against a reinforcing divisions of Glandelinians, moving down thousands all along the line, and routing the survivors to all points of the compass.....

Simultaneously many other Glandelinians under a murderous annihilating fire were trying to crush down their christian assailants, when fresh troops took a hand in matters and after a massacre of hell and fury, the christians were also successful here, capturing all the Glandelinians who were not shot down in the ambush. The fighting was still more bloody on the southern end of Shields' lines, near near Chickadees and Vivian's Run than the other points, general Vivian having forced the movements of the furious battle to the left and did not see the advisability of lessening his attacks against the main Glandelinian front under any conditions.

At the point unoccupied by the christians the Angelinians had rushed in trying with all their might and energy to demolish the right wing of the Landelinian army, and catch it catching the Landelinian left flank forcing the whole column into an ambush ambuscade, and the main Landelinian force being hard pressed on the left and right were driven out of their works and sent scurrying for shelter. General Avian had sent assaulting columns simultaneously in close succession from the west and when wheeling these swept the Landelinian front like the sea does the ship in a typhoon and this terrible assaulting advance was so far to the north and west that only the divisions at the left of the assaulting column touched the Landelinian breastworks under the personal command of general Francis Santa Anna Schmidt.

Here though it was like a mighty wave dashing itself to pieces against a breakwater, the main christian column however came up in time and though again the whole scene was like the dashing of a monstrous wave on the breakwater which hurled back in small spray what but was the solid sea, the shattered line was again reinforced and the Landelinian reserves which arrived too late to be of any assistance were crushed to fragments and their commanding generals Bernard Juma Helms with his assisting commander Mc-Hollester Randolph were killed. Indeed general Avian had gained a very valuable position and general Hanson himself with much of his remaining columns wheeled around Mc-Hollester's flank and sought to take his Landelinian columns in the rear while Mc-Hollester Randolph's Abbeannian forces engaged the breastworks. The christian advance was observed by the christian commanders who sent against the furious counter attacking Landelinians many brigades of general Patten Branstones divisions (in reserve) which however not only beat the counter assaulting Landelinians to a fighting position, but subjected these Landelinians to a fierce front and both main flanks, and these Landelinians were compelled to retire very hastily as was Randolph Johnston whose desperate stand had very little effect, despite overwhelming concentration on checking the christians, amid the horrible slaughter all along the line.

All this while Shoeman kept up a series of most furious advances on the main Landelinian front every one of which was completely successful. Phelan advancing nine hundred thousand men against the southern end of the Landelinian breastworks defended by the main column of Landelinians and Landelinians to troops received a serious resistance that surprised the defenders themselves. Hanson Brown came forward to meet the christian charge and after merciless carnage he was killed, and his force annihilated. Seventeen million men poured through the woods in parallel lines taking Phelan and David's Landelinians on the right and left flanks respectively dashing into the rear brigades of Minotaur and Woodruff Johnston's divisions crushing them to fragments, and crashing into St. Stanis who vainly endeavored to stem the tide of disaster but despite their most desperate efforts there was no stopping the flow of this torrent of confused men. All of Shields' surviving divisions being driven from the field as were Minotaur and the many other divisions, and Picknell shattering the right wing of the Landelinians turned to the south, and twenty five brigades that barred the way, were swept aside with terrible indiscriminate loss, and with their commanding generals slain. General Avian had turned general Shield's flank and reached his rear, and all about him the dead and wounded lay. Everywhere the attack was successful in the path of the christians except at Shield's center whose lines extended across Imperial Run, westward to a line of breastworks with which it made a right angle and here the rest of general Avian's force was hurled against the center, and for an hour a desperate hand to hand fighting all along the line the Angelinians pressed slowly onwards supported by reinforcements on the quick run, but nevertheless the Angelinians with their reinforcements were hurled back. But one quarter of the Landelinian center that had been disabled in less than an hour's fighting was apparently weakened, and so twice again the Landelinian center was assailed by general Avian, but no parts of the Landelinian positions were taken until the main left grand divisions as well as the right was subjected to attack and domination.

At three o'clock the third assault was made, the Angelinians were surging with irresistible fury and violence against and over the works. The defenders however were only in slow retreat and half an hour after a fresh division divisions carried a point on the northern section, but the success of the Angelinians for a time did not progress further, a desperate rally on the part of the Landelinians holding general Avian and Brown in check, then the approach of heavy and general reinforcements brought the severe christian success to an end for a while. There was a general quiet for an hour, but nevertheless general Phelan Mc-Hollester decided to make one more attempt to force the Norma bridge, hearing that Hanson had weakened his forces thereby withdrawing so much to attack his flank and now thought that an attack on him would be a success.

PHELAN MC-HOLLESTER FINDS THAT HANSON HAS TO GO WHERE AS A MILLION LIONS IN ONE.!!!

An hour was spent in hurried preparations and being in desperation as his army was between two fires general Mc-Hollester Phelan and Phelan Mc-Hollester, were a little filled with apprehension and decided to have their whole force or what remained remained of the assault the weakened christian lines at Norma Bridge, alas a christian line so weakened that afterwards he they repented of their foolhardy attack. The advance however did not start until four thirty five and in the meantime during the battle when general Avian had assaulted the foe after repulsing them after the attack and flanking movements all of Hanson's army excepting that which seized the fortifications had returned to the Norma bridge region and were well prepared for an attack, and on the slaughter that was to come, when the two Mc-Hollesters made the attack. With a yell of fury the whole line in gray swept forward expecting to meet a very feeble resistance. (Indeed a very --very feeble resistance indeed as to say) but suddenly met a frightful avalanche of destruction a fire which tore their entire massive main line into fragments, and laid the second main line. But on pressed the survivors in mighty multitudes, when all of a sudden a swaying undulating sheet of flame seemed to sweep the whole christian front, there was a titanic deafening roar enough to stun and deafen the world, and two whole massive lines in gray twenty miles long and ten deep deep withered before that annihilating fire. The survivors broke into an indescribable panic but the rest of the Landelinians were determined to carry the christian line even at the risk of annihilation, and so continued on furiously, but again and again and still again came that fearful flash of musketry and cannon which settled down into a steady mighty thunderous roar, this awful fire mowing down whole multitudes. Terrible indeed was the slaughter, the whole christian front even withering and almost melting away, the surviving Landelinians recoiling in panic before his terrific desolating fire.

But still the main line continued to press on despite the fact that the christians maintained the awful fire mowing down myriads of the Landelinians at every step. Other columns of the attack forces became confused by this murderous fire and broke into a panic, despite the threats, pleas, and commands of their officers who strove to rally them striving in vain to check their panicky retreat. General Mc-Hollester Phelan himself had twenty six horses shot under him and the fearful dreadful carnage, and one half of his staff were killed, the rest injured many seriously. As the main Landelinian surge drew close to the christian redoubts the veritable storm of firing became so horrible resembling the same firing at Marian Heights at Umanodonson during the battles there.

A TERRIBLE FIRE ALONG THE CHRISTIAN LINE, AND THE FRIGHTFUL AND DISASTEROUS REPULSE OF THE ENEMY.

In all its fury and din it seemed hell could not be worse and neither was it possible that the shrieks of the lost souls and demons in hell together could be as bad as the yell of the Angelinians and Abbeannians themselves as their whole entire line, yet their whole entire line broke into a full universal demon like yell. Then the whole entire christian line as the Landelinians waves surged upon it and closed with it suddenly roared like billions of cannons, seemed to suddenly flash torrents of sheeted fire and smoke and now it became a massacre not a battle.!!!!!!

Almost the entire left division of the blandelinian surge fairly dissolved away, officers began to drop like corn devastated by a tornado, the whole of Norma's gun was dominated by the horrible rattling, roaring, thundering hellstorm of shells, and just like at Osmundson but ten times more terrific and once more doomed to be venting his rage and fury and vengeance on the wicked blandelinians for the shocking horrors committed recently in July and the other places, and for their cruel treatment of Violet and her sisters.....

Thousands upon thousands of men ranks all along the line went down, all the blandelinian divisions were torn and shattered by the sheeted clouds of bursting shell barrages canister and bullet that like once more became avalanches of hell destruction and demented devastation, tearing through the main line crushing it into scattered fragments entirely, and mowing down hundreds of officers with them. The surviving scattered portions of what was once a whole main line of assault swayed, the cannons volleyed and thundered in titan throes, and with redoubled violence upon them and as the blandelinians swayed the whole christian line surged forward like the sea flooding the land and carried all before them routing the blandelinians in terrific confusion and panic.....

Indeed general Phelan Mc-Hollister saw that all his desperate attempts to break through the christian lines and under general Hanson was a failure. His best and strongest fortifications were in the possession of Hanson's mightiest army, and his own armies had been between two deadly fires since Hanson made his excellent flanking movement, and he was also in danger of being hemmed in by both the armies under generals Hanson and Vivian. He had stood it out well against the other christian troops despite the help of God shielding the christian dogs as he calls it but his magnificent stand against general Vivian and Hanson had only met with disastrous slaughter and his army along with general Shields was so terribly depleted that only fragments were left of the three blandelinian armies very little indeed that was left to oppose the christian armies which were still reinforcing continually.

THE FRIGHTFUL ROUT OF THE BLANDELINIAN ARMIES:
THE PANIC AMONG PHELAN MC-HOLLISTER'S ARMIES.....

Indeed his defiance of God as well as against the christian lines did not prove to him very much good. His armies had been vanquished by his christian enemies, and now there was nothing for him to do but to retreat from Norma's gun before the christian army would surround him and cut him off from escape entirely. This he started to do but so panic stricken was the blandelinians that the retreat became a stampeded rout southward toward Norma but not into the city as the onrushing christians cut them off entirely from Norma and taking possession of the city freeing 10,000,000 child slaves. The whole blandelinian army was in such confusion that nothing could check the rout. Never in any battle of the war did the blandelinian armies suffer such a disastrous rout. Accounterments of all descriptions, millions of firearms of all kinds, all their trains of munitions, munitions baggage and stores, including munitions works, and everything of desecrating description, besides 25,000 big knappt guns, 10,000 mortar and scores of other thousands of other artillery was abandoned by the panic stricken blandelinians who fled so precipitately that they did not even stop to set Norma's gun on fire which they had intended to do should the christians win the four days of fighting here. When the victorious christian armies came dashing into the city of Norma, the blandelinians still there lost all precautions, and fled in a stampede leaving Norma and straying the streets with hundreds of thousands of weapons which they threw away during their flight. The rout of the blandelinians had continued for twenty miles scores of thousands of the blandelinians who were overtaking surrendering themselves as prisoners of war and still many thousands of others dropping from over fatigue were captured.

War indeed has all its woes. Everywhere reports have been received by many of the christian generals of a series of a perfect storm of fire and disasters which were too terrible to describe. Fearful explosions had occurred by the thousands everywhere adding to the complication of disasters, and yet greater disasters were to occur. It was one night when the brave Vivian Girls had been out scouting to see if the enemy were up to anything new when they were attracted to a glow which appeared to be faint, but nevertheless was suspicious, and this glow appeared to be in the south, while strange noises raked the distant horizon..... Jennie looking in that direction with her army field glasses gave a sudden gasp, and then taking a second and a longer look almost straining her eyes in doing so exclaimed: "Goodness. What a disaster! A sea of fire is approaching us like the wind. It's another great forest fire....."

"Another forest fire?" cried Joise and Violet while they and their sisters began to feel a little uneasy. "Nonsense sister. Maybe it's only a burning village."

"See for yourselves then!" exclaimed Jennie vehemently. "It looks like a fierce forest fire to me." Joise first took the glasses and looked carefully in the southern direction or where ever the glow appeared to be. After wiping the glasses she took a second look and then handing it to Violet noticed her give a start as she handed the glasses to Angeline.

"Jennie dear you are too right at that." They said. "It don't look to us as if miles of forests were on fire though. It appears as if the whole world were on fire at one time. It is advancing either toward us or toward the christian lines." Her other sisters were taking turns at looking at the distant fire and then as Jennie looked in the glasses again Joise said: "A big city seems also to be on fire in the direction of the west, and another in the east. I believe the enemy have caused this horrible disaster." The little girls had also seen many red and blue flashes, followed by flashes of all colors, while all the time there was a queer far off sound that sounded quite uncanny.

"They must be a series of great explosions." said Jennie. "Sometimes I see something that look like the blast of volcanic eruptions." "We'd better tell any of the christian generals we come across immediately before it is too late." said the little girls.

In the meantime many of the christian generals had observed the strange reddening colors in the distant skies, but for a time did not pay much attention as if these kind of lights had been all too common to be taken much notice of, but when it grew darker and later the redness grew brighter and columns of flame lit smoke clouds thick and rolling extended upward as far as possible to be seen and looked very ominous, and very suspicious to all who observed it. The smoke shaped like sheeted pillars among pillars of rolling clouds let occasionally by the seething seas of fire below which at times made the sky glow like a lava flood. Three hours later it was observed that the smoke clouds which had been rising steadily was gradually coming much nearer, and was mingled with a vast black cloud which above the zenith formed out gradually like some great colossal umbrella, and all the smoke spread far above the great conflagration which was really advancing toward the christian lines. The awful wall of rolling clouds was crimson in hue below the canopy of blackness but the lower extremity of the smoke clouds was of a bright fiery color and glowed almost dazzlingly. At the southeastern section of the black clouds of various colors rose where the glow of fire seemed to be brighter, and the Angolinians were surprised to see that a sea of fire was traveling up the sides of one of the far distant hills, which at times when unobscured by the smoke clouds gave forth a dazzling glare. The christian generals excited, and apprehensive had mounted their horses, and with many men had went forth to investigate, and after traveling for half an hour they finally came to the summit of a high rise of ground which was thickly wooded, and saw that the advancing destruction had reached the main stretch of forests near the point of Laughing Brook, and in crossing the region had put all the telephone and telegraph systems out of existence, that bridges were burning by scores, and that the very iron frame work of greater bridges were bending and melting in the fierce heat.

The generals and the men with them were enthralled as they watched the approach of the great conflagration, and worse of all it was seen that the conflagration was a series of great fires each trying to outstride the other, the biggest burning in the west, and which extended as far as eye could reach. And the glare could be seen for sixty miles away.

The officers who watched the storm of hell approaching anticipated among each other that the height of the advancing sea of flames must be from thirteen hundred to fourteen hundred feet in width and nearly half as high. It was coming toward the christian army, and in a way that seemed inevitable of forcing a retreat, as to combat such a fire was impossible as it was entirely beyond control. To say the worse the conflagration did just what was feared. The conflagration which had been a series of fire in the gradually formed into one and expanded to a greater length burning all before it and a large part overlapped general civilians army, and though for four days his fire fighters offered battle to the flames as bravely as only the most heroic fire fighters can do, and using all means possible, nevertheless it was in vain the fire could not be stopped, and the whole christian army had to retreat and were encompassed by the fire storm many times before they finally reached a low level plain where there were no trees, and no grass with which the flames could feed upon. But here in the open there was danger of being assaulted unexpectedly by the fierce enemies. Many blazing seas of fire had appeared upon Hanson's army but it had by breaching the space between the conflagration had checked it long enough to enable the army to retreat without confusion though the main part of the conflagration had advanced with great speed elsewhere burning faster than a horse could run, the wind storm possessing the fires hurling a blizzard of blazing brands down into the wooded valleys between thus starting new fires anew, and endangering all villages and towns in the region causing hundreds of thousands to flee either on foot or by rail whichever way they managed to escape the destructive conflagration.

During the time while various christian armies were retreating before the forest fires, violet and her sisters who had went out on one of their scouting tours certainly had a thrilling time that no one would ever forget. They had heard and found out that the enemy by burning great dams had caused great floods adding to the destruction caused by the forest fires and notwithstanding all this had caused the most gigantic explosions of all known which blew everything in towns and villages to pieces. Wishing to see the extent of the damage done violet and her sisters with a large number of men and boy scouts had set out in a certain location and had only went a short distance in the darkness of the night which was still lighted by the glow of distant fires when the air was suddenly filled with the roar of dashing horses coming down the opposite side of the road, and straight for the christians and the little came dashing at a tearing speed a fierce horde of O Chaurians. At one word from colonel Gordon the soldiers scattered in different directions blazing away with their pistols and carbines bringing down ten glandelinians horses and riders together, but the glandelinians had also opened fire, being equally as surprised as they and the casualties on both sides was considerably heavy for the start. The civilian girls, with their friends, and Gertrude Angeline had wheeled their own horses, and for a moment stood at bay, and then raced down the road at a break neck speed. The glandelinians had recovered from the surprised relieved at the sudden volley of the christians, and the foremost who had reached the spot where violet and her sisters had halted before dashing away, saw the fugitives dashing down a bend in the road.

The glandelinians seeing how many Angeline's had scattered and as firing was still going on, suspected at first that they had run into an ambuscade, but recovering their nerve they opened fire on all sides, making the scene black like a furnace with the discharge of guns, while a certain number of the Mc-Hollistinians raced after the seven fugitive civilian girls, and the others with them. Violet and her sisters had in a moment reached a scene of different stages, but they dashed onto the pontoon bridge which they saw in the moonlight, and seeing that a hundred glandelinians were after them like hounds, they after crossing the bridge, started to work at breaking it by hurling rocks upon it, and had almost succeeded, but ten blood hounds had been let loose by the glandelinians, and while many of the glandelinians who had crossed the bridge and fell into the water were floundering in the stream, the bloodhounds had gained up with violet and her sisters who immediately drew their guns and prepared to shoot the dogs should they do any harm but the dogs, touched by God turned off without even harming a hair of the little girls. The glandelinians gave a yell at this and in their rage started firing with the intention of shooting the dogs, but their aim was poor and the bullets flew wild, the dogs escaping in the darkness of a thick woods. The other glandelinians had dashed through the stream wading water on horseback, and as they set up a simultaneous shot demanding the little girls to stop they recognized a voice that made them believe it was Braggard.

Violet and her sisters by this time had reached the other side of the Gertrude's river and soon as they had landed on firmer ground after swimming through shallow water, they saw swarming along the bank, a regiment of Gargolians all wearing hoods. It was their intention to intercept the little girls and cut them off from escape. At first it did seem as if the little girls were caught, for now to swim the river with so many glandelinians swarming in it would be as risky as to swim in quicksand. There happened however to be another bend in the stream which was free of the glandelinians and to this violet and her sisters amid the hooting and yells of derision from the hooded Gargolians urged their horses, and plunged in just as the foremost of the glandelinians started firing. Bullets were whistling dangerously about the little girls, and two of the boys were hit, but not seriously wounded. Though one ball cut off the lock of Catherine's golden curls. The horses of the fugitives swam up the stream swift as the glandelinians striking themselves in a long line on either side of the river, while another party of glandelinian horsemen plunged in and endeavored with might and main to overtake the fugitives. The firing of the glandelinians was incessant now as they were determined to shoot their fugitives down, but through some reason none of the children were hit, and when the children fired occasionally a serious number of glandelinians tumbled from their horses, either on the land, or from those riding in the water.

"I wonder how we are going to escape these desperate Gargolians and Mc-Hollistinians!" said violet to Jennie. "They seem bound to get us as we are no doubt very important to them."

"We have got to elude them somehow!" said Joice.

Violet and her sisters continually kept on glancing around about them and indeed saw that the glandelinians were swarming on both the banks of the river, and that already a score of the boldest of the wicked glandelinians were tearing through the water after them on horseback, and gaining steadily on them step by step. Again and again violet and her sisters opened fire and three score of the wicked glandelinian horsemen at the volleys sprawled from their horses, while others being only dismounted floundered about yelling for help lest they be drowned. Violet and her sisters urged their horses on like mad and as they leaned across the horses neck a continual shower of bullets whistled past the little girls and bespattered the water making little splashes.

"If we could only hide somewhere!" said violet to her sisters. "Then we could probably elude the glandelinians and escape them entirely."

After going on down further violet and her sisters saw a long but low stone bridge crossing the stream, and as a large cloud of smoke from the distant forest fires passed for that moment across the moon it made it so dark that the little girls and their companions were unseen. So immediately they swam under the bridge, and managed to hide in the darkest parts of the bridge but placing themselves in a position to put in a cross fire should they be discovered. In a second more the roar of banging horses hooves were heard on the bridge flooring above them the glandelinians who were in the water came riding and swimming under the bridge, and with search lights looked around.

"Those child fugitives are hiding under this bridge somewhere that's all there is to it!" said one of the glandelinians whose voice again sounded like Braggard. "Those civilian girls with their boy and girl companion could not have gotten away or outdistanced us so quickly!"

"But where are they then?" said another officer. "You can see yourself that none of the fugitives are under this bridge, for if they were we would see them."

"They are only taking advantage of the darkness caused by that smoke cloud crossing the moon." said the same familiar voice again. "I have sharp eyes and indeed saw them go under here." "T-

"They are hiding in some of the nooks under the bridge I presume but if we dare to go too near we may be fired upon unexpectedly and I get shot down." said one of the lieutenants.

"One of the officers shouted;

"We know that you children are hiding under this bridge. Come out of your hiding places and surrender or we will blow up the bridge with dynamite and high explosives."

There was no answer, and the glandelinians were still more perplexed.....

All of the other glandelinians were searching carefully and cautiously but during the halt of the glandelinians who had hesitated first before going under the bridge, the fugitives had swam away, quietly reaching the bank, and were racing away toward the christian lines as fast as their horses could carry them.....

At this moment the smoke cloud had thinned enough to allow the moon to shine once more, and the light revealed to some of the glandelinians the fugitives dashing down a road leading from the beach of the river, and at once with exclamations the glandelinians on the bridge wheeled their horses and sped after them at a thunderous gallop while those who were in the water made hasty preparations to follow. But the fugitives had outdistanced the glandelinians by this time, and they reached the christian lines without further adventure.

In the meantime while violet and her sisters were being pursued by the enemy the christian sentries heard strange sounds far off in front of their tents, sounds that were suspicious, mostly of horses, firing, and voices, and one of the sentries shouted "HAT NANT WHO GORS TURUNT" while another cried out

"Opproal of the guard n NO. one."

There was no answer to the challenge though the sounds of horses, and a great volume of shooting and yelling, and loud swearing and cursing increased. The sentries failing to call the leaders of the guards by shouting fired a volley volley in the direction of the sounds, and following the crash of rifles camp fires flared up instantly in all directions, but not a soul was seen anywhere, though a great number of reports rang out in quick succession a random shot striking one of the sentries and wounding him in the shoulder. One of the other guards continually heard the sound of galloping, and stepping behind a tree from force of habit cried out loudly "Who goes there?"

The challenge had scarcely ceased to echo through the dark woods when suddenly there came a series of random volleys and echoing the reports came two louder ones that sounded much like explosions. This wise guard saved himself by his precaution of darting behind the tree as several bullets and fragments of a shell whistled past him. The fire at this point also flared up brightly but not a person was in sight, though in the distance of the sounds there was a strange series of colored lights, and flashes to and fro. The sound was increasing steadily, and at times a fusillade rang out. The Angelinian sentries were indeed puzzled but kept on the watch nevertheless. Several of the christian generals arrived from their headquarters tents at this moment and hearing the sounds of horses, and the firing studied it closely. The fires had died down again so that not even the least glimmer was seen, and the sounds at times was as if someone was being pursued by glandelinians, and it was the intention of the Angelinians to hide in ambush and rescue the fit fugitive, and so at the command the men scattered behind trees, rock rocks and bushes, and awaited the party they wished to surprise. In a moment one of their general officers dashed up uttering a hoarse command, and then the dark shadows of other soldiers dashed past him and went from tree to tree like the rest but for a time none appeared or at least no one appeared at all though in the far distance to their right the skies seemed lit up as if by some strange inferno. As the sounds increased more and more Angelinians came running to the scene but the mystery of the sounds was never learned, and when finally morning dawned bright and fair, but with the enemy's lines still in sight nothing was ever learned of the sounds heard that night by the guards. Movements were made among the christian forces, but there was no signs of the christians preparing for a battle or attacking the enemy who had refused to retreat. The day was sultry and hot from the heat of the distant forest fires, breezes, and continually heavy with smoke and cinders flying everywhere. This great christian army was in the path of the forest fires but had as yet refused to allow themselves to fall back before it, but yet they feared that new ones would be started on account of the windstorm raging. Just now the climate seemed too hot for poor violet and her sisters and during their stay at this section of the country they suffered from the terrific heat day after day but never complained. There had hardly been any rain since a typhoon that had raged at Angelina Agatha and only one cool wave had ensued, and that was before the near approach of the forest fires. The temperature was one hundred twenty in the shade and the air was like the blasts of a furnace. The breeze and wind and gale was hot and smoky, and wreaths of pungent smoke at times obscured the distant trees at times.

In the meantime the forest fires were playing the mischievous of the hell's infernal fury. Christian armies had been forced to retreat before it, scores of towns had been abandoned only to be erupted in flames and horror upon horror was added. Wiesnetines army was skipped by the fire storm but the main conflagration was still moving upon pawns, and general Vivians as well as others. Millions of christians, men women and children, women with babes in arms were fleeing from their burning villages compelled to leave everything behind, and not only was the larger cities threatened by the forest fires and already burning but great explosions were roaring their horrible thunders, and large expensive oil fields with thousands of oil wells and tanks were going adding to the smoke that was fairly screening the earth from heaven as to say. All who had been glandelinians in the threatened towns had been warned of the danger by the messengers but nothing had been said to the christian population and so they had been caught unaware and were compelled to flee many even half naked and without sufficient provisions either.

All the time while the christian army which sheltered violet and her sisters were entrenched before Janley were shocked by the din as far off the roar of thousands of mighty and horrible explosions swept and tore the air in millions of deafening ear-splitting echoes and shook the ground so hard that the headquarters of the christian generals and other houses within the christian lines collapsed into ruins. The quick vibrations caused by the dreadful explosions shook the buildings in the far distant city of Jennie niches, and part of the towers of the main headquarters of general Vivianus dropped with a crash as the shock of a terrific explosion rent the air with a deadly concussion. Not far from the christian lines twenty great oil tanks about two hundred feet high and filled with gasoline exploded from the heat of the distant conflagration and scattered a torrent of blazing oil in all directions among the nearest forest of trees and made a hell of flames reach to the very heavens. General Vivians headquarters swayed and toppled from the concussion of the explosions, in the debris falling on the tangled mass of teams, wagons, and men, a r crashing out their lives. Hundreds of horses which managed to escape broke from their vehicles and dashed in all directions. Day after day swarms of fugitives entered the christian lines and it was a mystery why they had not been pursued by the glandelinians. Electric wire along the right of way of the Me-jolienter and Pandora railroad was brought down by the concussion of explosions, and by falling trees that were burning, or by burning themselves, and the electric wire sputtered on the tracks endangering any person who would happen to come along that way as fugitives. Men whose women and children entering the christian lines as fugitives from the forest fires were thrown down to the ground flat on their faces by the vibration of explosions of munition works which were blown to pieces as they caught afire, walls were torn from buildings by mysterious explosions of other kinds, and sleeping people were thrown from their beds by the concussion and typhoon of sounds in the city of Pandora though fifty miles away, and from the upheaven caused by the great explosions the earth continually in places rose like waves of a troubled sea.

However however one of the fiercest greatest disasters of this great war indeed happened to the enemy. The town of Lucille, further was being the main object of the enemy in which to get at the christian army under general Vivianus especially after this christian army had concentrated threateningly against the glandelinian forces. The inhabitants had fled at the approach of the enemy who poured in immense streams through the streets with the intention of attacking the christian armies unexpectedly. The artillery men who manned the christian batteries however seen the approach of the fierce Zimmermannians under general Aronburg, and indeed all the christian generals were surprised when at eight o'clock all the christian batteries let loose with crash and roar that was stunning and dropped a perfect rain storm of explosives into the city and the immediate vicinity around.

The buildings hit by shells were shaken down by the quick vibrations of the explosions, and the towers of the Ferry buildings and walls collapsed dropping with a crash. On all the streets of the city the explosives crashed almost simultaneously, and hundreds of walls finally toppled and fell on the tangled masses of confused glandelinians with their artillery and horses crashing out their very lives. It was an hellish inferno that indeed occurred. Hundreds of cowardly horses became panic stricken dashing in all directions all poles and wires were torn down by flying shrapnell fragments, and cornices of falling buildings and tons of bricks, and the wires sputtered fiercely in the streets. But this was only a small affair besides the other scenes. Have beyond description was the serious results among the glandelinians surging through the streets of the suddenly shelled city. Men by the scores of thousands were thrown to the ground by the concussion of explosions and were also blown to pieces by the shells dropping so fiercely among them walls were torn and scattered among the glandelinians by the explosions and soldiers who had taken refuge in other buildings were thrown in all directions by the concussion and clear from the upper stories and into the streets, only to be incinerated by the shell fragments. Grenades and craters were even torn in the streets by the explosions and even from the upheaval caused by the explosions the earth was blown into the air. There were three large stone prisons in this city to which the panic stricken glandelinians had been taking refuge from the shell fire from the christian batteries, but which before the blast of shell explosions was just as safe as a fragile wooden house for before two gigantic explosions these structures seemed to fairly disappear into the sky amid smoke and debris, and only a portion of the lower story could be seen of one of the buildings and that was a tangled mass of smoking smoldering ruins. This soon formed a general funeral pyre when the wreckage broke into full blaze and thousands of the tangled bleeding corpses of glandelinians were frightfully cremated. Before the conclusion of the din stronger houses rocked on their foundations as if before the windblast of a terrific typhoon, and before the vibrations others were fairly thrown against one another and crumpled into a conglomeration of tangled wreckage, some being crushed like egg shells the wreckage burying thousands of glandelinians who fled through the streets in panic. A large five story hotel full of panic stricken glandelinians collapsed before the concussion crushing out the lives of about three thousand five hundred glandelinians in a moment. The thunderous roar of thousands upon thousands of shells continued furiously, and a number of shells razed an orphan asylum also refueling glandelinians which also like the hotel fell to pieces burying all of the glandelinians in tons of wreckage, and even all over the city chimneys toppled into their component parts and whole sections of buildings were razed, while the air was filled with flying debris, dust and smoke and with the ear-splitting din of explosions.

The city hall dome which had been reared after many years of hard labor was torn asunder by the shells and pillars with tons of bricks and stone fell their heavy crash adding to the ear-splitting din of the explosions, and the glandelinians now raised to instant terror fled in all directions panic stricken fighting even a long each other in their efforts to get out of the danger zone, tore their own hair in terror and bent their faces until the blood streamed. A general and two of his aids were crushed lifeless under the mass which cut off all the escape of the glandelinian in this section. The hall of justice to which a number of glandelinian generals had refueled themselves was shells shelled and blown to pieces, and the startled glandelinians endeavored to mount a high tower and flaunt a white flag but in vain. All of over the shell swept city the glandelinians poured through the streets back the way they came like ants in the frightfullest panic only to have shells burst among them and tear huge gaps in their columns. Soldiers with flaming red overcoats ran yelling and screaming through the streets southward only to be blown to pieces by the shells, and many high buildings became alive with glandelinians who were endeavoring to flaunt white flags as a sign of surrender and giving forth heartrending yells and screams but were soon buried amid tons of wreckage. Some seeing it was useless tried to get back to the streets, and crowded in a mad rush to the stairways only to be caught in the explosions and falling debris. The streets all over the city was crowded with a confused swarm and excited terror stricken masses of glandelinian soldiers who were retreating in a total rout, running into each other in their wild confusion, dodging the flying debris, fragments of bursting shells, and the sputtering wires, and burning houses here and there. Many were becoming barefooted. Never before in a city was any throng of glandelinians so endangered by a rain of falling shells, and many stampeded to the center of the squares, and to the public squares and to the parks and filled with the terrors of annihilated many tried again and again to offer surrender by flying white flags. The falling shells fairly darkened the skies over the city, fires were increasing among the wreckage, and which was spreading out and widening into circles toward each other. The most important fire began at the main powder ammunition factories. Portions of the walls having been torn away by explosions of shells so that tangled masses of electric wires had started a blaze which quickly blazed fiercely out fire to the ammunition and caused a volcano of flame and din explosions for about fifteen minutes. The booming of the greatest explosions tore the very air at intervals. Frame buildings had been blown to bits brick walls had went up into the air and crashed to the ground, and the wind which was then blowing scattered a hurricane of flaming brands among the surge of panic stricken glandelinians and who were still fleeing in disorder and many of whom did not know which way to turn. The glandelinians who had left the city streamed for the river boats to get aboard and away from the scene of such a disaster but were killed by thousands while those soughting the woods were dispersed by the showers of shell fragments.

As most of the glandelinians had succeeded in leaving the city leaving the multitudes of their dead comrades behind the fire in a few hours was finally sweeping through one quarter of the whole city, the smaller fires making a junction and forming an enormous conflagration which was rapidly consuming the whole sale districts forming a roaring ocean of flames and explosions among gas and oil and from powder and ammunition factories which kept up a din like the roar of scores of thousands of musketry per minute. In hundreds of explosions could be heard which came from under the streets, gas tanks blew up, in the gas works, making a horrible storm of escaping gases which caught on fire with a deafening roar, a hundreds of gas mains were blown up by the tremendous heat.

Thus in the most horrible manner was the intentions of the enemy foiled. Later the whole city was almost blown entirely away by a terrific explosion which tore a crater in the ground, made a scene like a Mt. Calverine eruption in fifteen series of gigantic explosions in the one same place and sent the ruins and flaming wreckage in all directions for miles. The crash of these explosions was heard for scores of hundreds of miles, and caused damage in many towns and cities near the region with considerable loss of lives.

At other points of the war there happened a great explosion. The enemy near the town of Marie Osborne at which later fiercer conflicts raged had erected a long string of ammunition dumps, and this the christian engineers had placed mines under the ground and thus blew up the dumps on the enemy causing the frightfullest explosions that could ever be seen as which made it appear as if great gulfs had opened in the ground for the distance of many miles and shot their flaming contents for the height of a thousand feet. The roar of these explosions was ear-splitting and exceedingly loud and heard at a distance of a thousand miles, and even immense oil wells were blown up, and large gas reservoirs also which released their pent up contents with an ear-splitting roar that shocked all who heard it. On account of the explosions thick smoke hung over the scene for many hours, and all day after the sun was seen only dimly, and like a deep red metallic ball.

At other points the great forest fires were still burning making its progress unchecked, and by the windstorms raging here and there cinders were scattered everywhere, and large sections of branches arose like immense flaming torches in the hot draught being held aloft at times by the pressure of the superheated air before they fell or blew away. Constantly over the christian lines or myriads of all kinds of birds with wings singed, and breath driven out by the heat and smoke dropped lifeless among the camps, or would fall into the seething seas of fire. Thousands of animals of all kinds, even small wild cats, catamounts, and deers, bears and wolves, and other creatures, may even serpents with their skins scales, and hair singed ran toward the christian lines, or worked their way to better safety, or to die from the flames when failing to outdistance the roaring conflagration. Yelping howling wolves and coyotes ran about the camps almost in everybody's way and were occasionally shot at by the soldiers. As the christian lines had still stayed at this point the sky had gradually grown darker and darker from the thick clouds of smoke.

The forest fires appearing to be worse than ever though the flames did appear to be more brilliant than fierce. Towns caught by the conflagration became like great torches. The forest fire at this time was extending over a wide area lighting up the whole sky at night time and hundreds of flashes day and night could be seen which indicated something blowing up. Despite this forest fire fury however all of the inhabitants of the burning towns had succeeded in escaping safely to the christian lines, either on foot, in autos or by train taking what belongings they could get time to secure such as trunks, grips or huge sheets containing all they could get in their haste. At times a perfect human flood of fugitives had ran upon the christian lines and it was with difficulty that shelter could be procured with them, and most of the soldiers had to share their own tents or give up the use of them for a while altogether.

Violet and her sisters were continually watching the distant forests fires and occasionally singing some hymns and song for the amusement of Evans and other christian generals whom they loved so much, and who were their dearest of friends. Suddenly from an unexpected there arose a storm of yells that did not seem either human or earthly, which continually echoed and reechoed through the woods, and penetrated to the hearts of all. Violet and her sisters were astonished for the outcries was heard undulating through the woods in distant and dying cadence cadences. The yells and cries indeed seemed unearthly in sound and was indeed such a tumult of yells which made violet and her sisters quickly rise to their feet and rush for the nearest trees with t heir pistols drawn. It seemed as if all the demons of hell were possessing the air in the woods beyond and were again and again venting their cries of rage, and savage humors in the most hellish sounds. Then a stillness immediately followed which was as deep as if all the sounds of nature had been stopped by such a horrid and unusual sound.

"What ever that terrible noise was it has come from the glandelinians murmured Violet to her sisters who had ran to get their horses.

"It could not be the shout of the enemy I'm sure." Said one of the soldiers as they listened intently expecting to hear the horrid noise again. "It must have been a number of fugitives who were caught in the fires, and that probably it was their death cries."

"No.No.It couldn't be." Said Jennie. "From where the cries came from there is no fire.This noise was just a bad and as shocking as the fierce 'Devil yell' of the Zimorannians.Their only yell is as unearthly as the cries of the fiends."

"And we have been too near the region of the enemy and far from the christian lines, and it is so evident that we are discovered." Said Joice.

As soon as the little girls had mounted their horses there came a sudden series of bright lightning flashes in the darkness of the woods and the quick reports of a score of rifles. Violet's horse fell and so did Jennies, and a bullet grazed Evans cheek. The children aimed their revolvers but to their dismay did not at first see any one, though the trees and shrubbery around them and above were being occasionally cut and torn in a hundred places by bullets. The muskets flashes again and again and the leaves leaves and the barks of the trees in front of the trees to which the children stood behind for protection flew into the air and were scattered by the wind. The little girls had dashed behind the trees with their horses in time for the leaden hail flow thicker than ever, the rolling volleys making a great din, and seeing loving objects the children also opened fire as continuously, and here they were beleaguered all night being forced to oppose an enemy in the dark until their ammunition almost gave out and only with the cool direction of Evans did the children manage to hold the unseen enemy at bay all that long languishing night, until christian soldiers attracted by the sound of the heavy firing came up on horseback and finally dispersed the glandelinians who in hiding had tried all that time to shoot the little girls down in cold blood. Not once during the night had the little girls dared to leave the protecting trees, which they saw later was fairly hacked by the bullets of the glandelinians, besides their horses all of which had been killed.

A great explosion in the meantime had happened within the region of one of the main line of stockades which had been hastily erected within the christian lines. This explosion had been caused by the enemy, but how they did it so successfully it could not be discovered, though it was believed that enemy spies had done the work. Great had been the explosions during the battles of Evangeline Grania or Donna Roseanna, Jennie Warner, Lucille Jordan, and even Sunbeam Creek, and those at Maroonville and Harrodsburg, besides Fort Danien but none like this great explosion. And this one occurred without the slightest conflict being fought. Guns and cannons had been scattered about as if a tornado had blown them to the four winds and over three hundred thousand soldiers had been killed, and a million injured, out of which five hundred and sixty five thousand were injured fatally.

The stockades had been blown to splinters and then the wreckage set on fire which made a most magnificent conflagration that had ever occurred within the christian lines and which burned for three days despite all the efforts of the army fire fighters to put out the blaze which threatened all the tents and barracks within the whole christian lines, and blew up many ammunition depots. General Evans who had heard of the frightful disaster went off with a squad of men to view the scene. It was some time before he and his followers had arrived at the scene where the long line of stockades had been blown up, but where they had only stood before was now a long pile of smoldering smoking wreckage which the fire fighters were continually sousing with streams of water night and day. Strewn around far and wide was the smashed cannons and gun caissons. The dead as Evans had been told had been found scattered as far as two miles from the scene of the explosion their bodies having been frightfully mangled, many having been found with their front parts of the bodies gone even the intestines, while hundreds of others had been seen lying in hundreds of large heaps of bloody shell wrecked bodies, many with their heads off, their sides torn open, arms and legs gone, faces torn to a bloody mass, or with all their intestines protruding.

A large deep hole like an abyss or crater was exposed where most of the stockades had lately stood a crater about as big as that seen in the largest volcanic crater of the Sandwich islands, and pieces of flesh, piled up in tens of intestines, and sliced bodies had lain crumpled at the bottom partly covered with mud and debris before they had been created by the conflagration. Outside the fire trap blood which had tried showed evidence of the awful havoc of the gigantic explosion, and all the surrounding trees had been shattered to splinters, the woods was torn in sections and sprayed with fallen limbs of the shattered trees. On the trees were still standing the branches were strung with intestines and besmeared with red blood. It was a sickening sight to General Evans used to the fury of war as he was and never before had even a massacre of children made such a harrowing scene. Evans was filled with rage and emotion, for many children had also been refuged in this stockade fortifications which had been blown up and he decided to wait his chance and have revenge. He finally gave orders to his horror struck soldiers and wheeling his horse around silently and followed by his staff returned to the main section of the christian lines. The first thing he did was to look for Violet and her sisters as at first he had feared they were among the torn and mangled human beings as they had told him that that night he would they would go to the stockades to visit some of the children there who had now been so badly torn and mangled by this destructive explosion....

Learning that the gylvian girls had been there but had left before the explosions and had went out to scout on the enemy had and had been at conflict with the foe for a whole night and then was rescued by Angelinians and brought back to the christian lines safely he at once summoned an orderly and told him to call his dear little friends to his headquarters..... As Violet and her sisters were talking to one of the christian officers and telling him of their lively time that night, and also what they had seen in the distance the orderly came up and saluted the little girls and then said;

"Your guardian general Jack Evans wants to see you little girls right away."

"All right we'll be right there." Said Jennie. "Is it anything very important?"

"Yes." Answered the orderly. "He wants you little heroines to tell him how you so easily escaped from that disastrous explosion a that occurred in the long line of stockades you visited three nights ago."

"Explosions." Said Violet. "We don't know what you mean."

"Don't know what I mean? Why were you not there at the time?"

"No we left the stockades way before dark." Answered Jennie. "But anyway we'll go and see him and explain matters. He must have been terribly worried, and we would not like him to grieve over it. James got our horses quick."

Their little boy scout obeyed, and helping the little girls to mount the boy scout sprang upon his own and away went the party of children with the orderly and at nine of clock that following evening they reached general Evans headquarters and were ushered into his presence. Little Evangeline St. Clare and Gertrude Angeline were standing besides his table watching him writing resembling two little angels. At the entrance of his little charges Evans arose politely and bowing said;

"I and many of my generals were terribly worried over you little girls, as you were I presume at the stockades when the disastrous explosion occurred. How did you little girls escape without injury?"

"We do not know anything about an explosion." Answered J. J. Joice.

"When did it happen?"

"You little girls surprise me." Said Evans. "Why it happened exactly at the same hour now."

"Well by that time we were having a thrilling time with your brother and the enemy in the woods far from your lines, and after fighting the enemy in the dark all night were rescued by some of the Angelinians." Answered Hettie. "We left the stockades way before five o'clock that afternoon. We did not know that the stockades were blown down."

Evans felt relieved by this news and then as some of the officers who led the men who had rescued Violet and her sisters told Evans this was true he said;

"Well it was the act of Providence that you left the stockades before the disaster before the explosion. But oh I'm glad that you little girls did not see the results as I did and many of my officers. The ground and trees were covered with the intestines of the men who were blown to pieces. It had been a narrow escape for you little girls indeed."

"We heard a loud crash like an explosion at the same time that the enemy suddenly fired upon us in the ambush but did not think it was such a disaster." Said Catherine. "What does it I'd like to know?"

"There are many estimations," said Evans. "Some declare that a randa shall start the disaster, that the enemy set fire to it, but what ever the explosion was it nevertheless was the most disastrous I have ever seen as specially the results."

"This occurrence will have to be looked into," said general Jansen. "Probably more than nine hundred children have been slaughtered by the explosion besides the three hundred thousand soldiers of my command. What ever caused it it is the fault of the Manleys, or some glandelinian general, and General Hanson or Vivian must know of this as soon as possible. If any one is seen approaching our lines the guards are instructed to shoot him down whether he be a glandelinian private or the highest general. These Glandelinians are a danger to the whole world, and the havoc they have already committed makes it look as if they were trying to set the whole world on fire. If the Shammins and the two Pickells and other good Glandelinian commanders were in chief command all this cruelties and ruth less destruction of property property would not have occurred."

"But when if the enemy ever going to retreat or start any fighting?" asked Violet pleadingly. "It's just raging on in scenes of the wildest destruction of property and so on instead of actual fighting as we have observed. And the destruction rages on without any signs of an end it is terrible."

"We all know that but it cannot be helped," said general Evans. "But I intend to stop this once how if I have to commit a scene annihilation myself to do so. But I have something to say to you. General Baldwin whose army is separated from mine by a stretch of woods has some important papers to give to you. He refuses to give them to any other person as you can convey them to me more than the others. I consented to allow you to go to him, but I advise you to watch out for the enemy who are having parties of horsemen roaming everywhere on the look out for messengers and scouting parties of all kinds, and always have your pistols ready in case the glandelinians are laying in wait for you."

"Shall we go right away or wait until dark?" asked Violet. "Better wait until it's dark," said Evans. "See that the hooves of your horses are muffled with heavy cloths so that they would not make the slightest sound."

The little girls kissed him good night, and after waiting a while and doing as they were told soon started out followed by a squadron of their boyscout friends. To reach Baldwin's headquarters, and especially his lines they had to cross a certain thick wooded plain with only a few roads which was unknown to them swarming with the glandelinian troops the enemy having made a temporary position in these woods. The moment the little girls reached the glen the woods seemed to fairly blaze as a fierce musketry volley rang out and this volley brought down nearly every one of the boyscouts dead horses and all and all but a number of large trees sheltered Violet and her sisters from the terrific storm of bullets, though their horses had been riddled, and the little girls thrown. The little girls were not injured however though they lost their bonnets, and mitts, and their dresses were badly torn and Violet lost one shoe, and Jennie two shoes, and had a big rip in her waist clean up to the shoulder exposing a part of her chest her whole arm and shoulder. Only three of the boys were left. Seeing that they were all dead they did not dare linger long to see what could be done.

"Quick this way," said Violet. "Before those glandelinians who dived upon us surround us."

The little girls and the three boys unseen by the glandelinians dashed through the other portion of the glen which was free of the enemy. In a moment a half dozen of flash lights were lit and a swarm of Glandelinians gathered about their victims when their sudden volley had brought down. Suddenly the leader stooped and picked up the bonnets and fragments of cloths left behind by the vivian girls.

"The vivian girls were wit with these boys," he cried. "It's our duty to catch them. Forward men." The wicked glandelinians reloaded their rifles and started forward with a wild whoop, but the little girls and the three boys who had been with them to the last heard the glandelinians coming and ran with all their speed down the road.

"We must fire if they come too near," said Violet with a leer. "And shoot to kill. Show no mercy as they ruthlessly shot down so many of your comrades."

"If we reach the pontoon bridge and cross it we are safe," said Joice. The glandelinians had come on on foot giving vent to their loud whoop but the little girls were far across the pontoon bridge by the time the Glandelinians reached the opposite banks, and the fugitives had destroyed a good portion of the bridge so that the glandelinians if they continued the pursue pers it would have to take a bath for their pains.

"Never mind the water, or never mind getting wet. Cried the glandelinian leader. "After them. But don't any of you men fire as they must be taken alive so we can torture them."

The glandelinians were starting to wade through the water of the small and shallow stream, and the little girls seeing that the enemy were gaining on them blazed away continuously causing one after another to go tumbling head first into the water. This caused the glandelinians to hesitate and then back they went as a party of Angelinians came into view and opened fire to cover the retreat of Violet and her sisters who had reached the outer portion of Baldwin's division sooner than they had expected. They managed to retrieve the papers, and during the remainder of the night found their way back to Evans lines without further adventure, and handed him the papers which were indeed very important containing plans and maps of the enemy's position.

The next day Violet and her sisters went out to spy once more on the enemy and saw a peculiar object lying close in the ground by some bushes. Wicked Glandelinians were near by and they were doing some mischief which made Violet and her sisters suspicious. Going nearer they saw that the Glandelinians were maltreating a very small baby Blonglomonnon creature of the yuskorhorian type and at once interfered, by firing upon the glandelinians and bringing down about seven of them at one volley. The others were confused for a moment and then recovered and made a rush for the little girls. Violet and her sisters saw them coming and realized that they must shoot them all down or they themselves would be torn open by their wicked bayonets. The little girls waited until the glandelinians were within close range, and then was surprised to see another batch of graycoats rushing toward them from the rear ready to run their bayonets through them before they could fire. Violet hit the foremost man with her pistol on the leg causing him to fall. Joice saw a bayonet rushing for her breast but she struck it aside with the butt end of her pistol, and seeing the face of the glandelinian recognized as one of the marian persecutors of six weeks before. She and her sisters had known thisascal before, that he was more cruel and treacherous than ever, than even the worse viper, for besides the frightfulness of his fiendish face, he was very ferocious.

Her sisters immediately having shot a number of the others down went to her aid, and being at bay the glandelinian hiding behind a tree fought with appalling fury, the little girls taking also to trees to avoid his pistol shots. What made him more to be dreaded was the extraordinary quickness of his movements, for he dodged every shot that was fired at him every time he showed his head, and fired back before his nearest opponent had time to fire again, a bullet almost hitting Violet on the hand. Violet and her sisters soon found to their horror that they had run out of ammunition, and as the glandelinian discovered this by the lull in the firing he cautiously advanced toward them, and though the little girls picked up some rocks and hurled them at him there was no hopes of stopping him entirely from rushing them, for this had the effect of only still more enraging him and he attacked them relentlessly. Violet and three of her sisters managed to dash behind a high pile of rocks when he was not looking, but the wicked glandelinian with a wild yell suddenly made a rush at Catherine and Jennie, trying to strike them down with his musket. Jennie dodged, while Catherine struck out wildly to the right and left with a long branch but she did no harm to the glandelinian except to arouse him to a still greater fury. But Violet and her sisters went to their rescue striking with their little sabres continuously, anywhere and everywhere it seemed to them, the Glandelinian cursing and swearing fiercely, while the thud of his rifle sounded loudly against the ledge of rocks. Violet slashed about with the sabre as three soldiers attacked her cutting their legs so badly that they fell, while a Jennie expected every moment to feel the hands of their chief assailant around her neck. Violet and her sisters realized indeed this wicked man was at attention and they were about to scream for help when they hearing a little tree snap at the roots realized that the glandelinian who was striking wildly at Jennie had accidentally landed his musket against a small tree, the force of the blow having sent it crashing down to the ground. The noise of the snapping tree made Violet and her sisters realize how near the glandelinian was, and so to escape him they jumped to the top of the pile of rocks and then all took a flying leap to the other side only to land within three inches of the glandelinian being immediately face to face with him. But as the rascal grabbed Catherine Jennie managed to creep up behind him and struck him on the head with the handle of her small sabre. He went down with a thud, and seeing their chance the little girls helped Angeline and Catherine to rise to their feet, and all seven hurried for better shelter, and reached a glen in the nick of time, for nearly a hundred other Glandelinians appeared and being lancers hurled a shower of lances at them. Nevertheless the little girls managed to escape none the less wise for their experience.

In the meantime the fearful raids of the enemy, and storms of war's devastation were still going on in wider areas. The Glandelinian armies at other sections of the country not much opposed by Christian armies, raided convents and orphan asylums, sacked and burned cities, driving torrents of panic stricken fugitives before them, setting all the buildings on fire, and causing the deaths of many persons who did not escape. In hundreds of Catholic Churches the Blessed Sacrament was abused most vilely, and sacrilegious committed by the whole sale. Children were slaughtered occasionally, hospitals were sacked and burned, and the sick inmates butchered in all the most brutal ways we could ever think of. Railroad tracks of many lines were torn up throughout the country, trains were wrecked by the score, immense freight yards full of coaches, and long trains of freight cars loaded with provisions and fuel were destroyed and set afire, and large oil fields devastated and all oil wells and tanks set on fire. In convents and the like which were raided guns were insulted in the most barbarous manner, priests were put to death, nay every point in their advance was sacked and burned. No provisions of all kinds were devastated, and in raiding the many ranches of the Galverinian cowboys the enemy secured about a thousand herds of cattle and pigs, and other provisions despite the hellish resistance that they met from the cowboys. Theories of devastating raids had caused the cowboys in all their neighborhoods to form large armies in order to resist the foe but they despite the great guns they proved to be and as fierce a herd of fighters as the very devils themselves had no show before the Glandelinians and had to either leave the region or join the Christian armies to avoid certain annihilation. All cowboy ranches were set afire. Hundreds of orphan asylums were burned in a single day, and a terrible number of churches were sacked when cities were raided and devastated. Villages were desolated, and cattle everywhere everywhere carried off.

One day when Violet and her sisters were sitting outside of a tent looking over the list of the enemy's work of devastation a soldier came riding up and saluting the little girls said:
"Your children are wanted at general Winstones headquarters as soon as you can get there. Three strange little girls wishes to see you."

Violet and her sisters gasped in amazement.

Three little girls wishes to see us."

"Yes," answered the soldier.

"Who are they?" asked Violet.

"Really I do not know," answered the soldier. "But nevertheless you are wanted as soon as you can get there, and if you are wise you will come."

"All right we'll be there as soon as our horses can make it," declared Violet.

Violet and her sisters were soon on their horses and they started out immediately and in the quickest time possible reached general Winstones headquarters. They were admitted by several guards and brought before general Winstone. Standing before the great Christian general were three beautiful little girls in long white robe like dresses but they had such a supernatural beauty about them, and one of them looked so familiar to Violet and her sisters they felt awed. Violet and her sisters felt indeed that the three little girls were celestial beings for one of them resembled Annie Aronburg a good deal. The other two however they never saw before. Violet and her sisters were almost transfixed by this vision and at last the child resembling Annie Aronburg spoke out in words of sweetest music.

"We are celestial beings and we were killed in the child slave rebellion were the words. We were sent by God to plead to you to force Manley to atone for his wicked massacres of children, and if he does not and continues to persecute even you little girls any one of you are to shoot him down dead when the first opportunity comes. Manley has three children who have been taken from him by the Angelinians, and you are requested to see that he never has them again. He tries to force them to turn against God."

It was fully three minutes before any of the vivian girls could find word to answer they were so filled with awe.

At last Violet said:

"We'll do as requested at any cost."

"And you have heard that Manley broke the power of the plenglomenian creatures over you little girls which protected you." Said the same child with a scornful smile. It looks like it doesn't. Never believe such lies dear servants of God. Manley would not dare as face a young one. No person can make a plenglomenian creature his slave. Its humbug to listen to such news. It was only false rumors to try and scare you in stopping your services for God and country. We saw that you only became worse for the enemy. It was Federal who committed the murder, it was him who slain me and others.

I will reveal to you the Aronburg mystery as it is called, two months after this war is over. It is only you little girls, and your best guardians who deserve to first hear this secret. Afterwards you can publish it if you like."

With this the vision disappeared slowly leaving a great fragrance in the room. Impressed by this vision Violet and her sisters decided to tell no one but their parents and uncle and Evans.

Of the hundreds of thousands of catastrophes of the last two and half years of this bloody Glandee-Angelinian war in the Galverinian country probably more we were due to a great series of floods caused by the enemy smashing and breaking the levees of the great Galverinian rivers, and blowing up gigantic dams than to any other single cause. Rising seas of muddy way waters with incapable destruction to unlimited property, have been common from month to month in all sections of Galverinia during the war. And almost invariably however it had been a impossible to warn the inhabitants of all the low regions of all rivers, but most of the great destruction of lives by water and overflows had occurred with the connection of the breaking of dams and levees caused by the enemy from which as many cities were flooded as there had been torn in Abbiennia and elsewhere by the greatest of typhoons. The city of Pandora had been threatened during the third year of the war with the worse flood in history, and many troops of soldiers which could be spared had been sent to aid in fighting off the danger and prevent any more depredations from the foe. From cities as widely scattered as Albrahura, Glanderton, Grand Three Forks, North Bend, and South Bend Galverinia came reports of damage by great floods.

In all sections great flood conditions had been had all bridges either spared by the foe in the country, or all bridges in cities had been swept away and immense damage was done to many great railroad lines.

The abject misery of misery could hardly be described. With the trees houses, bloated bodies of thousands of horses and other animals and even human beings floating around, nothing to drink except the muddy yellow slop of the raging floods full of sticks, wreckage, straw, and sand, and chicken feathers no lights of any kind, not heat and no supplies the city of Cannon was a scene of horror and misery beyond description. And worse of all blinding snowstorms sent terror to the hearts of the sufferers.

The town of Clavertonia was flooded by the Glandelinians bursting a dam on March the twenty ninth 1914 and especially when the embankment fills over which the traction lines operated, and which served as a levee was tampered with by the enemy and gave way and allowed a flood of swirling waters to find an outlet and sweep over the entire village flooding the entire section of country besides the village. The village villagers had no warning and families were forced to rush post haste to upper floors and to house tops to get out of reach of the floods. Tragedy was seen on every side during this great flood. It was a common sight to see countless men women and even children sitting on the tops of houses, praying to be assisted to places of safety and in many parts of the town the many residents had been compelled to chop holes in the roofs of their homes in order to escape the onrush of the water.

Adding to the floods which occurred in the Galverinian summers had been many wild thunderstorms, series of small typhoons, and greater ones a perfect warfare of elements. It is thus reasonable to see how fierce an enemy the Angelinians and Galverinians had to contend with in this most frightful make things more interesting I must relate one thing which I probably could argue about such as fully have read many of the beautiful Oz books, and have read that in that kind of a country no one, whether men women, or children, or beasts ever become sick or die. What is was the same thing about the beasts that live in that strange fairy land. I have read also that because the country or Fairyland of Oz is free from sickness and death was one of the reasons why Oz was a fairyland, where also resided the friends of Oz known as Dorothy, Trot, Betsy Robbin, Captain Bill Button-Bright and the others. I was just thinking lately what would the people of Oz do if their country had been some where in Galverinia unknown to the Galverinians, and Glinda would see in her great Record book:

"Great Glandelinian army advancing on the Emerald City. Rebel army pursuing Angelinians. Glandelinian army one hundred million strong."

Gertrude, Angeline the good and best friend of the vivian girls, sat in her own headquarters tent or at least outside of it if you please to mention, positively surrounded by a hundred and fifty of her girl scouts, the most beautiful and bravest girl scouts in all of her regiments of scouts.....the Christian army which had slowly retreated before the forest fire had halted here near a country region of beautiful scenery and from here the girl scouts could gaze

CHAPTER 1
SERIES OF OTHER BATTLES.

Indeed following the fall of Orma and Ormas gun, and Julo Callio and Vivian Wickey had surprised the whole world who now looked for an ending of this frightful war, while those held as prisoners in Cromer Andraan had still greater hopes that the christians would rescue them so soon. General shields and Mc-Holleston Phelan feared that all hopes for glandelinian shielding against the every increasing strength of the christian armies was lost, and ten days after the frightful battle of Orma's gun, while the rout was still in progress general Mc-Holleston Phelan in dispensency resigned his command and though Shield's armies were somewhat rallied and reinforced those formerly under Mc-Holleston Phelan were without any main leaders, and always did their best to avoid contact with the main christian armies.

And still the rout continued. All of the Manleys had tried frantically to push their mightiest armies between Orma and Julo Callio and the christian armies, but in vain and when such was the Manleys armies were in fierce and bloody action at Vatrava, but no hopes of victory victory was in sight for him and defeat was staring him in the face.

It was after this that general John Manley the main glandelinian general ordered his father Johnston Jack Manley to pass a decree like hi he was doing refusing hereafter future resignations of glandelinian generals, calling those who had resigned as cowards and traitors, and that all of them that had resigned shall be forcibly recalled to the colors.

The christian general Meldonia picknell indeed had armies large enough at hand to put an immediate stop to general Viviana's successful advance against Ormas gun had been a glandelinian but this picknell was a born Abbieannian, knew the recent Abbieannian horrors that had prevailed at Julo Callio and elsewhere and of the many massacres of children during the whole war and had turned more bitterly against Manley and the Manleys, and threatened to crush him and those rascals should they dare come across his path. And mostly every Abbieannian in picknell's army were disgusted themselves, and even tired of the war and picknell only waited patiently for general Viviana to tell him to go for Manley good and proper and many of the Abbieannians even desired to assassinate the wicked rascals.

All of picknell's Abbieannians realized that the Manleys had been making a fool of them and all of them vowed that they would take no further insults of the glandelinian generals against Almighties under no conditions, that the christian cause in all its ways was always just, and all of the Manleys ought to be strung up and crucified for causing the massacres of so many helpless children, and for slaying those not murdered....

Manley realized his danger and prepared to even mass his armies against picknell's advance which even outnumbered his ten to one, and general Viviana had advised picknell to quit his foolish notions and go immediately against Manley and picknell wrote this to general Viviana/

"Your excellency general Viviana
I'm willing to fight against all of God's enemies under the Manleys and the other wicked generals, who have tricked their governments by their dirty foolish wicked intentions, plots and lies, and I shall advance as you advised immediately and capture those dens of perdition in Cromer Andraan at once. If any of the Manleys try to force me back I will do all I can to repel and crush their armies. We are human and do not intend to stand any further the cruelties and massacres of children their blood thirsty horde have committed and defiled their own nations with. Just let him attack me and see whether I'll be driven back or not."

GENERAL LEONNIA MILDONNIA
PICKNELL.

SEVERE ACTIONS DURING THE ADVANCE ON CROMER ANDRAAN.

2548

In the meantime the large christian armies under general Williamson Zimmernann and the others with picknell were advancing swiftly toward Cromer Andraan with the purpose to besiege it. In fact general germanias glandelinians dreaded his approach for they knew that he was a demon of a fighter and that no glandelinian army had ever been known to worse him in any battle yet. Mic-Holleston Mic-Allesters great glandelinian army of five hundred and forty five million men was retreating before his advance not daring to stand to oppose him for fear of destruction. The fleets of Abbieannian ships under Admiral Zimmernann and Mic-Holleston had also laid siege to the great fortifications of Cromer Andraan from generals Hanson or Robert Vivian no action going on, the two admirals awaiting orders from general Viviana or Robert Vivian, and being compelled to delay time until general Viviana's army should arrive and reinforce Viviana.

In the meantime there was no big army of Omarians and Gargolians Curdes and also Mangaboon and Scoudira that threatened to bar general Zimmernann's advance and this was under general Francis Aronburg Mic-Holleston. He also had at it seemed an army equal in size to that of general Concentinian Aronburg, the opposing forces were supposed to be 600,000,000 combined, but it was reported that the glandelinian army was not so well equipped, and had been forced by the sudden appearance to leave behind large supplies of ammunition besides many guns which had fallen into the hands of the christian troops. Some considerable resistance was offered to general Viviana's army at Appleton Stepmor 2th, and stronger resistance at Atlanta Run three days later forty miles north of Logan Zoo Run Stream, but there was not any general engagement, though these conflicts had been sanguinary, the glandelinians seeming to be afraid to fight Zimmernann's mighty army.

Mic-Holleston and Mic-Allesters forces realizing the situation made a junction with Mc-Holleston's army at Holl-Pell where considerable activity occurred on September the ninth lasting four days, but here as well the engagement though long and indiscriminately sanguinary were unsuccessful, the glandelinians after suffering the losses of 9,000,000 continued their retreat in confusion, and refusing to fight on or offer any more resistance of any sort.

Manley who was elsewhere and far being apprehensive over the threatening situation at Vivian Wickey and Mic-Holleston, and the fall of Vivian Wickey on the same date and the destruction and fall of Crowley had ordered general Mic-Holleston to make a desperate stand a score of times but still he continued the retreat until he reached the Logan Zoo Run Stream, where after his army had concentrated, and a then still remained inactive, and therefore he was relieved of his command for stating that he was fully away aware of grave danger and that he did not wish to fight Concentinian Aronburg until general Manley came to his aid in person.

General Echoreodine was put in his place only to be killed by a christian sharpshooter at Logan Zoo gun town near Infanta Maria as he went out scouting. General Francis Stenta Anna Schmidt then was appointed to take command. At Emperor Viviana's orders Zimmernann or Concentinian Aronburg as his right name is advanced against the foe at Logan Zoo Run, general Hanson and Viviana being in advance, with the main columns following.

The glandelinian general Francis Schmidt was different from the other commanders and he decided to stand and fight. He sent out scouts to watch for the advance of the first portions of the immense christian armies, and when he received news from where they were advancing, and how they were moving he set his plans. He concentrated the army of glandelinians between Infanta Maria and Zoo Run towns, placing a large portion of defend the woods of Zoo Run and Kuris Osborne as well as St. Josephs, besides making strong positions along the riverbank. It was then October the First. Not until the Twelfth did the first christian army come up and it was under general Viviana and Nero, also under Hanson, Viviana and Charles Brown.

Knowing these commanders, and especially Viviana from reports about him he had received from Inner Hytseten of "Look out for Viviana how you fight him as he is a dangerous adversary, almost equal to Aronburg," he decided on a plan of action. His scouts gave him reports that Concentinian Aronburg was a long way off yet and advancing slowly he decided to make his plans.

He must engage general Viviana, Viviana, and Hanson, but to strike his heaviest blows upon general Hanson first. His army was so great however that it took many days to deploy them properly, and by that time general Viviana and others had learned of his plans and made efforts to frustrate him. Up to this time there was no fighting done, though one or twice and occasionally there was some spirited artillery firing, and frequent skirmishes between infantry and cavalry.

The first thing Viviananna did was to make efforts to learn the strength of the foe who their commander was, the lay of their positions, and how the glandelinian army was situated. He took some time to discover this however and accordingly made his own plans. He decided to take the whole glandelinian position simultaneously if it was possible. He himself would strike at the three woods, Hamsonia was to capture Infanta Maria and force the glandelinian positions along the river, while Vivian and Nero was to storm the glandelinian works at Zoo Re.

It was to be a stupendous undertaking, indeed, and yet Viviananna though finally knowing the size of the glandelinian army decided to begin the battle without waiting for general Aronburg and his army to arrive.

Now some of his generals stoutly advised against it saying that he was taking too great a risk that if he made the attempt the enemy would crush him before general Williamsberger Zimmermann was able to come to his aid. General Viviananna answered;

"If I wait, the enemy will strike me first. It usually is that who strikes first staggers his opponent.. I'm going to strike the first blow."

..... BATTLE OF LOGAN ZOE RAE RUN.....

OCTOBER 15 --161914 TUESDAY AND WEDNESDAY.....

For a time the Glandelinian army under general Francis Smith now posted on the defensive near the town of Infanta Maria on the stream called the Logan Zoe Rae, Run was in such a situation that he and his glandelinian generals had hopes that a most supreme effort to force general Aronburg's army from the west banks of the creek would be entirely successful though it might cost another terrible battle like many of those gone past.

No doubt this glandelinian army would not have retreated so far without offering resistance if it had not been the fact that it had four other commanders before Smith came that were afraid of general Williamsberger Zimmermann, the nickname of general Aronburg, and also of the Vivian generals.

And also this Glandelinian army would have still continued its retreat if timely assistance from general Williamsberger had not arrived with sixty million more men, which had been sent to his aid by general John Munley. Many battles before this raging in a days time covered in violence and losses the whole fury of the whole world war beginning in 1914 and ending later later than 1918. Then around the date and month of October the third, the Glandelinian army had concentrated on these banks, waiting for the Christian armies to come up, but it was not until October the 13th did the Nationals appear. On October the 15th when the battle of Logan Zoe Rae Run was raging the entire front of the Abbisannian army under general Appleby was in danger of being demolished, and after a two hours desperate struggle along a front of fifteen miles when the glandelinians had hurled four violent assaults with overwhelming numbers it was time for the Christian generals of these divisions to appeal to general Hamsonia for succor reporting general Appleby killed, and four other generals wounded and mortally.

The glandelinians regardless of losses were now attacking with a vehemence that breaks all records for assaults in all battles gone past, and this dire call of utter distress coming from the highest military officers under Hamsonia and Appleby on the side of the Christians not only meant; "We are unable to halt the fierce fierce glandelinian attack without two hundred Winkle Abyssinkillian Divisions but rather we shall lose the chance of gaining an easy access to Vivian Wickey, in case Abyssinkillian assistance is not available very soon. The enemy is attacking mad, and they are coming forward in long waves. Our fire mows them down dreadfully but we but we cannot check them, for as many as is mowed down, many more are replaced..."

And as far as the glandelinian generals were concerned the foregoing meant even more. It meant already that in four hours of terrible battle along a forty mile front they had not only succeeded in preventing the Christians from getting chances to cross the stream, and flanking the glandelinian battleline but at the beginning of the fifth hour they were gradually forcing with terrible loss the foremost leaders of the Christians to admit defeat severe, and staggering, to confess that because of the violence of the glandelinian assault that they were unable to hold their own unless two hundred Abyssinkillian divisions all fresh and well equipped each twice as strong in manpower as the glandelinian divisions were sped to the battlefield as quickly as possible.....

But so far the Glandelinian loss was enormous. Ten generals were killed, and twenty more wounded and mortally. The whole glandelinian army, under a general Cain and Dun which started the battle suffered most terribly in those few hours and every regiment or brigade lost their commanders killed or injured, or even captured. Four thousand regiments of regulars lost half their men and all their officers of any rank high and low rank, and had many color bearers shot down. Of general Hamsonia's divisions seventeen generals were wounded, and one was killed, being general Hamsonia himself. At that hour general Haidi Stellic had just broken up the Christian center driving the Abbisannians a mile even though his men were shot down in numbers as thick as trees in a forest in half an hour. His loss was indeed dreadful fourteen of his generals being killed. General Hendon Schmid was personally superintending the defensive on his own part of the line and while trying to reestablish a portion of the broken Christian line was injured by a falling tree. The fourteenth Mangabou Zimmermannian division lost seven generals dead ten wounded, and many droves of men. General Hamsonia's right wing took the trenches, but his generals Fulge Turner and Hendrick Nero were killed and he lost two hundred thousand men in that one charge in killed and wounded only. He too was wounded.

The battle had raged with record breaking fury before the left of the Abbeinnian line under general Kervotte True retreated, and it did not give way until after the most tenacious fighting of dreadful violence on both sides. Despite its own dreadful losses Everette True's army soon rallied, and though again driven back, shattered, rallied anew, and receiving reinforcements, hurled assault upon assault upon the glandelinians. Again High fingers Five divisions was opposed to general Bruno Eagle and James and John Scanlon, and Terry Orouka, and general Mullens, and among the dreadful number of killed at this section are Brig. general Gilio Watson, Lieutenant general Kottorick, Brig. general Penn Pennington, Brig. general Chute Alto Alto and ten others of this army. The Abbeinnian loss was also very heavy but no generals at this sector were shot, though six were unhorsed four times.

The first main portion of the driving Glandelinian forces had arrived at this moment and probably at the beginning of the battle these troops elsewhere had been employed in action without however taking part in a general engagement, and were sure eager for the fray. They had earlier in the morning been in smaller enterprises and taking the Abbeinnians under generals Seichepre, Leclerc, and Frank Gaultigny, and going through some fighting which in a way had been severe enough. Nevertheless twenty divisions had reached the scene, of action all of them of course having gone through final training and were brilliantly organized. It was then however that the main action of the battle started, it moving first began at four o'clock in the morning, and it was not a little after nine. All the victorious glandelinians of the early morning conflict both Mangaboo and Zimmermanian divisions torn to shreds and without commanders were rolled back by a tremendous counter charge of more than that many fresh Abbeinnian divisions, and the Abbeinnians were well on the way to a new success, while the rebel generals strove to get all the artillery by artillery in action available. Then and there the Fourth and Fifth Fifteenth corps were rushed to the threatened front. The noise of the battle grew wilder, and the long lines of cannons thousands of them made enough noise to resemble all the thunderstorms going on in that section without abatement signal their fury. While the Fourth Corps east of now burning Infanta Maria made an effort to strike the flank of Vivian's flank, and smash his christian front, the Fifteenth corps were spread out to both sides of the Logan Zoo Res Zoo heading from Zoo Res City to Infanta Maria by way of El Yorro. And this section of the battle in an hour made the whole day's battle of Waterloo, Dresden, Gettysburg, and a score of others of equal violence put together look like a skinien.

Eventually enormous artillery duels developed between the Abbeinnians and sections of both these glandelinian divisions and it seemed as if a million fearful badlands broke loose. It sounded as if the whole landscape was blowing up to the moon. This part of the action however was not seeming to have any decisive results despite the fact that the Abbeinnians abandoned a certain section of the works at ten o'clock in the morning.

And the actual part of the Glandelinian troops were playing in these bloody developments was by far not as important as any of the effects created by their participation as such in regard to the morale of the very fierce Mic-Hollustinian and Whimsie troops including the Turnerianians.

Yet a fresh Mangaboo Division well equipped and greatly elated over the conviction of their numbers had by terrific resistance successfully blocked the advance of the much feared Abbeinnians under general Viviania at La Verge right there when the latter had come nearest to bending the whole line back. And the loss already for this section alone was two hundred and fifty thousand (250,000) dead. So fierce was the stubborn glandelinian attack that the reserves of the Abbeinnians was as a prize fighter knocked out after one round, and the supreme commander of the Abbeinnians Hannonia, within a short time perceived that his task of withstanding the human warstorm was growing more desperate minute by minute with the Glandelinian assailants being continually reinforced by new Glandelinian divisions. This state of affairs became especially evident at 10:30 when things along a thirty mile front grew unusually lively opposite Logan Zoo Res Town, when a long wave of the Whimsies supported by Mic-Hollustinians and Turnerianians rushed to the attack with a fury as to defy all hell to stop. The christian fire of artillery and musketry shattered this long column but to no avail.

During this section of the tremendous engagement the Second Division, and the Twenty Fourth Corps of the Fourth Mangaboo army played a most unusually conspicuous part, though it played very dearly for it. It was like Pickett's charge at Gettysburg but a hundred times more severe, and ten times the extent. From the beginning of 10 to 10:30 to 11 A.M. the most tenacious fighting on record along an extent of ten miles went on for the possession of St Josephs and Zoo Res Woods and two good sized towns of the same name, making a scene as of a terrific forest fire. After that time the glandelinians were in full possession, not only of the woods but of a sea of dead, and the Fourteenth Corps were stationed in the burning village of St Joseph. In the course of the terrific fighting around and within the Zoo Res Woods the brunt of the glandelinian attacks upon one hundred times in great as Pickett's charge at Gettysburg was directed in full force against the Abbeinnian positions of general Robert Bommens and Ben G Logans Hannonia, Ninth Corps. Right at the onset of these dreadful engagements, Ben Logan reported that the glandelinians after a first unsuccessful assault, had repeated it twice more, and finally had succeeded in gaining a foothold of the woods if not the trenches. To and there three dreadful attacks of the glandelinians was unusually impetuous and rendered very effective by their usual artillery fire.

At the other section hour after hour after the capture of St Joseph and the woods of the same name the Glandelinians continued the attacks piling on, and pushing on in the face of insane resistance until at one o'clock the much fought over St Joseph Woods had to be strictly abandoned by the christian troops. But the Glandelinian loss was triply severe. The Glandelinian artillery supported by great lines of infantry and cavalry were especially determined upon preventing general Viviania from sending reserves to the point that was in such dire danger, though not able to prevent distant christian artillery from shelling the woods like a thundering inferno. Now things extremely serious much more serious than can be believed, for this section there was only limited reserves at his disposal, and Hannonia had all he could do to hold his own. And this state of affairs positively and partly particularly showed manifestations at twelve o'clock when general Vivian's first division of reserves was the target of a most desperate series of attacks by the glandelinians very efficiently supported by their long lines of artillery, and long columns of cavalry.

The glandelinian onslaughts during this part of the battle against general Viviania was no violent and headlong as to not only drive all before it, but served to consume the full numbers and strength of the Abbeinnian reserve troops to such an extent, that all other divisions held in reserve proved insufficient for replacement. And the glandelinian assault hereat that time were only a part of the main attack launched against general Vivian's whole front with the obvious intention of demolishing the entire line of Vivian's army, while the other portions of the glandelinian army attended to that of Hannonia. The situation appeared much more serious to a general Viviania at that particular moment as he had been informed that just then he could not count on receiving reinforcements by reserve divisions which being held behind the left center at the disposal of the supreme command was being fiercely attacked by general Hendro Holte Zimmermanian Divisions.

There was no doubt in Vivian's mind as to all the personal military ability of the glandelinian officers from many former experiences. All Abbeinnian and Angelinian leaders as well as in rank and file also admitted this without the slightest hesitation. Right from the very first encounter with the glandelinians the Hannonians had come to recognize the physical strength of the glandelinian soldiers, their manly prowess, the wild fury of their determination and tenacious desperation, the nation of their de dare devil frantic efforts at purposes, their splendid equipment, and the very important fact that being rebel Abbeinnians they fought like Abbeinnians and were as well fed as the Abbeinnians. The only thing that bothered the glandelinians was winter, as their own country is of a tropical climate. None of the generals had the slightest doubts, that these glandelinian soldiers would be considered a very important factor in the ensuing development of the whole situation as a whole, and that their desperate fighting qualities also showed their tactical dexterity and military experience. But at the same time general Viviania estimated that the fighting value of his battle hardened troops was much more superior to that of the attacking glandelinians, and therefore had hopes that the tide of battle would soon turn in his favor.

And also he expected the glandelinians despite their experience to suffer the most heavy losses. As a matter of full estimation it was reported to him that the whole combined attacking forces stronger in numbers than ever known in any battle in even the war of 1914 combined until replaced by reserves at 11:30 had lost not less than 54,000,000 men of infantry and 1,100,000 cavalry. But then unlike the fiercer Abbeinnian soldiers known as the Angelinians, the attacking glandelinians had on hand all the reserves necessary for full replacement. If general Constantinian Aronburg's army had been able to arrive promptly that day, the first day of the engagement would not have been in the favor of the enemy.

At 1:15 the Eighteenth Abyssinkilian Corps had been launched to the pint point of danger by general Callahan and Jacob and Jake Marcus and also by general Donald Aurand, and Charles Pown added by the Ninth Corps under general Richard Kindernine, Sluderlinia, General Greatheart, Beop John Oson Evans and Hendro Pargar. Although this counter attack aside from some gains at general Hendro Pargar's front had resulted in the capture of 115,000 glandelinian prisoners, and two hundred and fifty guns, and a portion of the St Josephs woods, not all of general Vivian's works had been retaken. Yet it was his intention to make a most desperate effort to smash the glandelinian front to both sides of Infanta Maria by encircling a part of the attacking glandelinian forces far in their lines as wide gaps as possible, and roll up the whole line, and simultaneously send general Wold Heldon picket, and Francis Hannonia to retake Zoe Rae and St Joseph's woods. And such breaches through the attacking glandelinian armies would therefore (if not forcing the enemy back) compell the rebel commanders to transfer a portion of their troops to the main point of danger. Then the time would be ripe enough to launch a final counter assault against the Mic-Hollistinians on the left.

Not only civilians whole command command, but also the rank and file of Nero's Winkie Abyssinkilian armies hoped that it would be possible to accomplish this task successfully and break up the tenacious glandelinian attack, and roll back the whole insurrecto line. To be sure since eleven to twelve, when general Viviania had launched his first counter attack, the greater part of the National divisions had made charge after charge. Four great counter assaults supported by an enormous artillery fire was hurled against the glandelinians in St Joseph's woods, and upon the town, but each had been repulsed with dreadful loss, a world of soldiers to say the least wounded. When calling for reinforcements these exhausted and sadly depleted troops had to be thrown into the fighting once more after utterly inefficient rest and reorganization.

The counter assault upon the enemy in Zoe Rae woods was also terrific but had the same direful result.

The battle along general Hannonia's front was much more severe, and probably as fierce as the great World war of four years in a few hours if I dare to say it. And he too like all of his staff generals was facing a most difficult task. It was up to the commander of his right wing at the onset of the Nationals at this point, to force the enemy back from the Logan Zoe Rae Run, a river from twenty to thirty five feet deep, a hundred yards wide, and along a front of not less than forty miles. To this end detailed preparations under the heaviest fire of artillery, and a storm of exploding shells that made the whole scene for that distance resemble volcanic gales in eruption were necessary, and which must remain secret since the success of the tremendous enterprise rested upon the necessity of keeping the enemy ignorant of the movements. Yet it appeared impossible because of such a vigorous artillery fire from the distant Glandelinian batteries, which was fiercer than any drum drum fire known.

And one of the main difficulties however was the fact that general Hannonia had only a few reliable batteries at his disposal to answer this dreadful artillery hurricane most of which his troops had taken from the Angellinian insurgents. In this way general Hannonia was in no position to arrange properly for his immense columns of charging infantry to be either preceded or accompanied by machine guns, and light field pieces, though he was well supplied with long range artillery and clouds of fast horsemen.

Thus he lacked almost completely the support which these weapons lend to infantry charges and Concentinian grooving yet thirty miles away. In addition his contemplated attack was rendered still more difficult by the effect that in contrast to losses in resisting the glandelinian attacks of early morning which had been launched from a solid solid front the Abbieannians and Angellinians would have to charge over large stretches of ground badly exposed, and upon positions perfectly defended, and dominated.

Narrower railroad connections in this area were not only absolutely insufficient to be used as a salient but were also continually harassed by long range rebel bar batteries, and dangerously close to the Abbieannian front. Right up to the hour hour of the attack nothing indicated that the enemy had the slightest idea of general Vivian's intentions. It seemed absolutely inconceivable to him and his generals that the enemy after the repulse of his assault had made any preparations to head of general Vivian's great attack. Yet through clever spies and detectives and agents the glandelinian generals had known for sometime in advance the exact hour the titanic counter attack would be made.

At this time general Viviania estimated the number of glandelinian troops ready to oppose him to be approximately 91,865,000 men on a front (think of it of less than forty miles. Of course at that time it was impossible for him and his generals to judge what percentage of these troops were ready to oppose his assault but he knew the enemy was rapidly extending his line. However they figured that their wicked opponents had at their disposal although not exactly engaged in the fighting at that time about seventy or eight Mangaboo divisions, Thirty of those dreaded Omurian Divisions, (the fiercest fighting glandelinians if of all) 34 Mic-Hollistinian and 18 Zimmermannian divisions.

The majority of these divisions were concentrating to the right and left and behind strong earthworks, and in the two two forests of Zoe Rae and St Joseph's. General Viviania surmised that of these divisions those nearest to the line of attack were stationed in the neighborhood of Logan Zoe Rae Town. Behind the exact positions to be attacked by the Nationals no glandelinian reserves of any strength seemed to be at all assembled, though the national generals did make reports on received from scouts, that the glandelinians had placed more artillery in the field than had ever been thought of, and where they got so many cannon seemed a profound mystery.

AN UNBOLLY TERRIFYING ARTILLERY FIRE AND MOST STUPENDOUS FIGHTING. FACING THE GLANDELINIAN WITH NOT THE GHOST OF A SHANCE CHANGE. FACING TASKS BEYOND THEIR STRENGTH. INEXHAUSTABLE STAMINA OF FOE.

The organization of the Angellinian and Abbieannian assault divisions comprising one hundred of the Third Army Regiments, and Twenty Seven brigades of the Second army with twelve more divisions further behind together with 12,234 batteries batteries in all, proceeded according to plan along a forty eight mile front as simultaneous as possible from action by wireless. It was the most tremendous and astonishing movement of troops ever conceived. Since the battle began enormous amount of building materials for pontoon bridges etc, together with the necessary companies of engineers had been moved close to the Logan Zoe Rae Run, most of these even two weeks before the big battle began. Also a number of captured gun glandelinian batteries were held in preparation for the forth coming assault. Thus one of general Hannonia's greatest achievements of organization for an enormous world breaking record breaking attack seemed to approach successful consummation. At quarter to seven eleven eleven the christian art artillery along this whole front opened fire, while orders were issued that immediately the engineers together with building material were to rush toward the Logan Zoe Rae Run to repair breaks made in the pontoons by the fire of the enemy in the early part of the battle.

However just five minutes before this time to the amazement of general Hannonia and his staff, the enemy inundated the open country for the length of fifty miles with an artillery fire of the most terrifying intensity on record, which made it sure annihilation for an army of any big size to try to cross. This fire seemed to prove that all of general Hannonia's plans in detail had become known to the enemy. But though surprised it did not daunt general Hannonia and within another hour he had an artillery fire of redoubled intensity replying that of the enemy and the din and concussion shook the country like an earthquake and was heard far and near. And nevertheless during the week before pontoons elsewhere across the stream had been launched, and despite the severity of the glandelinian artillery fire, whose smoke from shells and cannon clouded the sky as to obscure the sun entirely, far large columns of the Angellinian and Abbieannian troops supported by a frenzied cannon fire crossed the river.

The glandelinian fire destroyed some of the bridges and put the river into a most terrific turmoil from the thousands of geyser like explosions, and despite the added withering machine and rifle fire that greeted the Nationals like torrents of rain during a hurricane on the opposite bank, those who succeeded in crossing in the face of it all success succeeded at first in pushing back the enemy, by a fierce and headlong assault all along the point with irresistible fury that nothing could even withstand.

Addition infantry followed, followed, while the engineers worked feverishly repairing the bridges under fire, ferrying artillery across or building temporary bridges and foot plank planks while covered by their own fire. When the main line of assault got into direction position for the movement things became still more difficult because aside from the effective artillery fire which the enemy covered this section of the Logan Zoe Rae Run Valley, the most largest squadrons of their wheeler cavalry as thick in numbers seemingly as the sands of the shore and moving in long thick lines now entered the fight charging the right of the christian line, only to be suddenly attacked by an enormous body of Concentinian christian cavalry, and large bodies of the dreaded "Night Riders". Nevertheless the engineers aided by the severe fire of their own side succeeded in either building temporary bridges, or repairing pontoons ruined by the glandelinian shell fire, or wherever this proved impossible, they ferried the Abbieannian troops at all risks across the river.

Of the tremendous cavalry engagement millions of lance sabre or pistol duels were fiercely and most savagely and insanely fought, the noise of the millions of dashing horses shook the ground and the scene was horrible in the extreme ending with the Nationals routing the foe and destroying half the Glandelinian cavalry column. In my opinion dear reader the forcing forcing of the Logan Zoe Rae Run on the 15th of October constituted one of the greatest achievements of the christian army since the war began, and could forever remain a monument of glory to their valient engineers who has the most most dangerous job in the army. And the actual crossing was undoubtedly the most difficult of the whole task for the Abbieannian army, equal to the crossing of the Marne by the Germans, but by a hundred times greater number and in the face of the overcast fire ever known before in battle. But in spite of this hero on the Logan Zoo ran, and almost only here the first main action of the first day of the battle began, it being a raging hell of warfare. And the objective of general Hanson's was well nigh reached.

After two tremendous assaults of immeasurable force St. Joseph's woods was retaken and the Glandelinian forces there crushed and driven clear out, but the resistance at St. Joseph's town was too fierce and the attackers were almost annihilated after making six successive assaults in which 10,000,000 were killed or wounded each time on both sides combined. The wave of attack upon Zoo Run Woods though redoubtably severe, in which eight assaults were made, was not at all successful, and the Nationals alone suffered dreadfully in the loss of men and officers.

Elsewhere especially all divisions of Hanson's Winkle Abyssinillian and Abbeonian armies achieved most brilliant initial success after fighting most fiercely for four hours, and making four assaults, with the exception of one division on the left wing near Infanta Maria which encountered Glandelinian resistance far beyond any anything in fury and savagery that could ever be expected, or observed in battle before. Here because of this resistance the army encountered the most serious difficulty, especially when meeting with the unexpected stubborn and record breaking counter assaults of fresh Glandelinian troops. Four times along a ten mile front the left wing of the Christians charged, and four times it was rolled back by counter assaults, torn to fragments and leaving an ocean of dead on the fields. One long line of troops three deep and two miles long was absolutely mowed down when reaching the Zoo Run Pond.

While the right and center of the army succeeded in gaining the much fought over St. Joseph's woods and tremendous camp booty, it proved impossible for Hanson's to move the left wing of the line of assault into a position advantageous for the development of the ensuing fighting, which grew so intense, that four million had fallen along the road alone. The conflict for that short space of time would equal in fury and losses all the terrific battles in Europe and America since the world began put together into one battle, say far worse. That such was the case was the result of the most stupendous fighting between the Fifth, Sixth, Fourth, Twenty Second, and other Abyssinillian Corps of Infantry, and Glandelinian Corps which made, the Zoo Run Woods, and all other portions of the battlefield assume the appearance of the Infernal Regions from so much firing and yelling, and whole scale slaughter.

Not a tree in both woods escaped the 'pickery broom' effect. All blades of grass were cut down as by a scythe from the storm of bullets from both sides, and bullets even plowed the ground, and made many a tree every minute crash to the ground.

The army divisions under general Daniel Jones with the Tenth and Thirty Sixth Divisional Corps in their fiercest advance had in the meanwhile been ordered to force the Logan Zoo Run at all points of attack possible, with the most difficult part of the job falling to the Tenth Corps. It would not have been so hard for this devil division to gain approach to the river proper between Zoo Run and Infanta Maria, but the opposite banks of the Logan Zoo Run did not afford any cover, consisting mostly of open country exposed to the wooded slopes near the same towns. The heights to the south of the towns commanded an especially good view over the ground the assaulting lines had to cross. If at this moment I would have followed the commander of this particular division to his observation point the morning before from where he intended as far as possible to direct his troops, and then been there when the battle raged, I would have noticed a scene unusually wild. One probably would remember the horror of Fredricksburg near Infanta Maria, but a hundred times worse in a minute, and the other a hundred times worse than a hundred Waterloos at the open, and like Gettysburg at the front but on a thousand times greater scale with the fury of Chen Cellersville and Antietam combined in a minutes time.

Mounted officers dashing this way and that, explosions in countless numbers shattering the air with their noise created an additional scene and bedlam added with numerous carrier pigeons together with a whole array of belching field pieces, and teeming lines of long range guns, setting the air and vibrating the ground with their crazy din. The latter however could be utilized only to a very limited degree in as much as they were also covered by enemy artillery and roads in general in such a condition as to render fast placing of guns of any kind almost impossible.

At this critical moment the divisional commander had arrived at the observation post together with his staff. He had a good field glass which permitted him a good view through the deeply indented Logan Zoo Run Valley over the positions of the enemy. But it was impossible to see the enemy proper in as much as their troops were stationed behind smoke shrouded trenches and in the smoke covered underbrush of the slopes and woods. The battle presented an aspect beyond comparison. Just now everything was in an uproar beyond anything known, and now at another point the attack broke loose and again a whole day Waterloo occurred within the space of an hour and now over three hundred thousand more fell, now and then for the divisions still waiting to charge opposite an well and behind frequently as the rattle of a long line of riveters as loud as thunderclap roared other cannons, and at every point something would arise over the heads of the long lines of waiting infantry to fall close by or in the distance spreading a hurricane of dead and destruction. Thus the battle raged with unusual fury, more troops were being moved forward to the assault to succor those already in the brunt of the storm. Meanwhile many divisions moved into their assigned places while carriers and a courier's flow or raced from the scene of battle and the men reported to the divisional commander that at all points the enemy was stubbornly holding his own that the losses everywhere were more dreadful than during any part of the battle before and begged him for the sake of God and humanity to call off the assault. But the general found that the wireless connections had been destroyed and therefore he had to refuse to do so. At 2 A.M. the divisions head divi divisional headquarters was informed that general Heidi Melees's Infantry also stood ready. Once more a line of assault twenty miles long or more was totally shattered, with five fifty four thousand having fallen every minute for ten minutes time and even trees were blown ebbits to bits and once more this demolished line of attack rolled back in confusion with a loss of 540,000 540,000. The main line of assault too was not fairing very well and the generals were growing very anxious, AND ALSO scared.

While general Hanson was trying his part general Nero did his. The engineers down along another section of the river were ready to launch their pontoons. Some of the divisions despite wild and savage opposition from the enemy on the shore beyond had already been successfully ferried across the river at ten different points as had some battalions, while the others covered by the fire of their batteries had crossed the pontoons or waded the shallower parts though they were shot down by hundreds. Others were dispersed by the enemy's artillery which had opened up with a hundred times the fury of the cannonade at New Orleans at 1862. Around 7.5 A.M. it was reported that Nero was apparently facing Glandelinian troops under general Pedro Cassamania which was striving their best to contest the crossings of the stream over the first of the pontoons bridges that had been ready within half an hours time.

The one division dispersed before by the enemy artillery had in the meantime been rallied and reformed, and reinforcements had added to their number and they now crossed the river under cover of an artillery fire with the same intensity of those witnessed in the tremendous battles of the world of four years combined into those few hours. Additional divisions gained the opposite banks of the Logan Zoo Run encountering resistance equal to that met by general Hanson's army which was with enormous difficulty overcome. By then several reports were received by general Nero stating that his right had met with strong counter attacks from a Hendricks woods resulting in a conflict which now made general Hanson's part of the battle look like a "play at war" with children. It was evident that the details of the attack had become known to the enemy fully two hours before and more desperate preparations made to meet it. Also at 12:30 definite information was received to the effect that the Glandelinian Hanganboon Nero was facing there, had meanwhile attacked the left by a quick and overwhelming flank movement bringing the enormous Abbeonian at attack to a standstill.

And as this division had lost connection with adjacent portions of the main line line to the right and left the division commander fearing a disaster ordered that the 27th Corps be inserted between the gap to attack the flank of the the Glandelinians before it totally flanked the Nationals.

Meanwhile Infanta Maria and Zoo Run Cities was covered by the Glandelinians so effectively that the losses of fourteen enormous divisions in four tremendous attacks proved it was impossible to force the Logan Zoo Run at that point. These divisions failed at all sections with the loss of a score of enormous brigades in killed and wounded per charge. At this point the efforts to build another pontoon was not successful and the attempts to ferry and wade across the river in the face of such a withering fire were also unsuccessful. Also reports were received by carrier pigeons and swift riders informing Nero, and his anxious generals that other portions of his attacks had either been destroyed entirely or blocked along the Vivian Wickey railroad on the opposite bank of the Logan Zoo Run with the most heavy losses beyond belief.

Shortly thereafter Division L was reported to be encircled by the rebels. A few minutes later he was told that this divisions was being either cut up or captured. Fragments of it regained the Christian side of the river with the yelling and blaspheming enemy in close pursuit. The most terrible fighting on record took place all during four hours elsewhere for the possession of the railroad embankment on the west bank of the Logan Zoo Run.

Temporary bridges were no sooner thrown across the river than they were blown to bits. At 4:15 P.M. there were unquestionable signs of the enemy's preparation of an extensive counter assault in the woods east of Zoo Run and all along the line. It was reported that general Vivian had suffered the most severe losses especially among the officers and was being driven back again. Thus this fearful hour passed, and there could be no doubt any more that either Vivian, Nero or Hanson had the ghost of a chance to force the river successfully or drive the enemy back at any point unless in due time the main army belonging to general Concentinian Aronburg came to his aid. Accordingly general Hansonius horrified at the terrible losses, ordered general Vivianius to retire behind the Logan Zoo gas tank and an noon a darkness came on to withdraw the main army to a firmer position to await the arrival of Concentinian Aronburg with the main army.

Although the enemy began to disturb the retreat by keeping up a lively artillery fire and hurling forward a tremendous counter assault for the length of thirty miles almost simultaneously with fore more greater fury than during any other portion of the battle, the Nationals resisted long enough until general Vivianius's left had an hours time to abandon a portion of the St Josephs Woods. During this time the battle torn divisions were relieved but so far there was no chance for those depleted divisions to rest up and reorganize. They had to be drawn up once more for participation in heavy defensive actions to cover Vivianius's slow retreat. Because of this the number of men in these divisions had been reduced even more.

Then and there the truth was driven home to general Vivianius and his generals that they were simply facing a task far beyond the strength of their armies. To protect the flank of the recently attacking christian forces, the Tenth corps had been replaced by the Fourth Sixth Corps. In as much it met with some success. The division took 118,000 prisoners and also again the enemy had suffered the most terrible of the losses. But so had the christian attackers and moreover the Nationals had not even succeeded in making a breach into the enemy's front thus failing to attain the very object they had hoped for.

All during the time of general Vivianius's retreat there was not the slightest sign of the fierce impending counter charge that was to be hurled against his lines only an hour later. To the east of Zoo gas at the most important part of their battle line the enemy had stationed the first second and third divisions of Hengaboos with the First Zimmermannian division inserted between them. While this retreat was on a most terrifying artillery fire along a forty mile front simultaneously broke loose with redoubled fury and extending as far as Infanta garrs from Zoo gas town. The glandelinians with all the artillery they could bring to bear were shelling the retreating lines of christian infantry, and parts of the enormous christian columns, the most enormous columns ever yet seen in battle were destroyed. During reconnoitering parties brought back the most convincing reports that seeing hero's national divisions also retreating, the enemy had started upon a general counter advance covered by a wild forty mile long heavy artillery fire of insane intensity, but with the help of the help of their field glasses the generals had been able to observe that already the counter charging enemy had succeeded in breaking through general Vivianius's whole line, having already occupied the positions abandoned by the Christians under both Vivianius and Hero.

The loss of another valuable valuable hour to rally any portion of the army meant disaster. This section of the christian position had been captured by the phimois and Hengaboos divisions the moment the retreat began, showing the quickness of the enemy's assault, and though the Nationals had resisted the attack most stubbornly it was of no avail. The whole region here partly consisting of a long ravine had to be traversed and fortified by a part of general Hero's reserve troops with rifle pits and long lines of machine guns to cover his retreat.

Tumbled down walls of farm houses, long lines of haystacks, prepared grain and wheat stacks, and such fragments of houses as were still standing were used by the Angelinian reserves to resist fiercely the onslaught upon Hero but though it seemed utterly impossible the glandelinians gained ground here after the most stubborn and bloody fighting of the battle so far. But so far general Vivianius did not know the worse. Only after reports had come in that strong forces of the enemy had already carried the works did the christian generals clearly perceive that Hero and Vivianius's divisions had been overrun overrun along along the entire length of the unusual battle line and that a great part of their artillery had fallen into the hands of the enemy.

Now everything depended upon preventing the enemy from driving a deep wedge into the whole christian line entirely. For this purpose the retreating retreating armies were ordered to be rallied and for the purpose the generals lined up the divisions all along the front at the same time moving new parks of artillery into position. During this action the commanders experienced new difficulties in moving in the new enemy ammunition as much as the Glandelinians continued their wild attacks with unceasing fury.

The most severest fighting ever experienced proved now to the christian generals that their exhausted infantry although succeeding in repulsing one attack after another was no match for the stronger enemy supported by whole fleets of easily advancing glandelinian batteries.

And with and within another ten minutes by the aid of their batteries the enemy had reached the edge of the long ravine, and was storming the christian line there, but elsewhere the reserves had blocked the headlong advance of the enemy somewhat earlier earlier, although there too the Nationals had been forced to retire for about half a mile, even though the resistance all along the line was redoubled. Upon general Hansonius's army the glandelinian divisions again most tenaciously continued their onslaughts. The first division pushing toward Hansonius left, and moving in as big a column as to probably take all the men out of all christian nations to make a line of advance was completely shattered, and though it was reformed again resumed the attack upon Hansonius left. The first division pushing toward general Hansonius left and the second division equally as big aiming for the center succeeded to such an extent that at 2:30 the situation of general Hansonius's army had assumed a decidedly critical aspect, even though the resistance of the christian line had again crushed and shattered these assaulting waves again and again.

The assault waves of the glandelinian infantry were now reaching the Mic-Hollerster and Pandora Railway, where a long line of Concentinian and ginkie infantry supported by a parky array of artillery strove to roll them back. Finally the newly arrived Twenty Second Division of general Hansonius's army gave such mighty resistance at all points possible that it brought the advance of the rebels to a standstill in this region and the next half hour seemed to promise a change in the situation, expect in the vicinity of the railroad and the ravine. The glandelinians moved against the christian position at the railroad, and though the line of attack was torn to pieces though twenty miles long away the defenders buck thirty yards. The ravine battle looked like an inferno gulch of volcano fires and explosions. Although the Forty First Division was still able to hold its ground at Pine Tree Grove this line of positions had been taken and retaken over and over again with fearful slaughter on both sides and now the Abbelemian front once more grown stronger began to withstand all the other assaults of the enemy.

Around 4 PM the glandelinians made an especially furious attack supported by the fire of all their batteries, which was repulsed with near annihilation to the attackers by the First Kinkie Angoninkian Corps, who fired point blank at the attackers, and shot more than half of a ten mile long line of assaulting men down. Now at other points subsequent enemy attacks did not yield any important results, for by this time the National line seemed firmly established. Therefore as a full spearhead, of this unusual desperate enterprise there was no doubt that the glandelinians employed the very flower of all the effective forces at their disposal, and had suffered probably record breaking losses for all battles past.

And no doubt all the attacking glandelinian forces justified all expectations. Time and again with a great display of unusual tenacity, worse than that of a bulldog, these Glandelinian divisions had attacked, and reattacked, and that was the reason it seemed quite doubtful to general Hansonius as whether he would be able to stop the glandelinian assaults at all. However war experience and all kinds of thorough training, especially as far as leadership is concerned cannot be replaced by even the most exemplary bravery or the most inexhaustible stamina, or yet the very best of equipment. War experience and training can usually prove from this. And did not general Raymond Richardson Federal pay the price for confounding patriotic fervor and indomitable enthusiasm with unaided training and actual experience, when during that awful six hours horror on the day of August the Fifteenth 1913 he hurled ten times against the St Mary's Heights at Evangeline St Claire newly organized divisions consisting the very flower of his army, and tried a force the christian positions without waiting for the arrival of Hanley and his army to aid him, only to have the ten attacks completely annihilated almost to the very last man, and then in turn see Hanley's great army crushed?

What an awful cost for blunder.

After six o'clock when the fury of the glandelinian attacks had apparently abated somewhat, Hansonius and his generals could see that there was no more immediate danger for general Hero's army. But nevertheless he believed it would not be wise to allow it to remain in its present position. General Hansonius recommended to his generals that the strategical retreat finally be approved. The generals seeing it was useless to stand before the enemy any longer finally agreed to this move.

At this hour despite the fury of the battle the main situation along the whole line of generals hero, and Vivianius and others, was identical with those unusual developments which led to the withdrawal to the shortened and well fortified positions of general Hero, Vivianius who had now arrived, and which showed that a portion of Aronburg's army had come up.

Partial general Hansonius also aimed at shortening his own line and reestablishing his broken army in new carefully chosen positions which the generals felt sure the enemy could not dare undertake to attack without first embarking upon long drawn out positions and preparations. If general Hansonius had delayed matters for even an hour he would have lost this once chance of stemming the enemy tide at all points that evening and an awful disaster would have resulted.

A CRUVE SITUATION..
WHAT HAPPENS DURING A FEARFUL ASSAULT.....
HANSONIAS STRATEGICAL RETREAT, AND WHAT THE GLANDELINIANS
..... DID.....

To general Hansonias's mind there was no doubt whatever that the fury of the battle and its ensuing events during that whole dreadful day on the glandelinian front could have resulted in a most speedy decision of what the result of the whole battle had been. The glandelinians actually succeeded in holding Infanta Maria, and Zoo Pie city and St. Josephs woods to the end. Fortunately for general Hansonias, an abrupt counter assault by half of Hero Vivianannus army supported by a wild thundering artillery fire of ten times the intensity of all artillery firing during other parts of the battle, crushed the enemy's lines at that section along a thirty mile front fairly to atoms and rolled it up and Hansonias was then in full possession of the position, and remained securely in possession, until before the enemy gathered for an overwhelming counter overwhelming counter assault the Nationals were ready to abandon the place according to plans. After this the only attack of any unusual importance directed against the Christians between these two towns and in St. Josephs woods were executed by the rebel troops at seven thirty.

And the impact of this attack was apparently supplied by all the glandelinian reserves with the fury of an advancing hurricane accompanied by an irresistible tidal wave. It was awful and fiercer than any attack of the battle before, wild and insane in fury. The attack was directed against all portions of the National lines almost simultaneously, and also against Vivianannus main line and involving the reserve positions to the left, but did not yield any good results to the enemy, although the glandelinians hurled many millions at once to the assault in as much as the national troops succeeded in totally demolishing the entire attack with an incessant fire of terrible intensity, backed by a fierce and immeasurable counter attack covered by an overwhelming artillery fire.

During this attack the glandelinians lost twenty generals killed, and forty wounded, and all regimental and brigadier commanders killed or wounded and all the flag bearers. But this attack also extending along Hansonias line was somewhat more successful, and toward 7.30 the gravity of the situation had become so striking that general Hansonias issued orders for the battle torn divisions to embark upon the prepared strategical retreat as soon as it could be accomplished. Also special orders were given to all the divisions to keep closely connected, and that the first and second stages of the retreat were to be performed during the evening and night beginning in the center and gradually spreading toward the right and left wings, and that Vivianannus who was successful in rolling back the enemy attack along his own front could easily be enabled to cover the retreat.

But for a while the right wing was to remain at Infanta Maria. Then after a pause during which stocks of war materials were to be hastily removed to the rear, the third and fourth stages of the retreat were to be undertaken, consisting in retiring the wings of the army to their new positions. This retreat soon began in accordance with these plans with hardly any changes. Once again during the retreat at 8.10 the enemy tried to break through Hansonias line hurling forward a most tremendous assault, the brunt of it being received by the right wing at Infanta Maria. Hansonias, as parts of the first wave of the assault was shattered, the full brunt of the attack was borne more easily by the nationals. This brought on the most lively fighting of the battle from 8.10 to 10.15 but the Nationals stuck to the covering positions like rocks, and did not give an inch of ground, while the center continued its retreat. Then at 10.30 being at last forced to give way the left wing embarked upon the second retreat but now undisturbed by the enemy.

Within an hours time despite scores of thousands of wagons handicapping them, the Christian armies succeeded in removing all stocks of war materials from all points of danger. The third stage of the retreat was expected to be accomplished before the approach of midnight in spite of the six sides of the armies. Perceiving general Hansonias intentions the enemy once more attacked the Christians at eleven o'clock. However Hansonias army which still stood ground remained like a long stone wall. Bristling with cannon whose fire mowed the enemy down in whole surges. Only at the left wing did the glandelinians succeed in making any slight success, for the greater part of the enemy's pressure was directed against the Christian army under general Callahan. The glandelinians who had captured the ravine made the most strenuous efforts to advance against the whole line from five thirty in the afternoon until eleven o'clock at night and for every assault the Christian fire cut them down like the thrashing machine does the grain.

71-241

Apparently these divisions were the army of the newly moved in seventeenth Corps of the dreaded Omarians and men whom, each at the very same spot simultaneously attempted a renewed and more forceful assault upon Hansonias and Vivianannus earlier in the evening. However the first assault or headlong attack by overwhelming numbers resulted in a headlong repulse and a most heavy loss for the glandelinians. But in the course of the assault upon general Vivianannus the glandelinians definitely succeeded for a while in gaining a foothold on a portion of the newly selected position until a counter assault of great fury drove the rebels back. The glandelinians proved by these assaults to be apparently inexhaustible. That early evening all along Hansonias front, together with Mic-Hollentiniens and Houghboon corps they continually hurled the most powerful assaults of the first days battle directing the main fury of them upon general Callahan and keeping up the assault until high midnight. At this point the assaults were delivered with such driving vehemence, numbers and aided by such a terrific artillery fire that they rolled back the left wing of Callahans line, and broke his right and center and hurling his surviving divisions from the works, and flanking him and turning his whole line, drove him back pell-mell and rushed forward toward Gatell woods, where they encountered general William Schloeders divisions which gave successful resistance and completely shattered the assault.

At the same time divisions of the Omarians, and the Corps of the Fourth First and Sixty Second Divisions of the Omarians, Omaras, Zimmernannians, Mic-Hollentiniens and Urmannians had occupied the works of general Callahans line after hitting a bitter fighting at close quarters. There too hardly was there any change in the situation along general Vivianannus line for it seemed as if the enemy had been informed of the scheduled retreat of general Hero and Hansonias armies, and therefore as Vivianannus stood in the way hammered that Christian line fiercely with a sledge hammer force, but so far only small and local successes were obtained by the rebels, especially like the crushing of Callahan.

During the night the nationals succeeded in evading the enemy and the strategical retreat was afterwards accomplished without difficulty. During the early part of the night the enemy appeared to be still busy shelling some portions of the Christian positions, but Hansonias and his general had so well succeeded in covering the retreat that the enemy suffered a great loss of time, and not until morning was able to re-establish hostile contact with the national armies.

Nevertheless even as early as 3.30 the twenty first second Corps under general Hardi retreated from Hero a position on Hunter Browns farm but suffered terrific loss, and their generals Germaine, Francis, George Anton and Hardi were killed, and generals Hildebrand and Mic-Hollentiniens were wounded, besides ten others.

Just how close did the glandelinians come near winning the battle. If the author could more than once direct attention to the fact that the morale effect of the participation of glandelinian troops exerted a most tremendous influence on the exhausted Omarians and probably also not the least shattered divisions of the Goodlers. The mere fact that 100,000,000 glandelinians had hurled themselves against the Christian line to be followed by additional millions, stiffened the backbone of the Omarians and Goodlers to such an extent that they drove a wedge against Hansonias army. The same fact put sufficient courage into the Scodlians and the Omarians to continue the battle even when Abbiemian and Agullian troops after the first big victories of the battle had held Infanta Maria and Zoo Pie cities all day and lost but recovered Zoo Pie and St. Josephs woods four times and then after the fifth held that section for good.

There is not the slightest doubt that the glandelinian forces had the best of training, that their leaders had the best of experience, in generalship, and actual war experience. Yet the glandelinians had with them something much more important than training and experience, something that cannot be taught, but must be borne born in them, the will to attack, the firm resolve to kill, or get killed, to carry a position if they have to go through perdition to do so, to hold what they gained or die, qualities with which brave men will never hesitate to admire even in the enemy.

SECOND DAY OF THE BATTLE OF LOGAN ZOO. THE RUN.
IN TWENTY FOUR HOURS ON-CHURCH GLANDLINIANS WERE STOPPED DRIVEN BACK FIFTY FIVE MILES. PLAN TO BAIT CONCENTINIAN ARONBURG FAILS.

THE second day of the battle of Logan Zoo Run proved the Angolinian or christian cause was on the win winning side, a chance for Vivian Wicky to be retaken and in the future little children were not to be enslaved. The scenes of the first day had not been of the first day had not been repeated. During the night of the first, the National troops under Hansonia, Viviananna, and the others had valiantly sustained the long retreat. And when the moment had come to attack they, now supported by the main army under Williamsburger Zimmermann rushed into battle with all the magnificence they could muster.

A most decisive victory for Glandelinis in this part of the drama of war depended fully upon an early crushing defeat of the first christian army under Hansonia and Viviananna, so that the Glandelinians could then be free to have the opportunity to hurl the maximum of its forces against Concentinian Aronburg. The first rush of the Glandelinian armies, 54,700,000 men along an extensive front enabled it during the first day of the battle to carry nearly all of the christian positions. Then with the arrival of a portion of general Concentinian Aronburg's army, this Glandelinian avalanche scurried on the following morning was stopped and partly shattered by the counter attack of the christian nations during a terrifying conflict which cost both sides within a few hours a loss of 432,000 killed and 3,000,000 wounded..... In these few hours the christian armies had retaken all their lost positions and drove back the enemy three miles with the loss of ten generals killed. This incident caused the faith of the christian generals in their soldiers to be amply justified a thousandfold. They had fought most gloriously, with great sacrifice, bravery and valor which had anteceded the enemy immensely..

With an army of such magnificent heroism at their command what christian general could expect such a thing as defeat? From the Zoo Run and St. Joseph's woods and along a forty mile battle line extending across the outskirts of Infanta Maria to the fortified works near Logan Zoo Run this had been the great area over which in one night the christian armies under Hansonia and Viviananna had retreated from the very beginning of evening until late in the morning. Superior Glandelinian attacks had forced the christian armies back, but the generals had withdrawn their armies with the idea of waiting the best moment to counter attack. The very moment for the opportunity came at eight o'clock in the following morning. General Francis Smith during his headlong attack on the christians the day before, with the bulk of the troops of the first section of his army had without knowledge of the fact exposed the left wing of all the attacking Glandelinian forces to an outflanking movement by the first three reinforced divisions of general Viviananna's army under general Ben Zepa, Logan.

Knowing this general Concentinian Aronburg had arranged quick special plans to organize this portion of the christian army on his extreme right expressly for this grand and monstrous attack. The existence of general Concentinian Aronburg's newly raised army was unknown to general Schmidt who could not at first believe the reports that reached him at ten o'clock in the morning that the troops he had left in possession of the christian works to protect his own flank, the left which was the extreme right flank of the entire Glandelinian army had been cut to pieces, shattered and driven out of the works by superior christian forces.

General Francis Schmidt made a couple of serious mistakes, which enabled the christians to even crush him entirely before noon time on the second day. During the rush of the Glandelinian attacks the day before he allowed his main army to become separated from its first reserve main division commanded by general Hadden Smith and generals Francis Madden and Cornstern Andrews protecting his right flank, and also he thought that the christian army menacing his left flank was far much smaller than it really was.

And the christian forces were so co-ordinated that any one of the christian general, generals, were able as quickly as possible to take advantage of both mistakes. Therefore a concentrated attack a hundred times the size and violence of any attack of all battles in the world past including all fighting in the world war put together on general Schmidt's left wing that was situated in a portion of the Marie Osborne Woods drove it back across the river with a fearful unbelievable loss, with a simultaneous attack upon the Glandelinians in the captured woods near Heidi Zoon was concentrated with such overwhelming fury that the Glandelinians were forced out all along the line. To prevent the flank from being encircled or turned, general Schmidt was forced to swing a portion of his great army from a battle front extending generally north to south about thirty five miles to a new and much shorter line extending almost east and west. This movement was accomplished in one hour despite the size of the army engaged amid dreadful and bloody fighting opened a great gap between him and the other section of his army. Into this gap general Viviananna's whole command was soon being pressed. It was a grand and desperate movement and this attack was also effected with the most greatest rapidity and unusual gallantry by the Abyssinkilian and Angelinian forces. The Glandelinian fire of masonry and cannon broke all records for severity, and its murderous effects, but despite the shattering losses, the christians along the left pressed on through the Zoo Run and St. Joseph's woods, driving the enemy before them in utter rout, while the center pressed on with great speed, like racers over meadows and rushing on like an irresistible tidal wave and shattered the whole rebel battle front of more than ten miles and forced a general withdrawal, capturing a whole division of prisoners and many cannon. The losses on both sides was enormous but the Nationals by seven o'clock crushed every opposition and drove all before them. On the enemy side generals and other officers of all rank fell like flies before the blow of the fly swatter and a score of brigades on the christian side lost all their commanders dead or wounded..

The gap between the first and second Glandelinian armies was held by a most strong line of general Holm Pette's forces expertly supported by a teaming of artillery and infantry. While this being also driven by a headlong assault of great awesome fury, Viviananna with the Sixth, eighth, Sixteenth, Eleventh, and twenty Fourth Corps was making efforts to turn general Schmidt's right flank also. To avoid the success of this operation the great Glandelinian supreme commander was forced to order the general withdrawal movement, to unite and reform the Glandelinian armies on a shorter front, a little northwest of the Logan Zoo Run. With the fighting enemy making a full recession, the christian victory depended upon the speed and will power of the nationals, the quick movement of the artillery being necessary to make the artillery fire incessant and effective upon the retreating enemy. Three hours after the beginning of the second day of the battle general Aronburg's learned in rapid success of the driving back of general Louis Klanton army, and of Schmidt's by well executed rearguard retreats accomplished in an astonishing short time despite the size of the armies while even continuing the battles. This indicated heavy losses by the enemy and most tremendous christian success of the war so far. He immediately issued orders for a maneuver that would enable Viviananna to turn the perplexities of the enemy into an irreparable disaster for the whole Glandelinian army. General Hers with his Abyssinkilian army which had been reinforced by twenty army corps taken from general Aronburg's command, or sent rather, was to make the utmost possible effort to turn the right flank of general Schmidt's army. General Callahan with the Angolinian army, and Hadden Bicknell and Rego John Ewien with the Fourteenth Abyssinkilian army were to press forward a huge wedge between Schmidt's first Grand Division, and second, Hansonia with his command command and Viviananna with their armies were to push forward toward the center of the forty mile battle line as rapidly as possible and crush their retreating adversaries. General Flendorn Adelaide's Ninety Ninth First Corps and Francis Andrews were to attack Lindorners Ninety First Zimmermannian Corps and Houdrick Hansonia's Mangaroo Divisions.

This maneuver though desperate and tremendously enormous and causing a hurricane conflict not ever thought of since the World ever came into existence (lets hope never comes true) not only prevented reinforcements of general Schmidt's army but it widened the great gap between the Glandelinian First and Second armies, compelling Schmidt to again make a forced withdrawal under cover of a tremendous artillery fire that threatened to destroy the planet northwestward before the front of Viviananna's advancing army and Nero's Abyssinkilians.

This withdrawal was effected under a heavy cross and onfading fire of the christian artillery and in the face of tremendous infantry attacks. While the great strategic movement was in progress along this section general Henry Salaco with the Third Concentinian, fourth Tripolygonian and Domobian Divisions made a most vigorous attack against general Schmidt's center. The whole battle line thus engaged made transfer of troops to reinforce hard pressed divisions impossible.

General Schmidt's withdrawal under fire with terrible losses was nevertheless managed with skill. The pressing on of the nationals under general Hansonia was necessarily slow. Bridges across the stream had been blown up by the retreating Glandelinians. The roads over which the heavy christian guns had to be drawn had abated stream across and was exposed to a terrific rifle fire from hidden rebel marksmen. The troops were exhausted by terrible losses suffered the day before, and by eighteen hours of the fiercest fighting on the first day without one moment of rest. And before the battle entirely they had been exhausted by sixteen days of hard marching without one night of real resting. In a spite of their magnificent spirit and will to fight their tired bodies were becoming incapable of it. strenuous efforts were required to move the very heavy guns and munition cases on forward fast enough to take full advantage of the enemy's withdrawal. The Glandelinian retreat ended gradually into a terrific rout and stampede between half past ten and eleven o'clock. Their armies on the whole had at first gone back in good order retreating every step; step of the way. And the fighting was more than unusually advance with the armies of the Glendelinians left which had retreated further from the region about Infanta Maria where the decisive struggle occurred. The battle for that morning alone was four times fiercer than the whole days struggle on the 15th. It was evident to general concentiniam Gronburg from all the reports he received that the enemy in spite of his forced retreat of more than thirty eight miles and in spite of his losses was not broken in spirit until the glendelinian army received word that something had happened to their main commander. Then all was lost.

In the meantime at Nine o'clock general Francis Schmidt had been also making hasty preparations to accept furious battle along other positions to also give Hannonia opposition forcing troops to stand ground behind new Natural positions behind which general Hannonias army were forming. Unexpected reinforcements had also arrived from Schmidts center to strengthen the rebel battle line at these new positions, and to fill up with quick replacement the gap made during eighteen hours of incessant and victorious battle on the 15th.

He was for that time enabled to fight Hannonia too because at first the almost efforts of general givenman army to outflank his left wing were not quite so successful. At Nine thirty the principal part of givenman forces were stopped in their advance by most tenacious resistance and terrific counter attacks by general Schmidts reinforced divisions under general givenman. Given encountered on the plateau between the river and Zoo Rue. The glendelinian general had realized by that hour or half hour before noon that their entire forces might be threatened with total destruction if Givenman turned their flank at that point, with some Hannonia hammering fiercely elsewhere. They fought most desperately and successfully to prevent it until givenman put in more troops and finally drove the enemy back. The losses were more heavier on both sides here at this point alone than what was suffered by both main armies in the battle of the day before in all day fighting.

General Gronburg (Whilliamberger Zimmerman) realized by Ten o'clock that a strategic movement on the part of the foe was being established all along the front upon Hannonia and here for here the battle was raging with mad fury. From the North end of the Lower Zoo Rue Run to the main stratum, and even further southward toward the two enemy hosts 200,000,000 men were gradually bunching one another on a battle front more than fifty miles long for even such a number and the whole conflict here raging like a thousand world wars of 1914. General Gronburg fearing Hannonia was in some danger decided to rush forces to his left the point where Hannonias front was last stabilized all the troops that could be safely be taken from those parts of the battline where a strategic balance or deadlock had already been fully achieved. His aim was to overcome the enemy's resistance to Hannonias assault, by by widely outflanking him on the right once more and hurling simultaneously an overwhelm line assault upon the center.

At quarter to eleven he immediately organized the following forces for the purpose. The eighth Division under general Mic-Cann which came from the left and two Reserve forces and the Tenth Corps under general George Gröss, and the seventh under general Donald Aured. At this time before the main disaster occurred to the foe general Schmidt was prompted by a similar impulse as Gronburg. He too was withdrawing troops from his stabilized front and rushing them to the left.

He reinforced his left with glendelins Second Division withdrawn from his center, general Hendricks also withdrawn and a new army coming from the river. The battle was spreading in all directions with the speed of a hurricane driven forest fire. The main decisive action of the battle was on. The maneuver was really a most tremendous effort on the part of both the glendelinians and the christian armies to turn one anothers flank and thus encircle its enemy. This situation added only when neither army for a time could go further northward without exposing each other to destruction. Each side finally had all of its infantry divisions and practically all of its cavalry engaged, and the uproar of artillery was heard 250 miles.

The fighting all along the line was more intense than ever before and more incessant and spasmodic. Besides the Abyssinkilian troops, Angelinians, Abibannians and also the concentinians, the christians in this fiercest operation of the battle included the whole of the Calvinilian, Tripilignilian and Dombolian armies which had just received considerable reinforcements, and also beginning with the general and last stages of the battle (the crisis) the Winkle Abyssinkilian army. The latter had come up through the two towns of Infanta Maria and Zoo Rue attacking the glendelinian army along its own front and threatening it with total destruction.

During this terrific action the front of the enemy's line was constantly wavering. This was caused by the fierce overwhelming attack of all the combined christian forces under Hannonia and Vianonia which both generals threw into the struggle against the enemy as soon as they could be mustered as waves of the sea follow one after the other against an angular breakwater during a hurricane. The attacking lines extending fifty miles and twenty men deep, and within six miles of it, as many fell in a few minutes as in five battles like Waterloo, and the Marine put together.

Probably the most violent onslaughts of the battle were launched upon the very glendelinian center where the conflict within four hours time was raging like the entire four years of the Great World War put together in that small space of time. During these four hours from seven to ten o'clock in the morning the whole glendelinians also endeavored in four tremendous fifty mile length charges to take the long lines of christian works fronting Infanta Maria and Zoo Rue Towns, and the reach of the North End of the River. In this most tremendous effort of the whole battle they used extremely large forces principally made up of newly created army corps. The noise of the battle during those four hours shook towns three hundred miles away, breaking glass out of windows, shivering furniture, street light poles, trees, ship masts, and all within a shimmers and creating strange situations and sensations in the streets and within the houses.

In the tragic conflict at this point the Nationals rushed forward troops of every description to face and drive back the glendelinians. There were all these divisions mentioned before all hurrying into action until it was like a tremendous active war in Hell. Though they stroved with all their might the glendelinians again failed to win their object, losing thirty generals in killed and forty wounded.

Along Hannonias front and that of the enemy opposing him both sides were like two prize fighters striking the last terrific blow. Fighting here was unusually savage. Both sides were equally so mad. The front was now established from the South End to the south of Infanta Maria just as it had been established at the end from Infanta Maria to Zoo Rue the day before. Then the fiercely attacking armies found themselves spread out over a front of over forty eight miles and keeping the whole region looking like a smoking inferno, or like the valley of a million smokes up in Alaska.

One section of general Painters glendelinian army was exhausted and withdrawn, and a new force placed in the gap. And this was the same glendelinian army which three months before had set out upon a lightning and hurricane campaign--a campaign intended quickly to destroy all christian armies opposed to it. It now was a hell of warfare of battle. The christian movement of Hannonias army being now a hurricane of blows against general Painters foe lines. And for the first time in the big and unusual glendelins-Abibannian war a front of more than fifty miles became a forest fire, volcanic eruptions, earthshaking cannonades, and tremendous manuevers, a not to forget mentioning other sections of the battline.

The glendelinians opposing Hannonia at this time gave such tenacious resistance that for a while for Hannonias army to break through any part of the rebel line required the most tremendous preparations and ever efforts ever mustered in battle since the war began. During this tremendous situation neither side won any signal victories for five hours. Thus the main part of the battle along this front for a time turned into a battle of indecision, or a tug of war with both sides of equal strength. Yet however in this latter development the Abibannians had tremendous advantage over the enemy. The Glendelinians found themselves facing in Hannonias an adversary who was free to obtain help of all sorts from the whole of that part of Calvinilia; and even now there were many in the glendelinian army who realized if the armies had not yet lost the battle, they could at least no longer win it. General Concentiniam Gronburg had thrown all the strength of his army into the battle that morning from the very beginning, and so had Hannonia, Vianonna and Vianonia.

At this time the enemy had only hoped to sustain his past efforts to the last. In order to hold the immense front along which the battle was raging so immensely, the glendelinian supreme command was forced to keep the majority of its forces at the left and center where the christian attack had continued all more morning with the tenacious fury of a million bulldozers upon wildcats. This prevented the glendelinian army from putting itself strongly enough on the defensive along the center and therefore resulted in its failure to maintain this portion of the line or stop Hannonias headlong attack. What happened because of this demonstrates the truth of this last statement.

While Hannonias christian were directing the assault upon general Painters left, general Hendrick and Blainnightlinger decided upon a big counter charge against the christian attackers at the center. Their object was to rally and revivify the beaten Omilian armies that had showed signs of early collapse at this portion of the battle.

General Watson Hunder and Parsons Miriam attempted the counter assault at ten o'clock and at quarter after ten the awful action yielded some important results. Though again at ten thirty the scene was as fierce as the whole four years war on the Marine. The National attackers lost a vast amount of territory immense quantities of equipment and an enormous number of prisoners. But the victory was not decisive. The Nationals half an hour later rallied and counter charged with such fury that they regained all the territory they lost, and general Hendrick and ten of his generals were killed, and their men fell in numbers as thick as the trees of an immense forest. General Watson was compelled to send the bulk of his forces to oppose the fierce Hunchkins and Winkle Abyssinkilians, but now could not force his action against them to a success at all and saw his soldiers fall dead or wounded in immense waves.

Fifteen divisions lost all their commanders and were reduced to regiments, many other leaders were killed, and hundreds of brigades were shattered so fearful were their losses. Then throughout the entire half day duration of the battle on the 16th of October the glendelinian army was suffering the consequences of the failure in the first great early morning part of the first day of the battle after it began to rain.

There did come however a moment on the second day when the hopes of the enemy were nearly realized. It was at seven thirty in the morning when the covert glendelinian fire caused the national assault to melt away. Then the glendelinians saw one half of the general assaulting wave crumble to the ground along a front of forty miles. But this success without glory came too late. General Aronborg had arrived the night before and the christian army was triply strong. Reinforcements were rushed to the spot supported by an annihilating fire. The glendelinian generals now then found themselves faced with a strategical problem which called for quick decision. The national at all points had to be crushed before the reinforcements could have time to deliver a blow. General Faxon and all the others, endeavored to carry out their plans. They tried their best as already stated, and that was why all that morning of the 16th it seemed as if all the world had gone mad. But they failed and suffered the most lamentable loss. At this line of action just on the battle for the christian by noon for the christians was crowned with definite victory. General Francis Schi Schmidt in order to rally a portion of his broken line at Eleven Thirty was mortally wounded. A shot struck him in the lung, another in the abdomen, and the fragments of a shrapnell mangled him. The whole glendelinian army was shattered.

When it was learned that the supreme commander had fallen the greatest confusion ever heard of broke out. Another general Hanson Nelson took his place, and strove to rally the army but was shot in the head while only succeeding in rallying a brigade. General Faxon took command as general disorder took at started, and after half an hour's desperate effort with the help of surviving generals and other officers, succeeded in rallying a portion of the line, but in trying to maintain it had half of his left side torn away by a shrapnell fragment and died instantly.

Then general Frank Holt took the dangerous post but was instantly killed before he had time to rally a single regiment. Plain fighting tried and was wounded. The scene of confusion was terrible with the christians coming like an immense tidal wave their yelling making a sound as of a roaring cyclone. Ten other generals tried and were killed or wounded. The glendelinian army was in the same situation as to spread like a forest with the terrific hurricane rushing upon it, and carrying all before it. Heaven alone could describe the immeasurable scene. Here general Holter-Belander made every effort to stop the panic and confusion, and so great was his effort and so gallant his example that in a short time a large part of his army was still rallied.

Then as he attempted to lead a counter charge a shot struck him and shattered his left leg, another shattered the wrist of his right hand. He wrapped some bandages around the wounds, and strove to lead on. And then another shot struck him and still he staggered on with when a shell fragment entered his breast. He staggered and fell. Lieut. Colonel Pango of the Whimies, Captain general Gualdo of the Swedes, and two other general officers, and thirty officers of other but lower rank aided by a few artillery officers also fell. Two lieutenants, and three privates who ran to aid general Pango and proceeded to carry him in their arms to the rear were killed in the act.

Others came to his aid but he begged them to lay him down and save themselves. They therefore did so and in a few moments his gallant soul fled. General Mont-Calmante pattered still on horseback tried also to stem the tide of disaster, and a shot passed through his body. He managed to keep his seat however, two soldiers supporting him on each side, and bore him with the tide of fugitives toward the rear.

During the retreat of the glendelinian army a portion of it at twelve o'clock came to a portion of a remaining bridge with a column of national persons close on their heels. Artillery hastily planted at this spot opened fire, and a to cover a portion of the retreating glendelinian army at this section a force across the bridge, a good sized column made a desperate stand along the bank and disputed like demons with the van of the pursuers the approach to the bridge thus successfully retarding them for three hours. The three hours fight is re at the bridge is described thus:

As the pursuers pressed on the artillery placed along the shore but in a position to fire crosswise upon the bridge led let go and the purple waves on the bridge and in on the opposite shore crumbled or melted away like pastry. The advancing column of Abbeismians were four hundred thousand men headed by thirty thousand cavalry the fierce Concentinians. To meet these the glendelinian general who was covering the retreat at this spot had barely the survivors of his two hundred and fifty thousand thousand men exhausted after nearly thirty six hours constant fighting.

Near the bridge while covering the retreat of the main column, when the Abbeismians rushed forward again twenty two thousand of that gallant rebel division fell to rise no more. The remainder fiercely fighting fell back inch by inch toward the bridge supported by a portion of the retreating column which had rallied but pressed by their four hundred and thirty thousand foes. From the Abbeismian officers shouts now arose from all sides: "The Bridge, The Bridge, The Bridge."

"The Bridge, The Bridge, The Bridge" and a curious rush was made to get over the bridge along with it not before the retreating glendelinians. Of course in this event all would be lost. But the brave glendelinian commander and his handful of glendelinians were well aware of the fact and they turned to bay at the bridge and like cornered tigers opposed the nationals like an impenetrable wall bristling with sharp points of steel to the mass of the christian force, which with the christians rushing on nevertheless resulted in a fearful tug of war, while above the mad action of battle and the shouts of the combatants and the ring of steel on steel, could not be heard sounds in the rear that needed no explanation, the glendelinians there were breaking down the arches behind, while their comrades fought in front.

"The glendelinians are dear destroying the bridge," shouted one of the National Commanders.

"On on, save the bridge," cried another offi cer.

Flinging themselves in thousands on the small bodies of rebels (the bridge being a wide one and long) now resisting them, the stormers sought now to clear the way by freely giving man for man, life for life, man for four for one. But IT DID NOT accomplish anything. There the rebels stood like adamant, the space at the bridge end was large but nevertheless a thousand glendelinians could keep eight or ten thousand at bay, and a few paces behind wielding pick and spade and scabber like furies were the glendelinian engineers. Soon a low rumbling noise was heard followed by a crash and a shout of triumph broke from the rebel side, a yell of pain from the nationals.

A portion but a portion only of three arches had fallen into the stream, the bridge was still passable. Again a wild eager shout from the Abbeismian commander.

"On, on now save the bridge."

But still there stood the debilitated defenders, with clenched guns and clenched teeth, resolved to die, but not to yield. Suddenly a cry from the glendelinians in the rear.

"Back men; back men, for your lives."

The brave column of men turned from the front, and saw the half broken arches behind them tottering. Most of them rushed with lightning speed over the falling mass but the last regiment had whirled round over at that moment to face and keep back the Abbeismians-----were too late. As they rushed for the passage the mass of masonry hurled over with a roar into the boiling surges leaving the devoted column on the brink in the midst of their foes. There was a pause for a moment only, and almost a wall burst from the rebels on the opposite side, but just as the Abbeismians rushed with vengeance upon the confused group, they were seen to draw back a pace or two from the edge of the chasm, fling away their arms and plunge into the big stream.

Like an unusually long and loud clap of thunder broke forth a long undulating volley from nearly fifty thousand rifles from the nationals, tearing the water into foam. Many were shot in the water and there was a minute of suspense on each side and then a cheer rang out of defiance, exultation and victory, as the survivors of the brave fellows were seen to reach the other side, pulled to land by a score score of thousands of welcoming hands.

Then it was seen with great consternation that barely a few planks laid on would complete the restoration of the bridge as the nationals could cross. Their own cannon had gone to the rear with the retreating army, and the christian army beyond had battery on battery trained on the narrow spot-----it was death to show in the line of the all but finished causeway. Out stepped from the ranks of Colonel Alton Maxwell a lieutenant of infantry.

"Is there a Regiment of men here who will risk all for glendelinian?"

A thousand eager voices shouted "AYE."

"Then " said he " we will successfully cover the army's retreat."

"How?"

"The bridge must go down."

Gripping axes and crowbars the devoted band rushed from the cover of the woods and dashed forward upon the newly laid beams. A peal of artillery, a fusillade of musketry from the other side and the space was swept with shell, grape-shot, and bullets. With the smoke cleared away the bodies of all these brave men lay on the bridge riddled with shot. They had torn away some of the beams and dynamited portions of the bridges but every man of the 1,000 had perished.

Out from the ranks of the same Corps dashed two times more than many volunteers, they being two thousand more who will die for Glundelinia. Again across the bridge rushed the hero. Again the spot was swept by a murderous storm of shot. The smoke lifted from the scene. Nine hundred and fifty of the second band lay dead upon the bridge, the rest continued to work until out of the two thousand only fifty survived but the work was done the bridge was finally destroyed. Though the army was saved at this portion the Christian armies got across the river at shallower parts and toward evening the whole Glundelinian army had been forced in such a headlong rout that it had retreated fifty five miles in one day.

28,428,000 killed and wounded up to 150,000,000 on the side of the enemy on that morning of the second day of battle in the greatest conflict probably so far ever written. Losses of dead wounded and missing in the battle of Logen Zoo Run October 15th and 16th 1910. Figures go on---

GLUNDELINIAN LOSSES.

IN THE Logen Zoo Run battle out of 284,000,000 Glundelinians engaged, comes the loss as follows: Second FIRST DAY OF OCTOBER 15 Morning alone.

Dead.....28,428,000.
Wounded.....150,000,000.
Missing.....45,678,999.

GLUNDELINIAN LOSSES ON FIRST DAY OF BATTLE.

2Dead.....12,000,000.
Wounded.....122,000,000.
Missing.....84,000,000.

The above list includes or adds 1,000 Glundelinian generals killed, 2,000 wounded sixteen thousand officers of all rank wounded, and 10,000 killed, and four thousand officers missing or prisoners

ON THE CHRISTIAN SIDE AT THE START OF THE BATTLE OF LOGAN ZOO HA R RAN RUN 282,000,000 MEN WERE ENGAGED, BUT AT THE ARRIVAL OF GENERAL CONCENTINIAN ARONBURG ABREAHNIAN TROOPS WERE POURING INTO THE BATTLE LINE AS FAST AS THEY WERE BEING RECRUITED. THE LOSSES IS AS FOLLOWS:

GENERAL HANSONIAE COMMAND
DEAD.....2,188,744
WOUNDED.....50,000,000
MISSING.....18,111,111

GENERAL VIVIANANAS COMMAND.
DEAD.....5,400,000
WOUNDED.....50,000,000
MISSING.....10,000,000

GENERAL VIVIANAS COMMAND.
DEAD AND WOUNDED 81,000,000.
Missing.....22,500,000

General NEROS COMMAND
DEAD.....8,000,000
WOUNDED.....14,111,498

GENERAL CONCENTINIAN ARONBURG COMMAND.
DEAD AND WOUNDED.....17,000,000.

This frightful battle had raged nearly two days or at least a day and a half. It had been a regular hail storm war, one of the fiercest, bloodiest and extremely furious battles ever seen in the war before. At THE ending of the second days conflict toward noon general Schmids right and left wings even during the beginning of the disastrous retreat were frightfully demolished in opposing the frightful onslaughts of Concentinian Aronburgs army. General Concentinian Aronburgs army was irresistible and the whole Glundelinian army was thrown back and rolled up crushed to smithereens hundreds of generals fell, and the Christians at this point had carried all before them. Even then before the disaster became general general Stanek Hadley came up with Glundelinian reinforcements and resumed the defense with redoubled fury. A million shell explosions tore up the landscape and all the country around for hundreds of miles was dominated by the din but at the highest fury of the conflict as stated before general Francis Schmidt was killed his right wing was annihilated and the whole surviving line out to pieces and driven back in a rout a hundred times worse than that of the French at Waterloo. The first report of the Glundelinian losses known in wounded and prisoners alone was about 28,000,000, while the Christian losses was about 28,000,000. The losses in dead was not yet given. After the disaster general Stanek Hadley took general Schmids command and the former with what was left of the Glundelinian army continued in continuing the retreat under cover of an heavy October Snowstorm of the greatest intensity, and two days later on October 20th a little more than a week after the battle rallied his forces at Virginia and Majorie Francis Atlanta Junction near Virginia Run Creek and prepared to make a final stand.

But it seemed improbable. By this time the total Glundelinian losses was known. It was 284,000,000 in dead wounded and missing. While the Christian loss was reported to be 184,799,855 in killed wounded and missing.

While he was still advancing ignorant of general Hadleys threatening stand, news came in to Concentinian Aronburg by telegraph that general Rankine Glundelinian after spending forty days and forty nights in getting scores of miles per hour, had blown a large portion of the sides of the Volcano called Mt Vivian into the air thus causing the sea to pour in in millions of tons, producing the volcano into a sudden violent eruption. The sudden explosion hurled boulders three hundred to a thousand feet, or to a distance of fifteen miles at certain intervals, the boulders being thirty to ninety feet in diameter.

This eruption caused by the Glundelinians had turned day into night in its vicinity for forty eight days, and covered the cities of Calvernia, and many of the other neighboring cities and towns and the whole country side with a layer of ash that varied in thickness from a few inches to several feet. The narrow escape of the inhabitants during this great eruption though other inhabitants later on to keep well out of the danger zone of volcanoes, and this eruption of the Volcano Mt Vivian though most exceedingly violent did not threaten to do as much damage the Glundelinians had expected as it discharged mostly ashes, stones and vapors then liquid lava.

Indeed the Glundelinians on noon before were resorting to all means in their now desperate condition to check the Christian advance, but the attempts to force the force the eruption of other volcanoes, did not daunt the Christians, and it was believed now by the whole world that all Glundelinians would soon be forced out of Calvernia. But nevertheless general Willibrodus Zimmermann knew different. He knew it would take over another year to drive the foe out of Calvernia, that it would cost many more millions of lives to do so. Even then he did not know how large the Glundelinian army was that confronted him, and though he felt sure of success he would nevertheless be very cautious, and not allow the enemy to take him unawares.

yearly every day until the 28th general Hadley would make some sort of demonstration or other up on any portion of the christian line as he took advantage of, striking some blow here, or striking another there, but the conflict only lasted a few hours for every day, no engagement was general, or decisive but nevertheless each one in fury and honor for those few hours was to that of Gettysburg put together. That general concentration around after planning to attack was inactive so long until surprised general Hadley, and also made him cautious, suspicious and anxious. He feared that the great general was up to something, and therefore on the morning of the 27th the grand old general started something like a general action but when noon approached he drew off. but on the morning of the 28th not waiting for general Zimmermann to attack and believing that his series of great demonstrations upon the christian line would cause Zimmermann to withdraw large forces of troops from his extreme right upon which the demonstration was again repeated, Hadley at ten o'clock had kindly advanced all his forces all along the line confronting the christian right, and began a mighty concentration upon that christian wing. An hour had passed after the fierce demonstration had been in full progress toward the christian right, it extended along the left and center and yet the battle along the right had now grown to its full strength and was a screaming fury millions of the foe hurling themselves forward with insane ferocity against the christian line making one of the most frightful the noise of the hundreds of thousands of projectiles, in the air overhead, and the bursting of the shells making thousands of holes in the thunderous explosion, was mingled with that of the roaring, crashing artillery of both sides carrying on their so most terrific mutual battle.

A leading officer to a fine bayonet charge the division general outstripped them all, and found himself for some moments fighting almost single handed against ten to one. But he was inspired by the faultless courage of their leader, and those amongst them who were soon at his side, the position being carried against enormous odds, and the intrepidity of that leading officer and the risk he had taken was on every tongue.....

U6 THE ENEMY STRIVE FIERCELY TO RETAKE THEIR LOST POSITIONS.....

All the while during the attack the very air was an uproar of yells, as if a hundred million demons had been let loose and the immense million cannon like roar of the battle, and time and again

All along the whole line of battle a grim harvest of lives was reaped by the terrible christian fire. The glandelinian onslaught

The landelinian soldiers enraged by the strenue resistance of the christians only went at it again and soon nothing was seen of this frightful line of charge but seas of wrecks, hundreds of thousands of slain millions of injured, and torn and mangled smokes enveloped lines in gray surging forward. Scenes of the most indescribable desolation and horror was exposed to view. Here the dead and injured and dying christians numbered 2,222,564,.....???

In the meantime while the firing was at it's hottest, and the onslaught onslought at it's fiercest, the main swing of the Alandelinian front was immediately noticed by General Maxwell and Hannonia Jennings, who saved their commands from disaster in time by bringing to bear all their massive batteries which cut the Alandelinians down like the tornado does leaves of out to the corn field, and sent the survivors flying like terrified cattle in a stampede. Had he been too late general Zimmermann's right flank would have been turned The officers of the signal stations had discovered the same thing, and by the Glandelinians had fired to signal the threatened christian lines, but the uproar of the battle had given them no chance but nevertheless as the assault had threatened and struck at the threatened point, the Glandelinians encountered the blaze of cannon along general Hanson's lines while tore their whole line of assault to pieces laying the whole line down as to save. At other points however the main Glandelinian advance was not checked and the maddened Glandelinians tore on through the christian line of fire, sweeping upon the christian lines in columns after columns only to dissolve away completely. It was a frightful sight.

Not a single tree was left standing now in the whole battle field which seemed to turn into a war of hell against heaven from the clamor. At the same time the battle roared and raged in maddened shrieking fury along the line at this point the Glandelinian surge swept upon the works supported personally by Zimmermann but a great artillery storm completed the destruction by musketry fire and machine guns, and the whole Glandelinian surge shattered through and through and scathed recoiled, but other divisions went to it with might and main as to give the christians no respite.

However the fury of the christian fire carried all before it, every Glandelinian column giving way once more, death and indescribable destruction lurking in the wake of the Glandelinian columns of musketry and artillery fire. The christian fire swept the whole Glandelinian front the whole length cutting wide swaths in every direction and causing incalculable damage.

Indeed it was along the whole line of battle, that the Glandelinian columns continued their career of horrendous destruction, and now as the entire assault was on in general not one of the christian brigades were inactive, thousands of the Glandelinian regiments disappearing as fast as the christian fire was poured upon them. The approaches of the christian lines was continually swept, every Glandelinian column coming within range being annihilated, and though time and again the main columns swarmed over the works they only went back mangled and completely crushed.

The christian fire scathed the Glandelinian surges terribly, but columns after columns advanced onward, and terrible was the destruction among the battalions in gray. All that was left was small remnants and the Glandelinian divisions under general Johnston, Pullaway and Edwin Wickersham and Dolores were wiped out completely. The christian fire as the Glandelinian assault tore on gave a horrifying display of carnage the hose like play of the christian and nothing and machine guns at times racked among the lines of the enemy and thus fan shaped gaps were torn among the main line of the enemy by the three scores.

The christian artillery of the highest calibre made clean sweeps over immense territories, the storm of shells and explosions, carrying all before it. Hundreds of Glandelinian brigades felt the destructive force of the fire blast along the christian line and reeled back in fragments. Anderlinias and Bavaria Riches divisions were wiped out with the deaths of their commanders, and Confections army was called and reeled back. The main force of a furious christian counter charge tore back the Glandelinian assault, the chief disasters of all for the army laying in the path of these powerful christian counter charges, which followed every repulse of the Glandelinians suffered, and at times the counter charges routed the Glandelinians.

Jennings' divisions encountered a fire along the christian front which annihilated thousands of their regiments at once the battle making the greatest roar ever imagined, and all the columns that were hurled forward were wiped out amid a storming blizzard of trees and wreckage splintered by a hurricane of explosives the loss of life among the brave Glandelinians being terrible, and the greatest sorrows and horrors was witnessed. Every Glandelinian column that went to the attack was shattered into fragments, and fully 1,100,000 Glandelinians perished at this point, and here hardly a Glandelinian division could stand before the furious christian fire. One hundred and fifty thousand ranks in gray had been crushed to pieces in a moment by a furious counter charge, sixty big columns, seven hundred brigades, and all the other surging Glandelinian forces were almost cut down, and over nine hundred thousand men in the foremost column or line were torn down to their deaths by the christian fire, and two hundred and fifty thousand who escaped unharmed were either rendered blind deaf or insane from the terrifying din. Seven other Glandelinian brigades shattered themselves against the unbroken christian line, and out of one thousand other columns of gray coats which had vent forward into that ghastly assault only four returned to the lines but in shattered fragments, many of the survivors even dropping with gore. Hundreds of other ranks were literally mowed down the scores of thousands of christians cannon of heavy calibre and machine gun fairly scouring the heavens with their drum-fire fire men on the christian side were dashed a thousand yards by the concussion of Glandelinian shells, thousands of human beings and horses were thrown into the air, and landed stunned and bleeding to the ground.

The battle raged with a stupendous fury and violence, the whole gray surge every time it rallied being again and again cut and torn to pieces and still and all they would not give up.

Hadley was the leader of the main assaulting column and the more his divisions were crushed the more he went to the storming. It was along the main section of Hadley's assaulting column that the christian fire threatening annihilation to all the divisions that encountered it caused the enemy's advance to swerve more to their own center, but still with all their fury the Glandelinians stormed the christian lines and here after his onslaught was repulsed there was left a sea of wreckage, mingled with myriads of dead, wounded, and dying. It was again a regular hell of destruction, many of the Glandelinian generals being killed, and many of the dead Glandelinian soldiers were found so mangled and crushed that any one could have studied on them to typify anything on the battle in this war in doing damage or killing so many multitudes.

Several hundred Glandelinian intestines and all were seen hanging from the branches of trees unscathed from the terrible storm of shell fire. The whole scene there was a veritable sea of wreckage, bodies and desolation on the ground was ploughed up in ridges of earth and mingled with the bodies of the slain. Here it was predicted the heaviest loss of life in this part of the great battle line and the most terrible destruction of nature's works.

The loss herein Glandelinian general was twenty five thousand in killed wounded and prisoners in which two thousand five hundred and sixty nine were majors, colonels, first lieutenants, and captain and generals and the combined losses in officers altogether in lowest ranks leaving out the generals was 5,264.

The injured amounted to three thousand three hundred and twenty two. This great onslaught was as terrifying a sight as ever met the eyes of men. It was more awe inspiring than a tidal wave or a volcanic eruption, the Glandelinians during the onslaught having charged again and again with seething violence and with appalling fury, thousands of men being blown into the air by shell explosions, others were hoisted into the air or whirled heels over head and compelled to turn many cartwheels from the severe shell concussions.

But it was all in vain. Hadley had lost over two quarters of his numbers, Zimmermann three and finally the latter gave up the fight, and his army or what was left of it retreating in the wildest confusion. The known Glandelinian losses in slain alone was over 8,000,000. Christian losses in slain was over 2,000,000.

EVANS ENDEAVORS TO MOVE FOR GENERAL ZIMMERMANN'S LINES IN HIS EFFORTS TO JOIN GERMANIA VIVIAN. BUT THERE ARE NO CHANCES AS YET.

A week after the great action at Worms run and after Zimmermann's victory at Virginia orbit run, Jack Evans learning that great activist was threatening at Cromer Androm, and that general Germania was in command of the vast Glandelinian army confronting the christians there, decided to go for general Zimmermann's lines and lay for the Glandelinian rascal and Angelinian traitor if possible. He was well enough to be around by this time, but Violet and her sisters though immensely improved in their condition still used oracles incessantly, and he felt there was no leaving them, so he decided to state his affairs to general Vivian so as to have them come with him.

General Vivian was very busy the time Evans inquired to have to the interview with him, but nevertheless general Vivian accepted the invitation and listened to all he said, and of his intentions of taking the Vivian girls with him. At first general Vivian remained silent then turning abruptly said:

"Well my boy I can't really know what to decide. You know my little girls were not what they were months ago, and utterly helpless in the power of their enemies. Even to send them off under a guard of ten thousand men is no protection at all for the Glandelinians attack and annihilate their guardians as your experience during the battle of him and bring the spy outside of the lines, and see to her immediate execution, by being cut to pieces and crucified."

ORDER OF THE GERMANIAN
TRIPPLIAN, COME TO CONSIDER
BY THE THREE HANDELINIAN.

A glancing expression came over the rascal's face as he said:
"Achance I've been snitting for, in a long time!" "There for handily, and your power, and you can torture her as far as you see fit, before killing her."

He then ordered one of the guards to bring the child. Indeed the rascal clever and foxy as he was felt for it never recognizing Evans or the fake in front of him, and to make it more like a clever one Evans part le and reall Handeliniens with him, tricking old Germania. A few minutes passed, then the guard returned, bringing a very pretty, but such a ragged little creature into the room that Evans was surprised.
The unhappy child shrank back at the sight of the new Handeliniens who pretended to be furious, and seized her roughly.

"Off to the execution grounds," thundered Evans. And they were off, Germania never suspecting that he had been cleverly tricked by one of his bitterest enemies. The Handeliniens as long as they were within the lines acted furiously toward the child, proclaimed the execution when ever questioned, showing the death warrant, and doing everything possible to prevent suspicion.
It took an hour's marching to pass through the lines, and the series lines of sentinels but finally they were out. The child had remained quiet all the while despite even the supposedly rough treatment by the Handeliniens. One of the threatening torture and death coming to her, which made them all realize that she was a dangerous little girl, and worthy indeed of her clever rescue.

"Good," said Evans when halfway about two miles from the enemy's lines.
"The scene was cleverly carried out, and the fool older as he is fell for it."

"Yes indeed," said Gertrude. "But then this is something serious. Won't you men get discovered and be put to death if he finds this out?"
"I'll prevent that," said one of the soldiers. "I have a dead child
I have found around here lately, that will substitute for this little girl. I'll fix it that he will never discover that this little girl has been rescued."

This conversation was so low however, that the little girl did not hear a word, and when the two separated from the Handeliniens the surprised little girl did not know what to make of it. The soldiers soon disappeared out of sight altogether, and Evans taking the little girl on his shoulders, in his arms, placed her on his horse, and away the two went to the German lines.

"We will have to be careful that we don't be arrested by the Christians again," said Evans. "The first arrest means considerable delay , and maybe serious might be happening if we are mistaken for a Handeliniens dog again."

"Since we are through why not discarding the disguise," said Gertrude.

"It is too soon yet," said Evans. "But we can do so when within sight of general Wiestien's lines."

To tell the truth, the startled child who had been rescued did not know what to make of the performance at all. She knew that she was supposed to be "Executed", as the Handeliniens call child murder, and yet the separation of the two squads of Handeliniens from her two captors, and the two going off in another and opposite direction where where she herself knew the Christian lines to be, and the low conversat ion had her completely puzzled. And also flabbergasted.

It was an hour after when the distant tents of Wiestien's lines loomed in view, and going off in two separate directions, Gertrude taking the little girl with her they discarded their disguises. The child was still more surprised when she saw that the supposed Handeliniens, was a beautiful little girl three years older than herself, but she was still more surprised when she saw Evans again, in the full uniform of an Abbeonnan colonel. She could hardly speak with amazement. But then she only thought that it was a new disguise, because she was clever enough to know that no Handeliniens would dare to enter the Christian lines in their gray uniform, and believed that the little girl with him was only a accomplice, to help him through the Christian lines unscathed, and decided to expose the both as soon as they were within the Christian lines, and get them captured, at least to insure her own escape from the supposed Handeliniens. He placed her gently on his horse and mounting it he and Gertrude continued their way toward the Christian lines. The little girl indeed wondered at the gentle way he had lifted her, and even when they passed through the Christian camp she had no opportunity to betray her supposed captors. Nevertheless she was bound to get away at all costs but how? Ayho she thought that by snatching the officers gun she could level it at him, but then she feared that the supposed Handeliniens would be too desperate to even since when a gun would be pointed at him, and that it would only prove her undoing. An hour more passed and the two were waiting for a train to arrive which would pull through Wiestien's lines, and being at the Pandora railway station. Here the little girl thought she saw her chance and was going to make a grab at his gun when the ticket Agent shouted:

"Oh Colonel Evans, come around and exchange your tickets I've given you the tickets for the southbound train by mistake."

Just as Evans secured the right tickets the De-Hollester and Pandora train came puffing in and Evans and Gertrude with the little girl hastened on. The little girl had lost her last chance before the train came up, but she was not discouraged and decided to try again.

She was in a seat with Evans, being by the window and as it was open, she made one flying leap, but Evans caught her in the nick of time for if she had succeeded in jumping out of the window Evans and Gertrude would have probably found her remains under the trucks of the coaches... for she would have been drawn under by the force of the wind created by the speed of the train, which at that moment was running sixty five miles an hour.

"What in the name of heaven are you trying to do, make a fool out of yourself?" inquired Evans sternly, almost angrily and speaking in a sharp tone. "What ails you anyway? Why did you do it if I had not grabbed you you could be instantly killed."

Gertrude only looked reproachfully at the little girl and then said:
"Don't let her sit by the window Evans or she may try it again. Maybe she is afraid of the ride, or something in this train."

"I'm not afraid of the train or anything in this train," said the little girl pouting. "I'm bound to get away from you two and will yet."

"What has got into you?" inquired Gertrude. "What did we do to you that you want to run away from us?"

The child did not answer he but only started to cry.

"Here now come out with it and tell your troubles," said Evans more gently. "What is the matter do you fear us, hate us or something?
What is the matter with us?"

"The child at first stubbornly refused to answer and Evans said kind of sternly:

"I thought you was a Christian, a good little Christian girl who appreciates a good deed done for her."

"I am," shot back the youngster. "I would not do a sinful deed if every dirty Handeliniens but other in the nation would kill me one after another if I had to die all those many times, and if I had as many lives to lose."

"But why this ingratitude then? You proved yourself very ungrateful to us from your actions, after we faced capture to bring you out of Germania Germanian lines. If we were rascally Handeliniens as you suspected we would have done some what we warranted to that rascal of a Germania.
I'm sorry that you ever went this far but you only did it as I see you think we are Handeliniens. After this is done with Germania full good and all for he may have impressed upon you that there were no good men in the world. I'm simply heartbroken the way you have shown your ingratitude offered toward me after rescuing you and if it had not been for your mistake in thinking we were Handeliniens ours I would have regretted this errand. I had to trick Germania by that fake death warrant to get you out of his clutches, and even was risking my freedom and life, and yet you distrust us and try to get away."

"But surely you are one of the Handeliniens child butchers and their officers are not net." Retorted the child with as much spirit as she could assume. If you are I'm fear you not and will expose you two the first opportunity I get."

Evans realized by this answer realized that he and Gertrude were suspected by the child as Handeliniens and he said with a laugh:

"Expose me if you will---but you will fail to bring on my arrest. I'm not a Handeliniens and neither is this little girl here. We were disguised as Mandelins. Do you suppose an Angelinian, Abbeccanin, or either christian soldier in any case would enter the camps of the enemy without a disguise and a grey coat, the only disguise as no other would work. You thinking me as a Mandelinian of course is an excuse excusable and it is ridiculous for any Mandelinian to go on a spying trip with two children with him who are so pretty, as as you ought to know Mandelinians only use boys who are as men looking as they can can be. I'm colonel Jack Evans of general Vivian's army and if you have not heard of me before you will now.

The child did not answer him but Gertrude realizing the child's mistake said to Evans;

"Evans don't be too hard on the little girl. She must surely have thought we were Mandelinians and anyhow the Mandelinians are so treacherous and distrustful that I don't blame her for her fears of us and our being among the Mandelinian camps and before Germania, and our pretense and of fury and brutality toward her in our endeavors to fool Germania was enough to make her suspicious. Don't be hasty Evans. She did not mean any harm.!!!!"

"Well she was kinda hasty herself laughed Evans. "Tough it is excusable for her, she sees my scarlet uniform and it is very mistakable for any one to believe believe that any child no matter who she is would go along with a dangerous Mandelinian to help him pass through the christian lines softly during his secret service work, and who would turn on her when work was done. Yet I'm afraid it will be some time before I can convince that I'm no Mandelinian, and that I'll have to mix with the Vivian girls to prove who I really am."

Gertrude felt sad over the affair, but she knew that when she suspected them of Mandelinians nothing it seemed but proof could turn her, but nevertheless she sat by the little girl, and told her all the truth, who Evans really was, where he was going to take her, and of him being the guardian of the little girls of general Vivian called the Vivian girls the daughters of the greatest general of the army next to Hanson Vivian. She did all she could to tell everything and finally the little girl was fully convinced of her mistake, but all her apologies were not needed for as she threw her arms around his neck she found him in his firm embrace and then still holding her he got up and walked to the rear of the coach and showed her the scenery as the train flew past the landscape.

THE BURNING OF EVANGELINE CURRAN.

As he stood there for some time with the two little girls he noticed that the train was slowing down, having reached the town of Evangeline Curran. He wondered if the train was going to stop, and as it went down one or two of the steps he looked toward the direction of the town. . . .

"GOOD GOD IT IS A VOLCANO OF FIRE AND SMOKE." He gasped. "No wonder we are stopping we are stalled."

"The enemy set it on fire this morning after meeting Hanson." Said one of the christian soldiers on the train who had been on short furlough. "There had not been any engagement though."

The train was now backing up, running at a lively rate, and now on account of turning onto a new line, the swing made by the coaches brought to full view the burning town, and the passengers were all filled with excitement. Indeed the scene was great and awe inspiring it being the biggest fire that Evans had ever seen consuming a small city anyway.

It looked more sublime and terrific than any of the forest fires he had ever seen or rescued. A lot and her sisters from and the rolling thunder like heads of smoke extended to a great height, spreading out far above the sky like a cloud canopy during a violent eruption of some mighty volcano and even had convulsions way up there also. The cloud of smoke extended to about the height of twenty thousand feet in all its solidity and power and blackness.

The sky seemed red all along the whole horizon and a thick bluish haze was observed outside, the smell of burning wood and other materials being plainly on in the atmosphere.

How far the burning town was he nor any of the passengers could ascertain but he believed it only several miles for the train had almost run into the fiery inferno before it had slowed down. The train was now running northward on the new line and for hours that night the passengers had a full view of that distant burning town and at times the glow rose more suddenly against the sky and the scene held every one spellbound.

Evangeline Curran as Evans knew was generally called a city, town, but nevertheless was as large as the city of Chicago or larger than New York and Chicago put together, and then burning like it was in thousands of sections at once it made quite a big roaring inferno of fire seas. When daylight approached the scene was then far off but it left an impression on all that the enemy was certainly committing inhuman and wanton destruction, where ever they went either after a defeat or a victory, and they all had a feeling that a swarm of Mandelinians would yet appear and attack the train and massacre them all. But after daylight broke scores of miles passed away and nothing unusual happened and after an hour passed he saw that his destination was fast approaching and he signalled the conductor to let him and his two companions off at the next town which the train usually don't stop at, and then went back to his seat. He was silent now, more silent than he had ever been before in his life. Gertrude and the little one had eyed him curiously and he noticing it said;

"Well I suppose you are wondering at my silence. Well I am wondering something myself Gertrude. And what it is I, in concerning that burning town or city we just passed. One of the soldiers on the other car said to me that it had been set on fire by the retreating enemy. Now I doubt this because about eight o'clock last night we just reached the vicinity of that town, passed through it at nine, rescued the little girl here at nine thirty, and came back on this train at ten after ten to find this town all aflame, and seemingly to the entire city of Evangeline Curran burning at once. It is certainly impossible that if an enemy was retreating last night they could have come upon Evangeline St. Clare or Curran so soon. There is a mystery in that blaze."

"I doubt it myself in one way." Said Gertrude. "The nearest Mandelinian army that we know of is at Cromer Andrea, which we just left and Evangeline Curran is a hundred and fifty miles away from those Mandelinians. What do you suppose was the cause of the fire Evans? Have you any idea?"

"No." Said Evans. "I have not any idea at all. As I said before there is a mystery in that blaze. But I am sure just the same that though its cause cannot be from retreating Mandelinians, that it is incendiary just the same, as enemy firefugs are lurking in all our Galverinian towns and cities far from the christian lines, who have a way of setting great fires."

By this time the train had reached the town Evans had picked to get off at, and at the moment it got stopped, Evans and the two children got off. Glancing toward the south they could still see the smoke of the far distant burning city but not very plainly. Evans realizing that the distance to general Hanson's lines decided to secure the loan of two horses, but could not find any body who had a single horse. Every one he asked said that they had given their horses to the christian armies, to be used by the cavalry or to draw artillery. . . . Evans then decided to take another train going northwest and inquired at the station when the next one was due.

"The next one is due to-morrow morning at ten thirty thirty." Said the agent. "Trains are scarce now you know, on account of the war."

"Fiddlesticks with the war." Said Evans sharply. "We simply have got to get to Hanson's lines and that's all there is to it. How far is his line from here? And what is the name of his this northwestern road?"

"I don't know anything about Hanson's lines. This is the Sendon railroad line."

"I mean how far is it to Hanson's army." Said Evans impatiently. "For the love of God man use your brains if you have any."

"I never heard of him before. And who is Hanson's army?"

"On hang a piece of rope on your not use your brains are dead." Said Evans angrily walking away. "Who is Hanson's army? Ha nobody home."

When he reached the two little girls who were waiting for him he said;

"First train due to-morrow at ten thirty. We have either got to walk or use a hand car. I asked the agent how far it is to Hanson's army but I guess from his answer to my questions, he is plump Bug-house Capital B. He asked me: "Who is Hanson's army? I never heard of him before!"

Gertrude laughed at me and said:

"Oh there's lots of those black-headed men at the stations nowadays. As so many of the real agents had went to join the black-armies. But probably he is the same."

Evans seeing one of the guards approaching asked him how far it was to Hanson's army.

The man was silent for a moment and then said:

"I know nothing about the distance of general Hanson's army. Were you from there colonel. I'm one of Zimmerman's men."

"Yes," said Evans. "I rescued this little girl from the clutches of general Germania Vivian and want to reach general Hanson's lines as quickly as possible."

"Well," I can say to you," said the soldier. "You got off the train too soon. What line was you on?"

"On the Mc-Mc-lester and Pandora," answered Evans. "We got off here because the train unable to pull through Evangeline curran on account of serious reasons turned on this northernmost line, and which would take us out of the way altogether. The stupid agent told me there is no trains till to-morrow at ten thirty."

"It is true indeed," said the guard. "But there is a freight train coming inside of an hour if you're willing to wait that long. That train will stop here if you signal the engineer."

"I can wait an hour but not all night," answered Evans.

After saluting in answer to the soldier's salute, Evans walked back with the little girl to one of the benches under the ticket agent's window and sat down. Noticing the ticket agent Evans went to the window noticing that it was another agent this time, and inquired how far Hanson's lines was.

"My goodness lad you are not going to talk it with those two little girls!" He exclaimed seriously.

"If necessary yes," answered Evans. "But one of the guards said that there is a freight train coming inside of an hour, and that I can catch it."

"It's due in ten minutes," said the agent. "That's your last shot up."

"Do you belong to Hanson's command?" He had been here once."

"No," said Evans. "I belong to general Vivian's command." But this little girl is a special friend of his and I had rescued her from the glandelinians though afterwards we had a hard time learning her that we were not real glandelinians. Those re-creants are so treacherous that I don't believe the devil would trust them himself."

"Well," I can assure you that he is from here about six hundred and fifty miles," said the agent. "I believe that other train took you clear out of the way. You made a great mistake in taking that northernmost line."

"It was a train not belonging to that line," said Evans. "For certain reasons it did not dare pass through Evangeline curran."

"Because that city is burning up," said the agent.

"Incendiary bombs, fired at random by the christians during a frightful extremely bloody battle at Dandin-Ara last night, set the city on fire, especially to a whole stretch of forests whose fire advanced upon the town. Indeed it was not only the smoke of the city you observed, but mostly of the burning forests."

"I thought something was causing the conflagration," said Evans. "Now I know."

The ten minutes were not now up, and the train was now lumbering into sight at a maddening pace. Evans waited until the train came near enough for the engineer to see his signals, and then signalled for the train to be stopped. At first the engineer thought there was something wrong on the road, and slowed down quickly, quicker than what was his wont, but Evans explained to the engineer the reason.

"The calicoose is the only coach you can ride on as all the others are full of munitions and provisions for general Vivian's lines, and that is all the further I go as all these carloads are only for him and general Hanson's."

Evans waited until the calicoose was pulled past the station, and then as the train stopped again the whole three got on.

There were several workmen in the calicoose as it's right name was, who indeed were surprised at the new comers, and at first thought that the two beautiful little girls were his own little children.

However Evans did not pay any attention to their gazes and remarks among themselves and sizing him up, but at last at one of the rough uncouth men came over to Evans and patting him playfully on the shoulder said:

"Well my lad don't you think it is rather risky to bring your two children on an ammunition train? What if the enemy would make attempts to blow us up? Wouldn't it make you feel --?"

"They won't do it if I can help help it," answered Eyn Evans. "And these two little girls are not my children. The older one is a companion, and the youngster is a refugee, capture, or rather taken by means of a clever trick from the clutches of general Germania Vivian, commanding the glandelinian army near Cromer Adrea."

"Oh I see," said the man. "And you are a colonel. I can tell by your uniform. How did you get through his lines without being detected?"

"A squad of friendly glandelinians helped us," said Evans. "And I am colonel Jack Evans of general Vivian's command. But just now I wish to go to Hanson's army as general Hanson is going to claim this little girl as his property hereafter. She will be his young adopted daughter."

"You are colonel Jack Evans?" gasped the man. "Why I've heard a good deal of you and general Vivian's daughters -- you guard us well. Congratulations my lad. I'm glad to know you. You are welcome to stay on this calicoose as long as you like. And I believe you three are hungry. We will prepare supper for you and you and the trainmen will eat together."

With this he went back to the curious men, told who their visitors were and then they started to get supper ready.

In the meantime Hanson's little adopted little girl had been feeling broken hearted over Evans' apparent coldness toward her and one of the men noticing her tear stained eyes as he had tried to find out what was wrong but she never said a word, for despite his apparent coldness, she did not want to tell on him and cause him trouble. Hence she kept still and started in with:

"It's my doing I presume." She suspected none of her treacherous glandelinian and after I had disengaged my discipline even and my words to her may have injured her feelings. I feared indiscriminate peril to rescue her and so did the other little girl with me. I suppose I appear cold toward her but I don't see where I appear so. Come come little girl." He added extending his arms toward the weeping child. "You have proved yourself a little heroine anyway. I'm not mean or cold to you. It's just my quietness and way of speaking to my friends. We will always be friends. Come little girl. What do you say? What do you say?"

The child approached him cautiously, and putting her hand to his hand she drew her close to him and folded her in his embrace, and held her to him a long time.

"Wait until you see your new uncle and his dear little Vivian girls," said Evans kindly. "They are perfect angels in human form, and you will like them as they are so good and kind."

Gertrude was surprised and happy to see this sudden change and finally he burst forth with:

"If it had not been for me men, her remains would have been found on the tracks for on this train we just go off from, she tried to jump out of the window, while the train was running sixty five miles an hour. She did this to escape me when she thought I was a ----"

All of a sudden there was a whistling sound, and one of the little girls' hair bands around her head cut in two and fell to the floor.

"It is one of my jumping beans that did that," laughed the man doing the cooking. "There are no glandelinians within seven hundred miles of here."

"I thought it was a shot," said Evans. "But how did she cut her hand?"

"The heat of it," said the man. "They are dangerous though in striking any person. They are real luglar knockouts."

It indeed was a wholesome supper on the train, and then just about nine o'clock the train pulled in its last station nine of eleven that evening, the station being way into the heart of the christian lines. After bidding a good farewell Evans at once made for the direction of Hanson's lines, Gertrude having gone in another direction being on her way to visit the Vivian girls. Evans knew that he was a long way from Hanson's lines and decided to take an auto and get there quicker which he did. He arrived within Hanson's lines about ten thirty, so hardly that he could hardly keep his eyes open, and seeking an empty tent he took the child in with him, and slept the rest of the night.

He did not wait for any breakfast, but started off immediately for Hanson's headquarters, it being unusually warm for a Galvianian April.

It was even starting to rain considerably and fearing that it would pour before very long Evans put his rain coat over the little girl to keep her dry. It was a long distance to Hanson's headquarters and it took an hour and a half before the two reached it. To make things more embarrassing the guard told him that the general was at General Viviane's headquarters, and would not be back for three days unless he specially called. It was more than twenty-eight miles to General Viviane's headquarters and so Evans ordered the man to bring the army wagon, and drive him and the little girl to General Viviane's headquarters. It was pouring rain now not furiously but considerably but the little girl was not at all wet. Evans drove so when the wagon drew up Evans got out and placed his raincoat around the little girl and carried her to the wagon lifting her in. He himself was almost soaking wet, but he did not mind it a bit. As he got on he sniffed, and remarked that a sulphurous smell was in the air.

The ride was not fast but a long one, and finally after two or three hours they drew up in front of Hanson's headquarters. Hanson learned that the general and General were expecting him, and were waiting at the headquarters where the Viviane girls called Violet and her sisters were.

"Another long drive," muttered Evans. "I suppose when I reach the Base hospital the two generals will be screaming at me."

He ordered the driver to drive to the hospital, which he did, and getting about half way to the hospital, the wagon was pulled into a mud hole and got stuck. In vain the driver lashed their horses frantically they could not go and Evans was furious. He himself tried to get the wagon out, by working the wheels of lift it as the horses pulled, but strong as he was even able to lift two hundred pounds with one hand was unsuccessful, and he had some of the soldiers bring up two extra teams. This was done but the more they pulled the deeper the wagon sank. Wedges, big boards, and crowbars were used but it was of no use.

"Get another wagon," shouted Evans. "And here after Mr. driver look out where you are going. This is no excuse. You saw the bog and ought to have passed along side of it."

The other wagon was brought up, and the child placed in it, and in ten minutes the journey was continued a little slower this time as the driver had been ordered to be cautious under the circumstances, and that another mud hole would be his own undoing, as Evans was not going to stand for any unnecessary delay.

THE TYPHOON CATCHES THEM UNPREPARED... (A_#_#_#_A_):...???

They had just traveled another mile or so when suddenly from the driven driver there came a low shocked cry. A puff of hot wind scorching and hissing was hurrying itself black and ominous from the wide expanse of the open woodland driving straight across the plains into the Christian lines. Other hot puffs of wind followed, each one being stronger than the proceeding. The sky all that morning had been lead colored but now it was of a strange wierd greenish hue, with an inkish black portent approaching swiftly from the southwest. The forest trees broke into a sickening writhing and twisting, p like spiteful waves of a wind tortured sea, making a strange ominous roar, that a woe the child. Then there was a dazzling flash of light followed by an ear-splitting crash of thunder, that rolled in many thousands of long echoes, and suddenly with a hiss like the touch of death a terrific sheeted torrent of rain came driving on, blotting out all the nearest fields, tents of the Christian soldiers, the lagoons, woods, glens and distant hills until nothing could be seen, while from the far distance an awe inspiring roar seemed to approach gathering in sound every moment.

"A TYPHOON," cried Evans. "Quick we will have to duck for a place of safety."

They both got off the wagon, Evans taking the terrific child off and groping under an overhanging ledge of rock in listening to the crash of the rain above.

They heard it beat down the branches of the trees of the distant woods and with the wind continuing to grow harder every minute, watched the gale beginning to fling thousands of the trees angrily to the ground, at one breath. Crash after crash of thunder rolled in deafening echoes. "Probably it's one of those Angelinian sea squalls," thought Evans groping further under the ledge of the rocks. "Maybe it will squall all night. Good God how I wish General Hanson and Vivian had stayed where they were in the first place."

Within five minutes more the supposed squall was the most monstrous screaming shrieking and roaring maddened gale that Evans had ever observed for a long time. It was impossible for Evans and even the little girl to hear the roar of the slowly devastated forests, but between the frequent lightning sheets which illuminated the whole region to blinding brightness, he imagined that the trees tremendous insane waves of trees were pounding each other with tremendous fury.

The screaming of the wind, and the snoring lightning and the ear-splitting thunder rolls frightened the little girl most, for she had never dreamed in her life that wind could ever blow so hard, and it seemed to blow from all points of the compass at the same time to her. It shook and tore on the strongest trees, hurling them down by hundreds per second, appalling the little girl until she threw her thin frail childish arms about Evans and clung to him shivering in every limb, from terror and confusion. The wind screamed like demons through the frantically waving forests, and on across the fields and through the plains indeed screaming like a mighty army of enraged devils and steamships together, beating even the long stalks of old dried up corn to the ground, whipping a trier lumen together so furiously that the beams branchless and tearing all before it. There was nothing she could compare this wind with, and to Evans it was no longer a mere squall.

It was a full grown typhoon of the wildest description, and the sudden increasing of the wind nearly maddened him from the frightful clamor. The wildest crashes of thunder was as often as a thousand cannon being fired incessantly, and suddenly he saw a whole mass of probably thirteen thousand big trees and three thousand other trees give a wild lurch there was a frightful appalling roar, and in the next moment they went crashing through the whole scene lying simultaneously illuminated with a dazzling blaze of lightning, a river of sky-pittles seem to tear the sky with a hissing roar followed by a thunder roll that sounded like a whole legion of volcanoes blowing up into the air.

A third redoubled fury of the wind came on with irresistible violence and screeched horribly like three hundred thousand demons. The Christian soldiers mostly all of them, were tumbling fearfully out of their torn huts and seeing all of their tents fly away like balloons, the wind catching them all and whirling them away like tufts of grass. Those who were quick enough, threw themselves flat on the ground, or climbed the strongest trees, at which they were sure the wind powerful as it would grow could not wrench loose. They were securing themselves among the highest trunks, with long pieces of rope.

Many thousands of the Angelinians had flung themselves on the ground holding to firmly and desperately to the lower bases of the trees and putting for breath. On each side of all the company streets, all the tents with all their contents, hundreds of pounds to many tons in weight, had been torn from their foundations and whirled away like tops. Evans could only snatch one look, while the little girl gasped, her eyes wide open with fright. The next instant the whirling of branches of a tree crashed into her. The wind veered and no longer were Evans and the children secure, and with great effort they buried their hands deeply into the mud and gravel, and clung with their faces to the ground fighting desperately to hold their own. Their eyes started and the wind howling horribly at them almost strangled them.

Their ears drummed so that they did not hear the crash of the trees, going down by scores of thousands per minute, and the wail of human despair about them. Then they were almost blinded, there was a shocking crash that rolled like a trillion cannon, and down came big hailstones as big as clock faces, there was a frightful increase of the winds, fury, and so tortured by the bombardment of hailstones and rain rain they suddenly lost their hold, and when they again tried to bury their hands in the gravel they felt a soldier who was mortally wounded writhing and squirming beside them. On one of his hands were several pieces of rope, which Evans immediately snatched.

Then he sprawled across the company street, toward the base of a mighty oak tree six feet broad, and having the little girl with him he clung there for some time, probably about a minute, until the fury of the wind went down for several moments.

He he clamped the trunk of the tree with his hands and tied himself and the little girl securely to the tree. When the wind again hit the tree it did not sway backwards or forwards, but vibrated like a piece of wire.

The tree as a whole stood almost motionless, vibrating like a long piece of wire. The vibration making them both dizzy, the sick both expecting the big ponderous tree to snap or go by the roots at any moment. A big tree similar in size just across the company street went that way, throwing its occupants fifteen soldiers to the ground as if they were ripe coconuts. A few minutes later after the storm had raged fifteen minutes the fury of the wind was unbelievable.

It was a screaming million fury, shrieking like a hundred million de mons, and the oak tree was vibrating and swaying and bending backwards and forwards so wildly that now the tree was rapidly loosening at its roots and there was no telling how much longer it was going to stand the strain of the screaming pine pain.

So heavy was it raining that the little child and Evan thought that the wind had dipped up all the water from the far distant sea and hurled it all across the lands at one time, the raindrops hitting her back and shoulders like cold leaden pellets, and the thunder was so furious, that it seemed as if the whole world had become torn suddenly with furious erupting volcanoes. The tree now swayed perilously as one of the roots loosened.

Evan doubling his body at the waist and clinging tighter to the child who was sobbing. Evan felt that he was weakening like the tree, for his strength by his most desperate efforts to keep the child from being wrested from him by the wind, was running from him faster than he had ever imagined it would, and it was the frightful fury of the hot wind that was exhausting him, and he felt that he certainly could not endure its unceasing impact much longer. And the rain! It would be a night long tumbling wall of water, the windstorm having already raged twenty minutes. It would sink to the very roots of the tree and tear them to pieces, and surely the tree would fall in a very few minutes. But the tree did not fall. After twenty five minutes, the tornado like hurricane delay with its backbone broken, for only a stiff tree breeze was broken. The water wall lay crumpled in the company streets of the big christian army camp and also in the fields. Except for the hard animal like groans of the trees still standing and swaying in the stiff breeze, and the low crying of the abating gale, all was becoming quiet. There was now no more thunder and lightning, and soon the breeze died down completely. Everything became a dead calm, the stars coming out and appearing like big pearls pinned to a piece of blue cloth.

Somewhere down a company street a dog splashed in the water howling mournfully. Before climbing down from the tree Evan looked about him almost bewildered and saw that the rain filled streets were cluttered with a corpse of dead animals, some of the bodies lying half in the water, and half out battered and broken. On that no life was lost among the soldiers which was a miracle indeed. However not a tent of any kind had been left to shelter them, and even the strong infirmary buildings and thousands of the mess halls, all solid wooden buildings of great size and strength were completely gone, not even a little wreckage of the houses being left to mark the place where they formerly stood.

The force of the twenty five minutes wind storm had practically hurled all of it into the fields or down upon the far distant bench hundreds of miles away, and but one tree out of ten were spared. Two of these were wrecks their windage shorn, and their long trunks split half way down. No sun was not yet up the next morning after Evan and the little girl worked and tired had trudged on for miles over branches and twigs that they found themselves soon on the edge of a flooded cornfield looking for the way to the base hospital, as the roadways on account of the thickly strewn wreckage of trees was completely impassable. The fields were draining slowly and it would be hours before the fields would be passable. He remembered suddenly that there was another way. Back by the wind torn forest an uncovered path ran around to the other side of the camp. There was one big obstacle in it however and that was it was too long a distance. He knew he could follow this until he was almost behind the wreckage strewn regions and then by walking along the dry edges of the fields which lay perpendicular to the path he would reach the base hospital, which he felt sure had been strong enough to stand the strain of the cyclone.

As he looked toward the grove he saw that the hurricane had demolished the infirmary, which was equally as strong as the base hospital though not one third as large, and his heart sank at the thought that the base hospital was also wrecked by the screaming gale.

All that remained of the infirmary was a section of the wall and a portion of the screen veranda. However searching or searching the grounds of the base hospital he had discovered that the beautiful building had stood well against the typhoon, and with joy in his heart he plunged on through the mud and reached it in a jiffy. Hanson and general Vivian were there all right and what a reception he got when he brought the little girl up to Hanson. Violet and her sisters alone were not with Hanson or general Vivian but he knew that they were probably in the ward and went to find them. But they were not, and on inquiring the only answer was: "That they know not where they were."

He believed then that they must have went to some other wards, but though he inquired at every ward, there being thirty or of them he could not find them. Finally sad at heart, and fearing something happened to them he returned to where general Hanson and Vivian were with the little girl. General Vivian saw Evan's sober look as he came up and said:

"Well Evan! my boy, get the blues so soon. What's wrong?"

"I fear your daughters are gone, or something has happened to them. They are missing."

"Where were you looking for them?" Asked general Vivian.

"In every ward of this hospital." He answered. "And I could not find them at all."

"Well just go into my room and look there." Said general Vivian.

"And you will be rewarded for your trouble."

"Why I never thought of that." Answered Evan. "I overlooked that room thinking only of the wards."

He quickly stepped into the room and indeed there they were, sitting on a bed and playing a game of cards and checkers among themselves. At his entrance they gave a startled but joyous cry, and they relieved him so warmly that he was surprised.

"Why Evan dear boy, we did not expect to see you back so soon." Said Violet.

"Did you find out where the poor little girl is?"

"I brought her right here." Said Evan. "She is in Hanson's possession now. Germania Vivian your wayward brother had her in his possession in his headquarters, and by a clever trick with the help of Gertrude Angelina I just simply succeeded in bringing her here. Don't Germania be mad though when he finds out how I fooled him, and made off with the little girl."

"Oh why did you not bring her in?" Asked Violet almost reproachfully.

"We want to see her."

"I'll go and get her." Said Evan, and he did....." () ()

THE BATTLE OF LITTLE DAMIANIA. FEBRUARY 26TH...

In the meantime Germania Vivian did discover that he had been tricked, that the child had only been rescued, and not only that but he had been made a fool of by some treacherous Glandelinians, who had helped in this scheme, and his rage knew no bounds. He blamed the whole matter on general Francis Smith, for not watching more closely for spies, and threatened to have him removed from his command. Nevertheless though he had been so fooled, Germania, was bound to retake the little girl, and capture Evan at all costs. He learned that a great part of Francis Smith's army had been swept to pieces in an inferno of blood and hellish carnage lasting forty eight hours at Little Damiania, causing forest fires which burned Evangelina Urrau, and promised forgiveness if he would hold firmly against the Glandelinians army, until he could come up.

But despite all his promises it was impossible for Francis Smith's army to hold even an inch of ground, against the christian assailants, who nevertheless despite their victory had suffered extremely heavy losses. When they had met the thousands, upon thousands of big and small machine guns, which kept up a continuous blaze they only flung a wave after wave sixty miles long against the gray line, and forced the Glandelinian positions after wading over the fields of intermingled bodies of the dead and dying, and seas of blood. The frightful battle of Little Damiania, with the situation on the side of the Glandelinians critical, had swung two and fro, changing aspects every quarter of an hour, until gradually on the second day, despite their losses the christians were completely winning. Hourly the christian losses in their men killed and wounded continued to suppress any defiance, hundreds of thousands strong, losing three quarters of their number as they charged in massive formation, and hundreds of companies withdrew from the fighting lines with their combat strength reduced to ten men. Even for those forty eight hours, backward from the frightful battle field, there had flowed a tide of millions of mangled wounded men, filling Christian hospitals and red cross trains. This horrible wastage of humans was incalculable, every mile of the land became being strewn with the dead and wounded, here and there thickly strewn men lying closely intermingled, but level form, and there and there mountainous heaps of mortality. On the great stretch of this frightful battle field, there had been seen immense multitudes of landshinians, all fighting backwards with the Christian waves pressing them closer, and leaving long lines of dead in their wake. The Christians broke through the line in general success on the afternoon of the second bloody day, and in a fog of gunpowder smoke so thick that the landshinian machine gunners could not see fifty feet ahead at times, streamed through in columns. General Ke' Kelley's landshinian musketeers held on to their forward redoubts until almost annihilated, and general Kelley's landshinian falling back blew up bridges, and fought desperately to blow up bridge rebands, fighting desperately against incessant attacks. But these were also carried.

Germania had indeed intended to rush his forces upon Smith's assailants, but he never got time to make a move, for the same typhoon came that had struck general Hanson and Viviana lines, also striking Germania lines, and also swept upon the regions where the great battle had been raging, and came upon them as if a million demons had kicked it out of the infernal regions. The main center swept upon the region of Germania lines, and also upon the Christian camps, of those armies besieging the city. He saw neither Christian or enemy escaping. In this region the violence of the wind carried all before it sweeping especially Germania lines with terrible carnage and devastation, killing thousands of his men, leaving not a single tree of any size of the immense forests standing, and depriving Germania army of many of its cannons, and wrecking those too heavy to be blown away. Not even a single tent, barracks, and mess halls were left to them. Structures of every kind, even all the infirmaries, post offices, and headquarters of all the generals were swept clean away. The main base hospitals made of substantial stone and iron and brick, unlike the wooden hospital of the Christian lines was raised seemingly a hundred times, and every one within the buildings perished in the whirl of debris.

The fury of the storm rained literal hellish fury in tearing through Viviana's Christian lines, and after the storm his whole army spent two weeks clearing away the mass of wreckage, from the millions of frightfully shattered trees. They fared no better than Germania lines, every structure built either of wood or brick being blown away, and over 10,000 were killed, and nearly 30,000 fatally wounded while those slightly or seriously and dangerously wounded amounted to 166,000. His army sustained a heavier loss of life than Germania, which was slightly or more or less exposed to the full fury of the storm, Mrs Viviana was.

Germania's losses was greater in injured however, the injured, in fatality, seriously, or slightly, amounting up to 234,000, while two thousand were killed. Property loss however was greater in Germania lines, and in Viviana there was no loss of heavy cannons of any kind, reported anywhere, though all the tents and protecting trees were gone. Wiesentien's lines was frightfully devastated, but the wooded regions not burned by the conflagration, caused by the first days battle, was not so completely cleared away or shattered, as millions of branchless trees remained, and the great rain deluge put the great fires out in a very short time.

He however reported no loss of life, though six thousand men were injured, all the army tents had been blown into the skies and all the buildings hastily erected had been blown to the know not where where. Fortunately for him Zimmermann's lines had only got a part of the outer circle of the terrific cyclone, but nevertheless incalculable damage, equal as bad as in general Viviana's lines had been done, and one out of ten trees were left standing. He escaped fortunately a total loss in tents, only ten thousand being lost, the barracks buildings though not carried away were partially wrecked, the mess halls were down the infirmary was a shattered mass of wreckage, and the base hospital though gutted was not so considered as a total loss. No loss of life was either reported in his lines, neither any injured, but his region was under a flood, and he was unable to resume his advance or either retreat. Zimmermann's headquarters a large wooden mansion though standing its ground against the full fury of the wind, was struck by lightning at the conclusion of the storm, and was burned to the ground as well as a large barn opposite it, and strange to say among one of the slightly injured was general Zimmermann himself. Smith's army of landshinians suffered considerably worse, from the effects left by the storm than Wiesentien's army did. All their tents, and nearly all their shelter of any kind, was cleaned out and 36,300 were killed by the chacoos of flying trees, and clouds of debris and over 100,000 were injured fatally while 300,000 others were maimed, blinded or mangled severely in the fury of the typhoon. Thirty officers, five or ten colonels, and three generals were killed, and forty were seriously wounded. In this region the storm literally carried all before it cleaning every vista of forests away, and strewn the grounds for hundreds of miles with the shattered remains of trees and army houses. The base hospital just similar to that in Germania lines, was leveled to the ground, and the debris blown away every one in it having perished, and the wooden infirmary had been carried away by the wind like a huge balloon.

Of all the armies suffering from the disastrous effects of the cyclone, Francis Smith's was the worse, as he got the main powerful force of the extensive tornado. His total of injured amounted to 498,000 and over forty eight thousand were either killed, or perished in the raging floods that followed.

Smith himself was seriously injured, a tree having fallen on his fracturing his arm, two ribs, and crushing his legs. He would never be able to serve in the war again. And the war did not put him out either.

All his cannons not blown away were either wrecked or buried under a mass of shattered trees, and indeed this scene of devastation was more horrible horrible than ever. How marvelously that it done less havoc in Wiesentien's lines, though at this location his Christian army got the fiercest fury of the entire storm.

Violet and her sisters themselves had a trying experience during the typhoon when it struck general Viviana's lines, but their firm familiarity with the signs of these approaching storms, was the means of saving their lives. Even that morning to them the sky had almost that same kind of grayness which they had witnessed before the cyclone at Jenniawren. From afar off that afternoon an hour before the storm broke there sounded a peculiar shrill screaming noise, which simultaneously appeared to be high up in the air, and it was so loud and uneasy that filled the little girls, then in general Hanson's headquarters with an exceedingly great fear that was as comical to see. That horrid unearthly screaming burst forth with great fury, becoming more unearthly and piercing and deafening.

The Angelinians themselves had been startled, but not fooled. "Maybe that cyclone will hit us," said one of the lieutenants, noticing the slow strange darkness that was gathering. The screaming had continued and repeated again and again in louder accents and one of the other soldiers cried:

"It's an approaching wind all right. The sky in the direction of the southwest is as black as ink."

General Charles Brown went forward to investigate, while the deafening screech after in continuing for about an hour had subsided subsided into a dull booming uproar, in a mingled with a strange weird moaning sound which proceeded from the direction of the southwest.

"It's a typhoon all right," said Brown returning, "as several of his officers rushed up to him. It seems as if it will not come as its blackest clouds, as you see moving like a racer are mostly in the northwest, but just the same I don't trust that suspicious noise in the southwest, so you had better get your men prepared to meet it so there will be, I no loss in life. It's signal the warning to generals Hanson and Vivian."

Violet and her sisters though familiar with the approach of these storms had not however realized the true nearness of the storm, and were on the veranda of Hanson's headquarters when the storm came up.

It began with gradual force a only in the vicinity of Hanson's and general Viviana's lines, which was only struck by the main portions of the storm's outer circle, but nevertheless increased in violence minute by minute, and in fourteen minutes there was such an uproar that to the little girls it seemed as if the world was coming to its end. Before you could count one, two, three Violet and her sisters were buried in the wreckage of the veranda, when trying to escape from the house before it went to pieces a frightfully unearthly blackness having obscured everything from view, and the uproar of falling trees had sounded like many thousands of thunder crashes going on in a continuous uproar the whole scene having become an indescribable chaos.

Though successful in loosening themselves from the wreckage Violet and her sisters uninjured had found it safer to remain under the under the windrows of timber then scratching out, but nevertheless they watched the fury of the storm, and saw the continuous inextinguishable clouds of thousands of big tents, guns, scores of thousands of trees, of every size, cannon, broken wheels, mangled fragments of army houses, guns, ammunition wagons, and hundreds of men scattered about by the terrific force of the wind. Violet and her sisters had been almost stunned by the clear clamor of the tornado like hurricane but nevertheless they kept still and the tremendous uproar, trusting to the refuge they found themselves in among the wreckage of the veranda. To Violet and her sisters the very lightning at times seemed to flash in rivers toward the very ground, and thunder loud enough to make a concussion strong enough to throw down the mightiest buildings, exploded in a crashing incessant salvoes of cannonading that was ear-splitting.

To Violet and her sisters everything seemed to be torn to pieces by the fury of the storm, and therein fell in floods.

At the time the storm had been raging fifteen minutes it had become so dark that Violet and her sisters could not be able to see twenty yards ahead of them, and now indeed a screaming tempest of the most appalling fury was raging, and by the denaturing up roar of trees falling the little girls had realized that whole forests in the vicinity of Hanson's lines was being devastated.

Indeed Violet and her sisters could never imagine of having heard heard such a din caused by a storm before, thousands of the trees being torn up by the roots and flung hundreds of feet into the air and some of them having been flung against a sloping plain bank had been held there by the frightful pressure of the wind, which screamed and howled now like millions of demons and wolves in one chorus.

For twenty five minutes the horrible crash and uproar had continued with appalling sublimity, the intense darkness having been lighted up now and then by brief blinding sheets of lightning while the rain poured down in sheeted torrents, regular clouds of sticks shattered trees, all this while continued to fly flying through the air like a snowstorm whirling in all directions. At this time the fury of the wind had seemed about to tear all before it, but as the wind hardly swept past the region where Violet and her sisters were buried in the wreckage wreckage, Violet and her sisters felt themselves protected from the typhoons appalling fury.

After twenty minutes had passed, and though the storm was still raging with terrific fury it showed signs of abating, though still every thunder crash was like the discharge of parks of giant cannon, or krupp guns going off simultaneously, the lightning hissing through the inky skies, in shapes of shafts, skysplitters, lemons, snakes or forks, and bolts at every flash and Violet and her sisters feared that though safe from the wind the wreckage might be struck by lightning. After twenty three minutes had passed the storm was again raging with a din which sounded as if it was going to tear the world to pieces. Though the storm had been deceitful, in its show of slight abatement, it did not seem to grow any worse now, after becoming general again, but nevertheless the lightning became very threatening, the flashes becoming more stronger, and more frequent, and the thunder more terrific. Strange rattlings filled the air, then suddenly after a flickering red arch of light, which flickered for three moments there came a most blinding sheet of lightning which dazzled and illumined the whole surface of the ground the sky for the moment being split by a giant fork or shaft lightning with many branches. This was instantaneously followed by a most terrific thunder roll to roll, which seemed to split the earth, or which sounded like the world blowing to pieces, at fifteen thousand gigantic rolling explosions at one time. In another moment there was another flash, which seemed to fairly tear the clouds followed by another thunder roll which resembled the worse explosions of Mt. Calverines eruptions, the concussion being tenfold fury seeming to blow all the trees down at once with a frightful crash, and uproar and the wind was screaming so wildly and frantically that it seemed bent on the destruction of the world. All the trees within sight of Violet and her sisters, being whirled in an indescribable chaos, and hundreds of wagons and machine guns were still being blown about and hurled against each other. (Everything of description was blown down, trees still standing in severe resistance to the wind were frightfully and horribly shattered, all the army houses were torn to pieces and havoc of every description occurred.

Panic and confusion had been everywhere, at the first outbreak of the cyclone among the christian soldiers, and general Charles Brown had done all he could to stem it and was knocked senseless. 1/1 by one of the falling trees. Everything of every imagination was totally wrecked. Millions of trees had been torn down at the very first minute of the storm duration. At all the army houses erected in the series of camps, were torn to pieces, within ten minutes, and all the ammunition wagons, not blown away were turned topsy turvy and many of the Angelinians who had not escaped into the shelter of the deep trenches were flung about among the wreckage and instantly killed. Wreckage was piled everywhere, and Baldwin himself trying to rescue some refugee children, rescued during a recent raid on the Angelinians was blown into their wrecked shelter, and sent sprawling head over heels into the fragments of wreckage receiving many severe injuries, the poor children being killed. General Baldwin Jennings was nearly fatally injured, and Francis G. Cannon was killed being thrown about along with the wreckage despite what they tried to clutch and everything was a whirlpool of chaos where Violet and her sisters were among their wreckage refuge, and a man was shoved against a remaining wall of cannons headquarters which collapsed on top of him his head being crushed by the terrific force with which he had been thrown against the wall....

A plank whirling through the air struck Violet on the head as she lost some of her caution, to see if the storm was abating or getting worse the force of the blow delivered by the stick making her see stars..

HANSON FORTUNATELY WAS WELL PREPARED FOR THE STORM...?

The evening before general Hanson after Evans had went off to rescue the little girl, had noticed a peculiar dull yellow glaring streak or archy canopy along the horizon, in the west, while also extended from north to south, but which was more expanded in the southwest. At first he mistook it for the sunset but then realized that it was more plain and having indeed the color of a yellow haze far in the sky, and a sickly haze had simultaneously covered the whole sky....

Hanson who had beheld the mass of yellow arising from the horizon, where strange whispers had also attracted his attention had caused him suspicion. He had watched the yellow glow for a long time, and noticed that it was more nearer and more extensive extensively and noticed that it was expanding with great rapidity and growing thicker and denser. This had made him suspect that a great typhoon storm was about to make its appearance and so he had been in one of his cyclone dugouts when the main force of the storm came the next day. Violet and her sisters had seen the approach of the storm from the southwest before it struck, for they had observed in the southwest, when the thick portent in the northwest was fading away into blue gray, a veritable rolling wall of cloud of dark slate gray color, which seemingly approached under the morning blue light rain clouds with thrilling rapidity..... It had soon however extended along the whole horizon in a strange ravine black arch of cloud which had reached the zenith in half a minute. The horizon had been shrouded in pitch darkness, and as the darkness gathered they watched the blackening canopy in great awe. Then soon as the darkness was a pitch blackness, like midnight the little girls had heard a dull moaning roar which had increased to a dull booming or droning sound, and then the storm had been in full sway at once. After the storm when rescue work began, Violet and her sisters being found unharmed were transferred after difficult travel to the ruined hospital at general Evans' lines, where Evans the day after the storm had found the little girls.

This extensive tornado like hurricane however displayed its most immense force in the region of general Evans' lines, and in storming through the city of Croner Andrea....

In this region no trees of any size in the forests withstood the fury of the Terrocian Typhoon being either all strewn on the ground or carried into the air while many villages or towns were shattered to pieces and blown away, by the appalling force of the terrific windstorm. In the city of Croner Andrea, the loss of life was fearful the storm being one of the fiercest and appalling that had ever visited the Calverinian country since the last great Santa Typhoon of Abbiennia. It swept the town of Wilda completely out of existence, and passing through the captured city of Vivian Wickay killed and wounded 7,717,000 out of a population of nine million one hundred forty four thousand four hundred forty four, and entirely demolished all the massive houses along the sections that had been swept by the main circle of the great storm. Millions of house timbers were carried miles away by the force of the wind, and hundreds of persons who had been blown away were afterwards found several miles away from their native city. From Mc-Hollister Lena a small city which was blown off the map, thousands of persons were swept away of whom no trace could be found. The fierce storm had indeed filled the whole Calverinian country with consternation, and bewilderment. 1,700,000 houses in Greater Andrea were leveled to the ground and remnants were left of buildings not entirely leveled and fragments of many wrecked wooden buildings, were found four miles away, from the city while portions of palms and organs were picked up two hundred miles from the city, by the Christian soldiers, these having been blown into Hanson's lines and general Vivians by the storm.

FREAKS LEFT BY THE STORM.

The sides of many ruined or woe brick or wooden houses left half standing were pierced with heavy board boards and splinters which protruded like huge pegs. In the walls of other buildings left partially standing holes by hundreds were noticeable that seemed to have been made by cannon balls or explosive shells. A long train of twenty seven box cars, and forty eight coal cars and thirty flat cars all heavily loaded, with brick, stone, wood and things of every imagination including thirty six cattle cars were completely picked up from the Angolinian railroad tracks, and blown three miles, then dropped into a ravine near general Zimmerman's badly ravaged positions. The loss of life was truly appalling. Many solidly built brick houses and immense grain elevators and cathedrae were raised to the ground in three hours duration of the storm, first by the twenty five minutes wind, and then finished by the floods that followed.

A feature of the typhoon was the x cloud burst of rain, which flooded many regions, and even the unusual size of the hailstones, which poured in torrents with the sheets of rain. Many of them were big enough to weight from five ounces to three pounds, and some of the smallest even measured in circumference nine inches. They crashed through the roofs of dwellings and barns still standing after the wind equal squall leaving holes at some places, through which a man's leg could pass through with perfect ease. The whole shoreline of this part of Calverinia was strewn with the wrecks of buildings, dead cows, men, women, and children, hogs, horses, dogs, and poultry, bedding, and wearing apparel. Several large houses had been taken up by the wind, and carried into the Christian lines, where they were found frightfully damaged. A big cannon of heavy calibre was carried 1,569 yards, the muzzle striking the ground, in front of the wrecked infirmary in general Viviana lines and buried deeply, the rear portions standing upright. The feathers were blown off thousands of chickens, and their dead bodies with the skin flayed off, were no unusual sight. Several generals in Hanson's storm swept lines were lying asleep in their rooms of their headquarters, when the wind lifted the upper portions of the house on the level with their beds in which they were lying and blew it away leaving them unhurt.

The long line of hedges and briar bushes growing along fences in front of immense gardens facing the mansion, and in some parts of the Christian lines were left bare, and while the thorns and branches being stripped and broken off entirely, by whipping violently together. In the region of Greater Andrea the typhoonic hurricane seemed to have the worse fury. The first few minutes of the storm was terrific enough but at its highest fury it was only a matter of ten minutes before the whole city of Greater Andrea was swept off the map. The main force of the extensive cyclone coming out of the southeast suddenly began its most destructive career in the lower suburbs reaching Reppe's avenue with a terrific screaming roar tearing down whole sections of strong houses, of all kinds and killed and injured 1,195 people, a hundred of which were children. Proceeding northeastward it tore down thousands of houses in a twinkling of an eye, and wrecked a big grain elevator at St. Michael's street which was amass in ruins of a terrible destruction. The path of the storm's direct violent action was approximately over the territory bounded on the west and east, where it tore to fragments whole divisions of brick and wooden houses in five minutes time and causing the deaths of of ten thousand adults, and four hundred children while twenty thousand injured were afterwards taken out from the wreckage.

2-254

At Sicamore avenue the storm totally wrecked whole scores of sections of business houses, blew off many strong roofs from factories, which were raised to the ground and two grain elevators, and then came--cornered over house tops to west St. Anna street, and struck down the whole myriad of houses, among them the grain elevator owned by Bernard and Rizzo Co. raising it to the ground.

The typhoon progressing onward destroyed hundreds of frame houses, ripped the most massive houses to pieces, blew roofs block distant and uprooted all the trees in its path. Churches were crushed and the total loss on account of devotions going on were 60,000 dead. Telephone and trolley poles were uprooted, and bent, and the rest of the city shattered as if as a postage stamp. Out of a ruined grain elevator three hundred men were dug out dead, and on Sacamore ave, nine hundred and fifty school children were dug out of three ruined schoolhouses dead, and a hundred other children were buried under the wreckage of St. Joseph's school house all being dead, the building having been razed. All the time above the din of the typhoon, while it was raging at its highest fury, and the crash and banging of falling wreckage could be heard the cries of dying men and women.

Even after the storm when the rescuers climbed over one of the windrows of wrecks, there had come to them distinctly, the voice of a woman mingled with the cries of little children, but soon these died away, though the cries of the woman continued until they reached her. The immense crowds stood in front of the houses and homes that were wrecked, and waited for the entombed dead to be brought forth. The scenes was much like those of a great fire and many a time there were good numbers of men, women, and children, brought forth alive, and one man who was slightly injured was able to tell of the miracle by which he was snared from death, under tons of brick and iron and mortar. Close to fifty others were extracted, more or less seriously injured, hundreds more were found alive in their wrecked homes, without any injuries of any kind, but out of the ruins of a large convent over a hundred and eleven were dug out, by soldiers frightfully mangled, all being sisters.

The storm sweeping like a scythe had destroyed five orphan asylums on St. Serinia street, and in the St. Henry's district, and killed and injured three thousand, five hundred fifteen persons in the wrecked resident houses, while in the orphan asylums which were wrecked more disastrously, than any of these houses none of the children dug from the wreckage were found either killed or injured, while all their attendants had perished. Five days later after the storm it was found that in this region of the orphan asylums fully three thousand other persons had been rescued from the wreckage badly injured, a hundred fatally.

Total loss on St. Serinia street alone were found afterwards to be 6532 6,532,555 in injured, killed and dying. Property loss was estimated at 3 $30,000,000. 3,500,000 dollar damages was caused at a great pleasure park on the outskirts of Pa Pandora which was also badly smitten with a property loss of 70, $70,000,000 and 80,000 killed injured and dying. A large metedrome, with people including women and children in great numbers was totally destroyed causing the loss of one thousand lives, a hundred of which were women and twenty children, and all the club houses, derby rides like seen in Riverview Pa Park close to a racoon were blown completely to a myriad known where. Three dancing pavilions crowded with men women and children to overflowing and a score of thraters and showhouses were blown to pieces with terrible carnage among all inside. In three places twenty thousand out of sixty thousand were killed, and five thousand three hundred were injured, while all the other survivors hardly escaped without injuries of some kind slight or serious. All that remained of these buildings and others of this large pleasure park was a strip of one story ruins left of three stories and a thick pall of dust which had continued despite the downfall of rain which had spread over the ruins defied penetration for half an hour for the rescuers. Where this dust came from was a mystery. Among the perished christian armies the typhoon killed and wounded 206,000, while it killed and injured among the scattered armies of the enemy 738,620. Glandelinians. The total loss among non-combatants caused by the storm was 262,993. The total loss caused by the storm combined in killed and injured was 1,202,723.

After showing the little girl to them, and then taking the little girl upon his knee, Evans told violet and her sisters of his experience in the storm, and when he finished the one of the livian girls told what they had experienced. Violet and her sisters declared however that terrible as the typhoons were they had never seen any storm yet that caused such terrible destruction to cities and towns or such loss of lives among soldiers and non-combatants, as this horrible war did.... The little girls were delighted with the new child rescued so cleverly from the brutal Glandelinians. Glandelinians chieftain and the little girl finally realizing who Jack Evans was took to him more so closely and feared him no more.

ZIMMERMANN'S FEROCIOUS ACTION AT MILDRED GREENBURG.

Twelve days after the typhoon on March 14th after severe reverses during a frightful battle at Francis Smithsonia, a battle equal in equally as furious as the one at Zoe Rae Run, the enemy repelling Zimmermann recoiled with the loss of 85,666,000 to that of the christians 70,000,000. Zimmermann advanced successfully extending his main line toward Padula. Tansin, crushed the enemy under Schloeder there annihilating his army and then alarmed by the movements of the main forces of the Glandelinians toward Jennie Richen and being afraid that general Federal Francis Johnston was moving upon his rear, struck a sudden blow against general Zoe Rae Mc-hollister on March 20th. After a general action lasting over two hours Mc-hollister's armies were badly worsted, almost threatened with annihilation and forced to withdraw toward Gloria Alcie Run, where the Glandelinians followed in waves of men, Mc-hollister being killed as his survivors were annihilated by Collins Shoemans armies and routed.

All the christian columns who however who drove forward into the wooded portions of general Knoxes Glandelinians army was crushed to fragments and the survivors routed in confusion.... It was in vain for any of the officers to try and rally them and they themselves were killed by scores amid the dreadful storm of carnage.... A fresh division of ten million Angelinians were sent to the rescue, but after an hour of exceedingly bloody resistance in which the whole region was torn with the hellish fury of battle, ten of their main commanders, Sandford, Ruesford, Wagners Henryson, Shoeman, Jansen, Henry Donaldson, Calnan Shoeman, Altier, Johnston Schloeder, Hanson Mc-ferma and Baldon Henryson were killed and this whole christian line almost reduced to fragments when forced to withdraw.

Fifteen great christian generals fell in the vain effort to rally this mangled army and Joshua Vivian was among them. The other fourteen were James Curran, Henry Curran, Frank Curran and John Curran four brothers who were mortally wounded, while the rest killed outright were Franklin Henryson, Frank True, and Jameson True, two brothers, Glandin, Frank Anderson, Hendonia Vivian, Robertson, Cruesos, Franklin Lincoln, Bernard Sanderlinia, and George Callens. No effort could rally the panic stricken survivors, and they had to be withdrawn to the rear, all the colors of all the regiments having been shot to pieces, by the fearful storm of bullets. A bold bloody stand made on Tansin Run and a fire of over ten thousand cannon which destroyed down hundreds of thousands of Glandelinians like flies destroyed by fire in a fly trap, the Angelinians managed to check the desperate headlong drive of the army once under Francis Smith, but the Glandelinian forces under general Federal Francis Johnston, in making fifteen assaults in which millions fell, had captured a long stone wall on the grounds of Alcie and Mc-hollister Run, extending a mile and here for hours the two forces battled back and forth like two waves tearing each other to pieces by the frequent collision. It was general Davidson who saved general Zimmermann's army from a serious disaster, and a total defeat by notifying general Arandt of the serious danger and who at once hurried heavy reinforcements to the rescue. The struggle was extremely fierce and terrific at this point, but the Glandelinians though successful lost the heaviest, Glandelinians as much as the christians, and were finally forced to withdraw with their leader. Federal Francis Johnston badly wounded as he rode over a portion of the christian parapet in the face of a hurricane of two bullets. The action continued the rest of the time with Picknell Knoxes Glandelinians, who repelled the armies under Richardson Raymond and Federal Aronburg, Picknell receiving for forty six eight hours, after the last twenty four hours action, with the other two Glandelinian armies as many assaults as there may be children in five schools, but in the end the christians along this section got worried with frightful loss and was driven clean from the wooded regions altogether, and in trying to force a stand Raymond Richardson was severely wounded and narrowly escaped capture as the Glandelinians rushed his panic stricken columns. Had Cannon who was the main Glandelinian commander come up in time with the remainder of the Glandelinian army Knox could have annihilated the whole christian army which was routed, and though there seemed no chance what ever for Zimmermann to win this battle, he finally withdrew without without offering serious resistance. The battle however was considered to have ended as a draw, as both sides had precisely the same positions as they had before the battle, but nevertheless the advantage was great for the Glandelinians for all maneuvers of the christians had been checked and Zimmermann was unable to advance any further for a while. Both sides lost heavily in this battle, the enemy first losing the most, but the christians totally more at the end of the battle. The christian loss was 40,000,000 in killed and wounded, though the loss of prisoners was considered as ten million, while the loss of the Glandelinians in killed wounded and prisoners, was only 1,515,000,000.

Violet and her sisters had heard of this great battle, and Zimmermann's defeat as the first defeat he had suffered in the war, and of his being unable to press on toward Craser Andrea. They were not and over it neither were they elated over it, and as they paid no more attention to the news as if it was nothing at all whatever, Evans wondered exceedingly.

They usually used to be very interested in the news concerning the outcome of the battles, even having been overanxious to find out the results, but now they showed no interest at all and he wondered why. Finally he decided to inquire and getting them alone that afternoon he put the question to them seriously.

"Oh Evans these slaughters make me tired," said violet. "Why we don't read about the battles any more is because though we are lost, the way a they are won or lost is disgusting. What we were always looking for was a general surrender of the Glandelinian armies. We have faced so many disappointments in these cases that we got tired of reading those battle stories, which are only trash. I'm fully convinced that this war is not only far from ended yet, but that we will surely never win."

"Oh you little girls are only losing hope and getting discouraged," said Evans, though in his heart he felt that they were right. "This war cannot go on forever. We will win yet." But no matter what Evans said it did no good. The little girls were obdurate on the matter and in fact Evans quite agreed on the matter with the little girl girls himself, for he knew that the christian armies though always larger than the enemy, was fast dwindling away while the enemy only allowed the size of their own armies on purpose, that they had enough of men yet to fight in the war that could overwhelm the whole Abbeian christian army itself.

He knew that Glandelinian was still in her fullest strength, and that if the Glandelinian armies were ever driven out of Alverinia it would take probably over a year to throw their armies out of Angelinia, and probably an invasion of Glandelinia would be like a man trying to walk on the third rail.

For in the Glandelinian country they would meet sterner and fiercer resistance than any where in Alverinia, and that many more severe battles would have to be fought.

He however knew that the main decision was soon concerning Germanias army at Bremer Andrea. If Germania won the war would either continue a long time or be lost entirely, but if he lost the war would probably only last a month more. But none of the christian generals whose armies were continually concentrating upon him saw any prospects of victory in sight, and Viviana himself had wrote o to general Vivian that he saw no chance of beating Germania Vivian-Violet and her sisters felt that general Viviana would not be beaten, for they felt sure that God would not allow such a wit wicked man to win. But end to say as we will some read Germania was victorious and it was the christians who paid the price in a baptism of blood and fire and indescribable wholesale slaughter in that roaring inferno of damanating horrors.

VIOLET AND HER SISTERS WITNESS HARROWING SIGHTS IN STRICKEN ST MARIE: THE HORRIBLE EXPLOSION!

Poor violet and her sister were still cr-cripples, and when they believed that all the horrors seemed over, general Hansons army got into fierce and sanguinary action with a Manley at St Marie or St Francis, which not only ended in disaster, and a general withdrawal of general Hansons whole army which was crushed like an egg shell, but as he tried to make a fierce stand at Chairity Junction, a frightful explosion occurred during the highest fury of the battle within Hansons lines, which was caused by one of the enemys shells. The explosion made a scene and a crash like Mt Pelee did in her sudden eruption when that volcano wu wiped out the population of the island of Martinique. This explosion not only killed one thousand christian soldiers but slew a hundred thousand others,, the concussion rocking the city of St Marie to the ground.

Indeed as the little girls had seen, when taken there by Evans under an escort of soldiers, nothing except the little blonde Francianna battle had caused war horrors to outrival this great ravaging destruction. St Marie had been on account of the explosion visited, by shock, fire tornado and deluge, leaving it more pitiable than many desolated town wrecked by the concussion of any terrific past battle.

Twenty and a score more of miles of homes as the little girls witnessed had been torn apart, and then touched into flames which fortunately had been quenched by the deluge before total conummation occurred.

Following the terrific explosion within the christian lines that demolished houses from the concussion, wrecked scores of ships on the river twenty miles away, and killed hundreds of thousands of men women and children, the city had then been visited by a ravaging tornado of exceedingly great violence, which also tore a path through general Vivians lines then besieged for five days by heavy rains which turned into the most frightful blizzard ever seen in the Galverinian country. For miles and miles all that Violet and her sisters saw of the once thickly populated St Andrews section once thickly covered by buildings was now a sea of half cleared snow covered ruins.

Along the dock front which the little girls had also witnessed at the foot of the main St Andrew section fourteen thousand one hundred freight cars, and one thousand four hundred heavy pullmans all wooden were still smoking wrecks. In one orphan asylum in this devastated district every child had been killed, while in another the hundreds of poor little ones were pitifully injured, their legs and arms being broken, and faces torn and disfigured for life. It happened at about ten o'clock in the morning when the battle of St Marie or Chairity Junction was in full sway, when the store houses within Hansons lines loaded with hundreds of thousands of tons of high explosives, all kinds of other deadly explosives, mingled with Benzol, Picric Acid, the vicious T.N.T and dynamite, was hit by a high explosive shell, fired by one of the landelinian guns.

The explosion was as terrific as if Mt Galverine was blowing itself into the skies, and the column of smoke from the explosion extended for thirty thousand feet into the air, the crash being like a trillion cannon. The shock caused by the concussion was so great that St Andrews the district nearest the Mc-Ollester-Mc-Ollester gun river a hundred miles away from the scene of the explosion was virtually razed, while every pane of glass in the city, and other cities far from it, and even in Galverine were shattered, while three million angelinians themselves suffered as from shell shock only ten out of that number living, the rest being killed instantly by the concussion. In St Marie houses collapsed by hundreds of thousands from the one shell shock, the flames sprang up, then along came the roaring tornado and the deluge of rain and then the blizzard. Hundreds of thousands in the city in itself was instantly killed by the shock itself not from wreckage, as wreckage killed no one, and thousands that were buried in the wreckage and found dead were on being examined discovered to have been only killed by the shock of the blast. The air in the city two hundred and fifty miles away was filled with particles of glass hurled from the shattered windows by the concussion that blinded pedestrians far from the airport of Galverine. In the stricken city of St Marie where every window in houses not the thrown down by the fearful shock, was open to the cold cold Galverinian April weather, through the broken windows and the suffering among the survivors was something terrible indeed. Frantic attempts were made to check the windows with with bedding rags or any material at hand. But had as the lot of the temporary houses was, the many hundreds of thousands injured by the shock lying unasscured by beneath the wreckage were worse off. Many thousands died before they could be reached, and as the terrific April snowstorm grew the workers were forced to cease. Loads of thousands of dead strewn into the morgues, only to be followed by frantic survivors trying to identify the dead bodies by some chance trinket that might still remain on all the bodies found were mutilated, with broken arms and legs, only caused by the shock itself.

Relief from the christian armies was sent in and one of the officers with Violet and her sister who witnessed this scene of wreckage declared that he had witnessed the dead and dying at the inferno of Germania and Logan as the gun, gone over the enemy trenches at Big Birdknoll in the face of a hail of British storm of musketry and artillery, crossed the fiery inferno of Mc-Ollester gun during the battle there, treading accidentally underfoot his own comrades still stremling with their frightful death wounds, and had witnessed the aftermath of a bootless counter attack at Chairity Junction and Little Olandia Francis gun but had seen nothing worse than the scenes in the wrecked city of St Marie.

Mad and frenzied friends and relatives frenzied with distress about hundreds of thousands in numbers rushed into the ruins and with the persistence of half crazed beings tore at the brick and mortar that had once been their own homes hoping against hope that somewhere a loved one might be still breathing or a body found to receive its last tribute.

Sides of immense churches and dwellings nearest the explosion had been blown in by the concussion and one big wooden house had collapsed, when the explosion came burning its shocked inmates. When the relief workers began their task the thousands of dead lay about in the streets huddled against walls, where they had been buried pinned under burning buildings and unconscious beneath the fallen walls of their dwellings. In two protestant landelinian schools where children had been confined by force all the pupils perished at the concussion before the buildings collapsed though in three other schools which were Catholic not a child was killed or injured though these buildings were more frightfully damaged. It was impossible at the present moment to ascertain the exact number of killed and injured from the shock but conservative estimates suggest about 400,000 to 500,000 killed outright.

The regrettable part of the whole occurrence is that it was declared completely accidental-----caused by culpable negligence, when it was seen by many of the Angelinians that the shell from the landelinian gun / was deliberately aimed.

When the Vivian girls had arrived on the scene so they could almost believe that they were back among the ruined cities wrecked by Mt Galverine before the war. Small piles of brick mortar, wood and iron were all that remained of a thickly populated district. Thousands of trees were splintered and down from the force of the concussion, fires were still burning in coal heaps, and hundreds of thousands of people were working in the debris frantically digging to find the bodies of their loved ones.

Thousands of these rescue workers were laded and looked for all the world like men wounded in battle. As is usual in battles of this kind which raged in the landoo-Angelinian war, there was adversity of opinion as to how many shell explosions during the action at Chairity Junction took place. Evidently there were a terrible outburst of shells in fiery explosions among the opposing lines which made noise so loud and continuous which caused people to rush to the windows to see what was happening.

Then came the tremendous blast of the munition stores, which blew in the glass windows of all the houses not wrecked, and caused the furniture of all description to dance a violent jig, and which accounted for so many people losing their eyes, and being cut about the head and face.

THE GLASS STORM.

Even three hundred miles from the explosion in the city of St. Marie not wrecked the Vivian Girls saw great slivers of plate glass sticking horizontally in the brick walls of the offices of the Californian chief of police, like arrows that had been propelled by a bow, while the streets were encased in glass, so one can partly realize as the Vivian Girls did what an glass inferno must have reigned for a few moments.

Hundreds of great bars of iron from the munition stores, that blew up wrought into fantastic shapes by the force of the explosion, and hurled through the air to the distance of six thousand feet, were picked up at widely separated points by the Christian soldiers in Wisconsin army soldiers two hundred miles away. The tragedy seemed to Violet and her sisters even greater than along the front of any greater battle that they had ever witnessed, as it came so suddenly absolutely without the slightest warning, whereas the damage on the most fierce battlefields was accomplished by degrees, and it was always when the people heard the far distant prolonged roar of the battle, they were expecting the terrible destruction, and so were prepared.

The houses that were not entirely destroyed but badly wrecked, had all the earthworks of buildings wrecked in Zippollin raids on London or Paris nothing but a plain drama.

Sides of many houses were smashed in as by a tornado, a storm of glass was scattered in all directions, roofs lifted bodily and turned around, or dumped off entirely, interiors demolished and furniture totally wrecked. Hundreds of thousands of families were wiped out entirely, but even more heartrending were the many cases of families broken up. Some lost fathers and mothers. In others the little ones were killed or maimed by the shock and one or both parents who no doubt would willingly have given their lives to protect their babies were either killed by the shock of the explosion or burned to death by the fires that followed. To add to the horrors the weather changed suddenly again and after the passage of a destructive tornado, which added to the damage, and wrecked hundreds of thousands of houses totally, not damaged by the shock of the explosion and killed and wounded twenty six thousand more people followed by a deluge, a blizzard the worse ever seen in California raging just as the surviving people were trying to extricate their injured friends and relatives, laying laying four feet of snow in twenty hours, in level depth while the storm in total duration lasted twenty four hours.

This terrific blizzard, followed by ten below zero weather also hampered the arrival of the small army of doctors and nurses, that rushed to winter their services. No sooner was this horrible snowstorm over, than another commenced being still heavier and more longer in duration raging forty eight hours at even its highest fury. This was followed by another two days later, three severe snowstorms within five days whose icy cold blasts dropping the temperature finally to thirty below a zero the coldest April ever experienced in California piercingly cut into the wretched well apparelled person as well as the poorly clad, and those rendered homeless. One bright ray of sunshine that stood out prominently in this great havoc and gloom was the splendid offers of assistance, in money, clothes, and food. Medical services and temporary shelter that was relieved by the earliest post of possible moment from the neighboring towns as well as from the Christian armies and from those where the explosion did so much damage.

Indeed it had been a serious disaster in the eyes of Violet and her sisters and what saddened them most was the defeat of Hanson's army at Chairty gun or St. Marie. It started with was any one would have called considerable action. Considerable action indeed. The battle lasting one day had been very sanguinary the Glandelinians having made attack after attack in all their force under the support of strong artillery fire of 10,560 cannon which swept the vast Christian lines with the most hellish carnage. Hanson's army had been caught in its extreme right flank, his main left was ravaged and crushed, and fearing total disaster if he still held on having lost already over 45,666,799 to that of the enemy 10,000,000, and when already one half of his crushed army was in total rout and terrible confusion, Hanson with tears in his eyes a sinner, slowly retreated, and after the frightful explosion the Christians mowed down every massive line of the enemy no matter how long or deep that came within full range slaughtering slaughtering horrible numbers. OF THE VENTURESOME GLANDELINIANS.

Fearing that general Vivian only twelve miles away from Hanson's lines had heard the tremendous firing, which in fact he would have been deaf if he did not hear it, and that he would advance to the rescue (which he was really doing on the double time) Manley did not follow up his crushing victory he had gained and stopped the battle and the Glandelinian advance when the fool was on the point of winning the greatest victory he ever could have won, and when he could have annihilated the whole of Hanson's army.

After the battle was over entirely the loss of the Glandelinians was three times heavier than the Christians.

In literal slain the Glandelinians lost 15,000,000, or totally 15,996,000 and among them was one general. The total losses of both sides was considered as terrific as the battle of gloriosa that raged the following winter. Despite his success in the agreement with Hanson, Vivian, general Vivian, coming up all placed General Manley's army in a jeopardized and ticklish position. And also on account of the swift and various maneuvers of the other Christian generals previously mentioned, Manley's armies were placed between three fires and only the junction of Germania Vivian and Lucia Melodia Nicknell within would cause the total destruction of the Christian armies well opposed to him and also the speedy victory of Glandelinia.

He however could not rely on Lucia Nicknell, for he was too far off and already the Christian general Nicknell had two quarters of his armies moving against him, others had marched to general Vivian to reinforce him, and all were preparing to crush the wicked enemies of God and child murderers as the Glandelinians were, and Manley was apprehensive. He could not rely just then on the aid of his two sons because they were being rapidly hemmed in at Francis-Atlanta.

General Vivian had just before this commanded Nicknell to watch every move of Johnston Manley who were fighting so long against God and the Christian cause. Nicknell answered;

"Your excellency general Vivian;

I will do so at once. Had I known the savage character and intention of all the rascally Manleys who are the enemies of not only God but all humanity, and of all the massacres caused by him, I would have annihilated the wicked child assassins long ago. I'm a Protestantian by birth, and as I'm always at liberty to fight with any side I choose or think is right, and am also justified to be against it if I know or find out that the cause is wrong and wicked I would never do so. Any body who fights against Angelina or fights for the or against the very humanity and takes Glandelinians side is committing a great treason against God himself and as I have always been fighting against Manley I'll do more than that now. Millions of my men are Continentalian curdies, Abolitionians and so on and have always stood up in our cause and not one of them have allowed a Glandelinian prisoner within their ranks as yet. We have already known the true character of the three wicked Manleys and the character of their officers, which the pen of any learned judge would refuse to write or describe of their frightful shocking liberty of murdering helpless Nuns, Sisters, priest's religious of every kind, and massacring, nay assassinating millions of children after torturing them like the damned, just because they are Christians is shocking the world."

Then their own diabolical wickedness and that of their devilish officers, topepingly and fiercely scoffed, and mocked, and cursed, and vilified at, which was dearest to every sacred heart of Jesus, and most dear and sacred to every Christian heart, I have seen when at their wicked commands many times the sacred Hosts stolen out of railed catholic churches, churches, mockingly given to horses, pigs or dogs and cats and of naked women being forced to sit down before a whole crowd of men or lie down on large crucifixes and be ridden around the camp as an exhibition. The Glandelinians have millions of times insulted the Blessed Sacrament during Corpus Christi processions and because one time, of a similar insult a good portion of his camp and army was swept deep destroyed by a frightful Christian attack at the battle of pig Nicknell. You followed he followed up their far advanced victory by adiabatic massacre of 300,000 children, and defied, and cursed and mocked, and for every child slain, which was called by the Landelinian tribal tribunals a justified execution, and that poor Jesus, our Blessed Savior was afraid to resent the defiance. I had also seen during the last of last years Lenten season a blasphemous carousing procession passed through the streets of one of our Galverinian cities, unslay captured to mimic the procession of the Blessed Sacrament or Corpus Christi, despite the earnest entreaty of the poor bishop, and because a good number of the inhabitants of it stoned the soldiers in the mock procession for the sacrelege, they all seized all the children and religious sect even the poor bishop, and on Good Friday crucified many of them in the most horrible torture making this as a mockery as how many times they would crucify God if he dared show himself to inter-fere with their doings. The most heinous tortures of all a damnable torture, unbelievable was meted out to the girl children alone. Most heinous tortures indeed. One of those kinds invented so long ago by the Chinese. The victims were led in small rooms full of brilliant dazzling, glaring reflecting lights, their little eyelids being slit so that they cannot close their eyes. They were then locked in, the following agony having been said to be a horror that defies the imagination. The unfro unfortunate children presently would go mad and then die.

On Easter Sunday swine were driven through the streets as in mockery of our Lord and saviour Jesus Christ, having resurrected. A similar outrage had been planned for the Feast of the Ascension. But I do know from what happened that the patience of poor God, was completely exhausted, and at the time the Benediction of the blessed Sacrament was given when as though driven by theodons a wild crowd of Landelinians skunks were set in motion amid coarse laughter, and cursing, blaspheming and swa swearing as though they were determined to anger a God who on account of his Mercy was considered incapable of taking vengeance, the Christians brilliantly victorious at the last battle of Mc-Molleston now burst into the city, and massacred all the rascally Landelinians in repay for their sacreleges.

All of their sacrelegious treatment of your daughters Violet and her sisters called the Vivian girls their sacrelegious attempts to assassinate them and their blasphemous character toward them had made as hell over with rage many times, and besides I have sworn to avenge that massacre of children the Landelinian chiefs forced many of the better Landelinians to commit in Galverinia. The rest of my army is now with the aid of Williamsburger Zimmerman harring Germanias army from coming to Manleys aid or to prevent a junction with him. Your excellency whatever you ask me to do I will even to annihilate the foe if necessary. I'll see to it that his excellency general Pig faced snooted toad of a Manley don't advance any further after his victory at St Marie.

Your friend and companion/
General Maldonia Picknell.
COMMANDER OF CHRISTIAN ARMY FACING GERMANIA VIVIAN..

Manley had been alarmed by Picknell's approach but knowing that it was useless to evade Picknell, and that it was dangerous to arouse him he decided to trust to luck and watch for a good opportunity to strike either Picknell either Picknell, Hanson, or general Vivian a crushing blow.....It was not until until after this supreme moment that Evans heard this startling and joyful news and said as he went to tell it to Violet and her sisters sisters!!!!

"I always knew that something good would come out of all those good men men who defend and befriend the poor little Vivian girls like he did against the murdering Landelinians, when in trouble, and when they seemed absolutely fiendless. This Christian general Picknell has a fierce face, and a fierce nature but he uses both for a good cause. He is one of the true friends of the Vivian Girls in the army - of Angelinas. I must tell the good news to poor Violet and her sisters. My won't they be surprised."

He reached the base hospital but did not find them. In inquiring hurriedly of their whereabouts he was told that they went to near one of the nearest Catholic churches erected within the lines, and knowing which one it was he immediately went thither. He found them grouped together in front of the church door like pretty fairies holding council and from what he heard them saying, he realized at once that he knew it too. He wondered how they knew it.

"Oh Evan's dear!" Said Violet as he joined them!!!!

"Oh it's the magnificent and beautiful work of his excellency the Devil general Germania Vivian." Said Evan Evans shrilly. "I'm going to show that his dead had so deeply moved and when I think of it now I feel it coming on me again. I'm going to show my gratitude by paying him back as soon as I get the opportunity. If I ever get the chance to meet him, he'll never live to harm another child."

And he said this bitterly indeed, while his face was clouded with a black look.

"You'd better be careful colonel Mack Evans." Said the agent seriously and with a warning look. "You may get the chance to kill him, but if you do his men will turn the world upside down in their endeavors to run you down."

"No matter what I do I'm firmly determined that all their endeavors to run me down will be a smarting failure." Said Evans defiantly. "If they do succeed in getting me it is because I cowardly gave myself up."

The agent saw his determined look but nevertheless shook his head as he said:

"It's easier said than done. Even by day I know the character of Germanias Landelinians well.... You are perfectly justified before God in avenging his dastardly attempt to mine the Vivian girls to death, but if I cannot turn you away from your intation I may as well recite your last prayers for you. Amen."

"Still I defy them." Said Evans.

"But those Landelini Landelinians mean business when aroused." Repeated the agent.

Evans only laughed....

"You railway agents think you are taking sense into us avenging Angelinas and Angelinas." He said. "But Frank with my friend I suppose you do not know your pal Jack Evans long enough. When I set upon a purpose I do it with success, and get away with it too.... When I first saw them and the torture they suffered from the wounds, and heard the doctors frightful sentences, that they would probably be crippled, disfigured, and blinded for life, and always always be on wheelchairs for life I felt as if I would burst apart. I vowed to get Germania under any conditions and hurl him from his hell where he belongs, and by heaven and all there is there I will, and who is the Landelinian snake to get me at after the deed. I'd like to see him by Neptune. Who ever dare's persecute me shall share his fate."

"Well you are perfectly justified, and I hope you succeed in both."

Said the agent. "But here come's the train now. Need any help in getting the little girls into the coaches." "!!!!"

"Yes." Said Evans. "With me alone it's slow work, and only tries the patience of the engineer, who probably would be in a hurry."

The train pulled in at the station, slowing down and when it stopped, the little girls were helped into the coach, by the agent and Evans. They all bid the agent good bye, as the train pulled out, and soon they were tearing through general Vivian's lines, the soldier's cheering wildly as the train passed through. There was firing of guns, and great cheers, the waving of hats, and the wild flouting of flags and standards..... By the time the train left the Christian lines, far behind it was going at a far more terrific speed than Violet and her sisters had ever seen a train go before, and they felt sure they would reach the destination before the time mentioned. Evans fat the same way about it, but nevertheless did not like the tremendous speed of the train though he did not say anything....

IN BICKNELLS CAMP, AND WITHIN THE ABBIRAHNNIAN LINES AT CROWMER ANDREA.

They arrived softly and without mishap in the region of Bicknell's lines, three hours earlier than timed, pulling into the city of Mc-Molleston when it was still nighttime, and most of these soldiers were asleep. Violet and her sisters had taken turn on guard duty on the protest of Evans, so that they would not pass the destination.

Violet and her sisters waited until the train stopped and then with the help of one of the soldiers, who was on guard duty on the coach, and Evans the little girls were lifted off, and as soon as they breakfasted, they started off in the direction where Picknell's Abbirahnnian line were supposed to be.

"We have good news. Picknell's one of our oldest, Angolanian friends who had done so much for us when in trouble among the Glanellinians had turned more strongly over to our side, and is turning the enemy under my wicked inward brother from joining Manley with nearly his whole army, and advancing the rest to rescue all the Glanellinians under Manley."

"That is just what I came to tell you little girls," said Evans;

"It surprised me to learn that you knew it too. How did it happen that you found it out. I thought you said you little girls stopped reading papers."

"Papa told us this morning," said Jennie with rapture. "And we are very happy because we know that it is true. Oh, I wish we were able to see him. Evan's could you not take us to visit him?"

"I guess I can though his lines are a long distance from here near Croser Andrea. But I'll have to ask your father's permission so he will know at least where you are going."

They all immediately got into the carriage, and went on in the direction of general Vivian's headquarters. Reaching it they found him standing at the gate in apparent excited conversation with his generals over Picknell's sudden actions. Saluting Evans told general Vivian what he and the little girls wished. The great general's brow knitted for a moment, then he said:

"Yes I guess they can. But are you sure Evans that you can take them to the right place? Do you know where Picknell's lines are?"

"Yes to the northeast of Whillmanburger Zimmermann's lines helping him bar Germanias advance to relieve our Manley's, or retreat in that direction," said Evans. "It's about four hundred miles away though."

"You are right," said general Vivian. "But you are wrong in the distance. He is over five hundred miles from my lines."

"I can get a train on the Evangeline St. Clare that can make it in thirteen hours or sooner," said Evans. "And I can assure you their as safety as if anything happens to them it will be over my dad's body." And saluting he left the group of officers and went back into the carriage with the little girls, and ordered the driver to drive for the EVANGELINE ST. CLARE RAILROAD STATION, which was only a mile away from general Vivian's headquarters.

"I got the permit and now we are off," said Evans. "We will take the fastest train running on the Evangeline St. Clare railroad lines and that train is due in twenty minutes. It's a train loaded with soldiers going to Zimmermann's lines, and they will let us on free for on a soldiers special train, all in the Christian arms ride free."

They reached the station in ten minutes, and Violet and her sisters were helped, off being helped by Evans and the carriage driver, who handed them the crutches as they got off. Reaching the ticket office Evans inquired about the train, wishing to know for sure whether he had to pay or not.

"No," was the answer unless you are on a flutough. To what point are you going?"

"To the extreme left of general Zimmermann's lines," said Evans. "We are going there on a mission of friendship. We are to go and see general Picknell."

"Well, fowfff your riding is free then," said the agent.

"But how came it that the dear little girls with you, so strongly entrusted to you by their father are cripples?"

They were advised by some citizens however to wait until daylight before proceeding any further as in the dark if they reached Picknell's lines the Christian sentries might suspect them as prowlers and fire on them without mercy. This they decided to do, seeking a hotel, and finding that it was only two o'clock in the morning, they decided to sleep some more as they all felt pretty tired out, from the long sitting in the coaches. They slept longer than they had intended however, but nevertheless on awakening however it did not take them long to get ready, and after eating a light meal they started out on the way.

The April weather, though no far south as they now were was quite chilly but not quite freezing cold, and it was raining and snowing together, but nevertheless they made a good headway through the packy snow, left by the recent three big blizzards, following the deluge, hurricanes and tornado. It was not probably an hour, when in the distance they all saw what appeared to be a long white gray smear in the distance. At first Evans thought it was snow coming, but examining it with his glasses Evans suddenly exclaimed:

"We are almost there. That white smear is a city of tents. I'm sure it's Picknell's lines."

After traveling some distance they soon saw that it was indeed a city of tents but whether it was Picknell's or Zimmermann's they could not tell.

Nevertheless they continued on, and soon there came a sharp challenge and to their surprise several fierce men in gray uniforms appeared and sized Evans up.

"Don't be alarmed we aren't landelinians," said the guard. "What do you eight persons want?"

"These little girls who are general Vivian's daughters know general Picknell who had befriended them in many perils. They are his friends and wish to see him," said Evans.

"Humph," said the guard. "And so those with you are general Vivian's children I presume. Well I'll let you through. But you will have to go under an escort as we can't be too sure about you yet. Three times already a man in purple uniform with the same number of little girls all crippled passed through our lines and would have done damage if not side seized. If Picknell recognizes you we will allow you to go free. But you'll be brought before him as prisoners, as we cannot and will not be tricked a third time."

Evans protested but it did no good. The Angolanian sentinel was obdurate and immediately signalled for the corporal of the guard by first yelling for him, and failing in getting him by this fired his rifle three to five times, getting an answer to drum fashion and Abbeannians in scarlet uniforms by scores swarmed up.

"I've arrested these persons as spies," claimed the guard. "They claim to be those Vivian girls we have heard so much about, and their guardian. We have been tricked three times already, at three different points. I know them not, but it is my opinion that if Picknell recognizes them, then this man's testimony is true."

Evans and the little girls were immediately placed under arrest, and under a strong escort of soldiers, which it was impossible under any conditions to escape from, and marched swiftly toward the heart of the Christian lines. The prisoners were not roughly treated, as otherwise would have been done when arrested by the rascally Glanellinians, and though treating them as prisoners one of their escorts apologized and told them the reason of their captivity.

"It happened that three times during the night, a man appearing in Angolanian uniform with seven beautiful crippled girls, had managed to on the testimony of being the guardian with the Vivian girls to pass the lines, and when inside had been caught trying to blow up general Picknell's headquarters, and ruin most of their supplies.

Though by these had been seized and confined the scene happened a second time at another quarter of the line, and the man succeeded in wrecking some of the stores, by setting mines off before he was caught guard, and when the Abbeannians believing he had escaped examined the guardhouse, the first man had been put in, they found him still there, with the child prisoners and were all flabbergasted indeed.

They confined the second batch in a prison tent under heavy guard. The third time the same visit occurred at another point of the line, and when they were arrested it was seen that other fourteen child prisoners with the two make believe guardians were still confined, having failed to escape, and the Abbeannians did not know what to make of this strange mystery. After this all the Abbeannian generals issued orders, that all strangers trying to enter the lines no matter who they are, shall be arrested and confined, and before general nicknell.

"So you see now, we are not taking any chances." Said the escorting chances. "We do indeed trust that you folks are the true friends of general Nicknell, for the extreme beauty of you little girls makes us suspect the truth about you, so inde instead of confining you first as generally was the order we are going straight for general Nicknell's headquarters. If he recognizes you as the vivian girls you are free. He failed to recognize the other fourteen children as their make believe guardian and despite his handsome face and the beauty of the children who on being examined were found to be strange boyacutes in perfect amazing disguises which accounts for their mysterious twin like appearances. But they were nothing like you children with us now or the two men either/ee"

It was about half an hour's march to Nicknell's headquarters and when it was reached the orderly was dispatched to summon the great christian general one of the famous fighters general Vivian or Hanson can depend on to win this great war.... Then came the arrival of seven more prisoners they having been taken on a wagon as the "vivan girls" as the soldiers saw were really and truthfully crippled, not fake cripples like the other fourteen others were. The orderly soon returned stating that Nicknell wished them to be brought into the room right away. The little girls were carried up the long flight of stairs, Evans carrying Jennie and soon they were within the handsome structure.... The orderly told them to wait until the general arrived. Ten minutes passed before the great general appeared, being a fierce strong looking human lion to Evans imagination, though he had seen him many times also.

He came into the room with a kingly uniform on of strong violet strong violet color, covered with religious medals, and not decorations like other generals in Germany, he had a majestic bearing, and was six feet five inches tall. He looked long and sharply at Evans and Violet and her sisters and said:

"A 'At' of you may return to your quarters. I wish to be alone with the eight prisoners."

There was a general mum murmur of assent and saluting the soldiers depe departed, Nicknell drawing a chair from the corner and motioning Evans to sit down. There was a silence for several moments. Nicknell standing as still as a statue. Then he said turning suddenly and abruptly:

"This is indeed an unexpected occurrence. You little girls are really Violet and her sisters. But who is your companion? Three other men with his same looks, same color of eyes, hair and expression of mouth, have been arrested as dangerous spies. My whole army is flabbergasted. What is your name colonel?"

"My name is Jack Evans, and the papers prove my identification." Said Evans presenting an envelope which crackled with the contents. The little girls wished to pay you a visit and thank you for your recent kindness to them, and with the permission of their father I consented to bring them."

Nicknell examined the contents of the papers, and then said:

"Those three men had the same kind of documents but of white paper. This is yellow as and has general Vivian's signature on it, written on it by his own hand, which was a false hand on the others. It is my purpose to turn my prisoners over to general Vivian to do as he sees fit with them as I consider it is a very serious secretege to pose as the vivian girls to do such a dastardly deed as they attempted. The three had been imposing as you and the little girls, being fake cripples imposed it as the Vivian girls when they were really twin brothers the whole fourteen an insulting secretege indeed. I knew that they were not you little girls at the very first glance, and had them flogged for the secretege, before they were confined. What general Vivian will do to those wicked children I know not, but those three men will be shot as spies by my own men. It's only the children I'll turn over to general Vivian."

Indeed to state his greeting was great to behold, and after embracing the little girls to his hearts contents, he asked them the reason why they were crippled, and had to use the support of crutches.

Violet and her sisters, with their forgiving nature were very loath to tell him, but Evans told it all in a very bitter voice, and of his intentions to reward general Germania Vivian....

"It is a good thing if somebody would get rid of him." Said Nicknell with a fierce scowl. "I always did hate him the first day I heard of his character after the war began. The reason is the worse of all the wicked Glandelinian generals and I would give anything myself to get a whack at him. I had sworn since I entered the war that if I ever got into actual contact with Germanian army I would annihilate the bloody scourge and give no quarter whatever."

"Everybody told it to, even poor Violet and her sisters said that I was running a great risk in killing him." Said Evans. "They say his Glandelinians would murder the girl to get me if I killed him." "So they would and there is no doubt about Warley being the very same thing, and all the Glandelinians." Said Nicknell. "But if you wait your chance to kill him in battle you will be after. No one then will know how he got killed. The fools will think he fell in battle."

"I suppose that's the only way." Said Evans. "But I fear that the cowardly child assassin would keep keep himself far to the rear of the lines during a battle, and I would never see him. No I'll get him no matter how I do it. No matter what the risk or peril. I'll not be thwarted. I'll get him if it is the last thing I do. He did a wicked thing to the Vivian girls when he mined them and I always pay my debts, when I have any to pay no matter what they are. I owe him a deep exceedingly great, and I'm going to pay him and pay him all that coming to the brute."

"You are so courageous all right, my boy." Said Nicknell. "I see you are determined to get him, and I'll do all in my power to help you and so will the christian chief Hanson who offered a great reward to any one in his command who helps you get him. I'm the one that'll help help, and the only reward I want is to see the cur punished as he well deserves."

"I'm very grateful to you general Nicknell, and will appreciate it very much. I know from their statements that you have done a lousy what you could for poor Violet and her sisters, and that shows that you are a true friend. For all you have done was a good proof of your friendship of the Vivian Girls. I remember when you even refused to allow your army to give way at Nicknell and his Glandelinian when all the others had given way in confusion. But if I dare to ask why did you refuse to give way?"

"General Hanson and a Vivian are special boyhood friends of mine and so I tried in every battle to avoid disasters for them both. The main reason why I help to hold ground to the last at Bir Girknookl was because of the great and glorious execution of hundreds of thousands of children at Bir Girknookl. It was such a glorious and justified execution that when I arrived I helped in it. If those dirty Glandelinian butchers could come up from the depths of hell and tell you of my reward you would be surprised."

"But I thought you was against the slaughter?" Said Evans.

At this the look of Nicknell scowling pugnacious expression of face was frightful and his eyes flashed an angry.

"AGAINST IT!" He fairly roared. "AGAINST IT! Indeed I ain't no indeed. Those Glandelinians who did the deed could tell you all if they were here especially how quickly I hurried them down to perdition where they belonged. Then I first took command of armies in this dreadful war, there was a lot of child butcher armies facing me then, who as they called it gloriously executed children when over they caught them, and who I gloriously executed in return when I took them prisoners during the battles. I even made it pure and simple to my officers and men time and again that they will have their children protected and protected at any time I want them protected, and that every child slain shall be paid for dearly. I broke it into them that no prisoners are to be taken unless the Glandelinians come from a command that are not child butchers. I managed to stamp out all the fons of children out of my way and finally cleaned out all Glandelinians still indulged in it that dared oppose my army until within two years after the war began I had slain about four four fourteen million Glandelinian child assassins. I was about ten miles south of Almasaria when that great assassination of children was going on of Nicknell avenging part of the secretege and hearing of it I rode there with my army, and put a speedy stop to it myself after the battle was over. Those poor little Vivian girls were among those rescued by that good Glandelinian general Nicknell, those rascally butchers having been about to dispatch them, when the Glandelinian Nicknell came up, and as he had been in an ugly mood all day, on account of anlays conduct and actions the previous week, and when he saw those dead bodies of murdered babies and children, and the piteous sight of Violet and her sisters, he simply as I heard later lost his temper and felt as if his heart had gone plump out of him. Terrible frightful had been his vengeance, and Warley did not dare make a single protest for what he did. He had the rascally murders put to the same death and torture which the children had suffered, befriended and rescued Violet and her sisters, and he always is really secretly aiding the Christian armies by mysterious signals during the Glandelinian-Atlantic fighting. After that my own suspicions were aroused. I began to realize that the Glandelinian cause was the most wicked thing on imagination, and a bloody one. I have warned general Vivian and others about it all how dangerous the Manleys and their other great Glandelinian generals were. But all my advice and warnings were just as good, as if I expected a stone image to give me a piece of bread out of its own hand, in reward for my pleas. My warning your general Hanson and Vivian alone were heeded, which accounts for the fury of all these battle between them and the Glandelinian generals. I grew impatient and angry at even the foolish Christian generals who heeded not my warnings and advice, and seeing the trouble coming between me and Manley many of the wicked armies of the foe had advanced to oppose me to their sorrow though whether I won battles or not. Many times my armies rose against Manley with terrible fury, as you may know by the battles you have heard of with his armies and mine, and if I can help it Manley's armies will never be able to march northward again. I did all this because of the sorrow of the little Vivian girls, the massacre of children, and the horrible sacrilegious deeds committed by the Glandelinians. The Christian cause was always for mine, and I'll do all I can to win it for that cause to, even risk my life if need be."

Evans marveled at this story. He realized that Picknell had played the game well, had the Manleys now at his mercy, and that Glandelinia was doomed to a slow or speedy downfall. Violet and her sisters were very happy at seeing what a man he really was, and thanked him warmly for the past kindness he had shown them. Picknell embraced them, played with them, and finally wrapped garlands of pretty flowers around their golden heads which made them look all the more prettier. Finally he invited them to dinner, and in the dining room were many Abhinannian generals and especially among them Violet and her sisters recognized general McWhirther. He did not recognize them, but when Picknell introduced them the scene was beautiful to behold. The dinner was a good one fit for a dozen kings, but nevertheless Violet and her sisters only ate what was best for them, refusing mostly all the sweets, which they couldn't bear. All the generals declared that the little girls knew what was best for them, but nevertheless they saw to it that they had enough to eat, and waited upon them as if they were seven little crippled princesses, instead of the Vivian girls. If Picknell told them all how the little girls got crippled, but McWhirther said with more force, "Germania only did this only to meet his doom. I recognized Jack Evans the moment I laid my eyes on him. He is the lad alright that will fix Germania. Vivian, just mark my words. It'll soon happen. Germania is a rascal if there ever was one said general Logan Dargins who was among the Abhinannian officers, "I'm always a willing fighter for a cause. I always believe good, and I don't believe there is a good Glandelinian even who would believe or fight with the term, "Execution" of children, and prize priests, nuns, monks, and lay brothers. I have heard much about the little Vivian girls though this is the first time I have ever met them. I never could have imagined that they were so beautiful, as they are. They're life long cripples." He added a turning to the little girls guardians. "No," said Evans. "They are improving rapidly, and can walk even a hundred feet without the crutches. The doctor had said that in another two weeks, they won't need the crutches any more."

"It's a long time since the battle of Brigan," said general Everett, "a big strong giant of moderate size and quite fat." I used to be a big bully in citizen life, making a rascal for every day for some offense and I do wish I could meet Germania, Vivian face to face. I'd change his shape for him. "Never mind, just wait until the guardian of those little fairies get a good wink at him," laughed general Hanson. Joseph Jensen, who was also with Picknell, "It will be Germania last. I just wish though he would get into a clash with our army. We would prove to Manley once more that we are really as fierce as we always were before, and not merely bragging about it."

McWhirther was next to general Picknell in command and had whispered something for several minutes. Then Picknell, approaching Evans said:

"General McWhirther has just thought of a scheme to help you get that rascal general Germania Vivian. He says that the plan is to get general Vivian in action at Gromer Andrea. He would write to general Vivian to assault Germania Vivian, then pretend to be beaten in the battle that is to follow, and to retreat abandoning his siege."

This would give Germania a chance to advance successfully, and finding that general Zimmerman's army barred his way, he would have to make a turn to the left, as a flood is between him and Zimmerman anyway. Thus he would come upon my army, expecting the coast to be clear in this location. Then we could with the help of Zimmerman and Vivian close on him. Vivian would crush him in his rear, and then we could have him where you could get him. What do you think of the plan? Is it not a clever one indeed?"

"It is a good plan indeed," cried Violet rapturously. "Even Evans you are luck if you accept it. Please do for our sakes. It will end the cruel war sooner."

"It is the problem of Vivian accepting it," said Evans placing an arm affectionately around her.

"I'm sure he will accept the plan," said McWhirther. "And if he doesn't why then he is foolish. He would be letting a good opportunity slip by altogether. But to carry out your wish you will have to stay here with us until you get him. You don't want to lose your chance for all the world do you?"

"We will stay," said Evans. "We'll stay until sent for by general Hanson, or general Vivian."

"All right that's a go," said general Picknell. "And we'll beg the dirt old fox and make him pay dearly for what he has done to the poor little Vivian girls."

Violet and her sisters with Evans stayed a long time with these Abhinannian generals and then Picknell showed the little girls where their sleeping quarters was to be, so they would know when wishing to retire. Evans was to sleep in the same room with Picknell. Then having important matters to perform general Picknell left his headquarters, leaving Violet and her sisters alone with their guardian. In a few minutes there was not a single person in the building, excepting Evans and the little children, the generals having all gone out to work on their plan of bringing Germania to justice. For a time Evans and the little girls were very quiet. Violet and her sisters sitting by the window watching the falling rain and snow outside, and Evans examining the books in a library came he happened to spy. Not finding a book that suited him, as they were in a language he could not read or understand, it being German, he strode out of the room to return with a small book with a white cover in his hands. He glanced through it and finding it written in Latin and it being an interesting story he sat down on a chair and proceeded to read it. He was there for some time reading page after page of the book, and then Violet and her sisters getting tired of the profound silence, went into the room where Evans sat reading.

He arose at their approach, offering them the free use of the long lounge he was laying on. They sat down on it, Evans being in the middle. In a jiffy Evans had an arm around one little girl, on his left, and another around a little girl on his right, the little girls nesting their heads wearily against his bosom.

"Oh Evans how happy we are to have you when all our friends are dead and gone," said Violet. "But we fear we will lose you, for the foe may get you when you punish Germania."

"I know better," said Evans. "You little girls will have me always. I'll never allow them to get me and if they do they won't hold me that is a fact. How can they get me anyway when we get his army surrounded and capture or annihilate all of them?"

"But Manley's Glandelinians like Germania," said Violet seriously. "They may do you harm."

"No, no," said Evans. "When I'm firmly determined to keep free I'll keep free. No Glandelinian rascals have ever captured me yet, and they never will. If they had I don't remember it. I'll kill all who would dare make the attempt. I won't allow any of their tricks to fool me either. I never was born a fool. So you need not fear."

And the little girls did not need to have any fears for his safety, for even after he got Germania as we will soon see in this chapter 33 in volume four.

And after it happened the Glandelinians hardly ever paid any attention to him either, and left well enough alone. There was not a Glandelinian in any of the wicked armies that dared to attempt any mischief on Evans who as they knew was always as a fury when aroused. Anyway Violet and her sisters did feel that Evans despite his attempt would face no danger whatever whatever, and so said no more about it. Evans still had his arms around Violet and Evangeline, but as Jennie stood in front of him endeavoring to show him some something he had in her dainty hands, he had her pressed fondly to his breast, where she knew what he was going to do, and with a cry of rapture, she threw her arms around his neck and kissed him, just as Bicknell and Heubaus McWhirther quietly entered the room. They saw this and quietly stole out, not wishing to disturb them in their happiness. So quietly did Evans embrace of that poor happy little Jennie, that being this way only a minute, she fell asleep in his arms and with her arms still around his neck. It was a happy little group of fairies alright, and Evans laying Jennie down on the bed fondly kissed her. Who who I wonder could not like to be in their place, for at least this little time. And little did Evans think indeed that for poor Violet and her sisters, that though their sorrows would remain some time their persecutions were waning, that in chapter fourteen of volume four all sorrow is a thing of the past, that though the war was to really last sixteen more months, they would only see the thrilling adventures, plenty of joy happiness and fun, and even witness the capture of Johnston Valley and the destruction of several more Glandolinian armies, and of the capture of the city of Glandolinia. In this chapter alone is their last main sorrow especially for poor Violet alone, who when her sisters mysteriously disappear she thought them gone.

In the meantime while Evans and the little girls were left to themselves general Francis McAllister, Heubaus McWhirther, had telegraphed to general Vivianmann and general Vivian and announced that Violet and her sisters were safely within Glandolinia lines, and also told them of Evans intention to get Germania, Vivian, and told Vivianmann of the plans.

At first this great christian general, did not know what to decide on, but finally he telegraphed that he would do the trick, as soon as the weather was favorable for a battle, and that he would drag Germania into the trap, so that his racially army would be captured and Germania also.

THE THREATENING STORM AT FRANCIS-ATLANTA.

Toward supper time Bicknell and Heubaus McWhirther returned again to his headquarters and during a supper told Evans and the little girls that Vivianmann was going to follow out his plans as soon as the weather became good once more. Violet and her sisters felt that a severe conflict was brewing, but nevertheless hardly cared how furious it was as long as the christians did not get worsted. The next morning Bicknell rode up to his headquarters quite early, after a hard night and meeting Evans suddenly said:

"Colonel Evans I've a message here from general Williamsburger Zimmermann, it's his wish to see you and even the Vivian girls on important matters. He even wishes to see me."

"All right we will go," said Evans. "His lines is only twenty miles away from here."

In a few minutes the whole party was on the way, Bicknell having a strong force with him so that no mischief could be tried on the Vivian girls. In case hostile Glandolinians encountered them. They went in two automobiles, the soldiers no being on horseback, and within two hours the camp of the other fiercely fighting christian army was in view. Knowing Bicknell well the sentinels allowed him and the rest to pass through, and a party of Ablesmannians escorted them to Zimmermann's headquarters tent.

Zimmermann met them as they came up, but his face immediately changed color as he saw Violet and her sisters using crutches.

"I thought sure I could use you little girls," he said bitterly. "And I find you lit like this. How came you to meet the accident?"

"I was no accident," said Violet.

"NO ACCIDENT?" said Zimmermann angrily. "Well then who did this to you and your sisters?"

"Germania did it," said Evans sharply. "If you had seen--"

"Enough," thundered Zimmermann. "I see it all now. You Evans are or is their guardian and they are your best friends. Are you going to leave their cruel deformities unpunished?"

"I'm a false friend, a treacherous enemy of these little girls, and I'll follow down to hell if I do," said Evans his face turning crimson with rage. "I'm just watching my chance. The plans are already about started and I'll kill general Germania like a dog as he is. The Glandolinians may turn the world outside or inside out to get me after the performance, but anyway I'm fully determined that they won't succeed. I carry automatic sixty six revolvers, and they are perfectly handy, I need never fear even an army of fiends with these trusty weapons."

Zimmermann felt relieved, but said nevertheless;

"Don't be rash and foolish about your taking vengeance my boy. Wait until he gets in to a battle, then pump him full of lead."

"I planned with the help of Bicknell and McWhirther, to drag Germania's army into a trap, capture what we do not annihilate, and bring the racial or do something."

Said Evans; "I'm bound that the plan will succeed too."

"Well as I find I cannot use the little girls I'll have to use you colonel Evans," said the famous christian chief. "General Vivian wants this package to reach general Vivianmann, concentrating at Francis Atlanta, and either you or the Vivian girls are the only persons that could take it safely too."

"I will guard the Vivian girls," said Bicknell; "Until you come back. It's a dangerous mission, and you must be careful."

"Zimmermann explained the dangers, he would face and so appalled were Violet and her sisters, that at first they refused stormingly, to allow him to go, threatening that as an orphaned as they were, they would go with him if he had to do it."

"Well somebody's got to take it, that's all there is to it," said Zimmermann; "And general Vivian named only Evans on the wireless he sent me. This message has got to reach general Vivianmann, this night, or before Almighty God, and the Blessed Virgin, this war is lost. The three Manley's have succeeded in eluding us and have advanced against the christian armies concentrating before Francis-Atlanta."

In hearing this, poor Violet and her sisters had to submit, though they felt that their happiness was over, and that they would never see him again....

It was a sad farewell, and soon Evans was on his way toward general Vivianmann's lines. He knew of the peril threatening him, but nevertheless he was bound to keep himself free for the sake of poor Violet and her sisters, who now never ceased their prayers, that he may come back. Violet and her sisters knew that in some location near by, about probably a score of miles, from Zimmermann's army, general Manley's Glandolinians may be entrenched and there was danger that he would have to pass through his lines, and probably be captured.....

Bicknell now did not have any happy little girls in his headquarters as he did the previous days, but nevertheless he did his best to console them, and played many games with them and did everything he could think of to keep up their spirits. As to Evans he was certainly hoping that the wicked Glandolinians would pursue him, for he felt full of fight but his wishes were not granted, for about six o'clock he came within Vivianmann's lines, without encountering a single Glandolinian.... He passed the guard's guards and was ushered before general Vivianmann who Evans saw for the first time. He presented the package to the general who examined the contents.....

For a time general Viviananna talked with Evans asking why his little friends the Vivian Girls were not with him and as briefly as possible Evans told the whole story. Then Viviananna opened the package and taking out the sheet of paper read the contents; ; ; ; ;

"YOUR EXCELLENCY GENERAL VIVIANANNA;

Look out for the movements of the armies under the three Manley's. Out Zimmermann and Wionstia, to barricade the point of advance if possible with artillery. For Manley must not pass this junction of Evangeline St Clare, and Marie Osborne under any conditions whatever. And also watch out for general Germania Vivian. For I'm told by spies, that by his movements he means trouble. There seems a great battle threatening at Francois-Atlante so be on the lookout. General Vivian at Anna Maria. ; ; ; ; ;

If "I'll do that" Said general Viviananna, "And to-morrow if possible I'll start a quarrel with General a Vivian no matter what the weather is I'll fix up an advice for you tomorrow to general Zimmermann".

Evans waited until General Viviananna got through writing, and then as he handed him the package Viviananna said;

"Get this to general Zimmermann by all means. I know you can do it, and look out for the wicked Glandelinians."

"I'll be careful" Said Evans saluting, and he hastened on his way back again it was getting dark now and Evans having the opinion that danger usually lurks in the dark became more vigilant and watchful.

He took the road that leads the shortest way to the christian lines under Zimmermann, watching every move of the trees and brushwood, being his eye ready for an emergency. It being a thick wooded region, at this location

Evans soon found himself lost, and to make it worse a roaring April thunderstorm was driving up. He was at a loss of what to do. The storm finally broke, and soon he was drenched and dripping wet. All night long in the pouring rain rain

Evans tried to find his way out of the gloomy woods, but as morning dawned still gray and raining he was as it seemed far from any christian camp, and nearer to the enemy's lines, for in the distance he could hear graycoats laughing, singing and dancing, and at times could see them. Whose Glandelinians they were he could not tell, but going nearer he suddenly discovered a group of graycoats who were conversing among themselves. What they said aroused him. One of the Glandelinians who was a sergeant had been holding up his right hand and this is what he heard the sergeant say;

"Altogether now men. Hold up your right hands, and we will all vow to get that colonel Jack Evans, and his package before to night, and once we get him, why the gutter-snips, called Violet and her sisters, or the Vivian Girls will no longer be safe and with him out of the way we can torture"

You ought to have said, "Grow my heart and hope to die" you infernal skunk." Shouted Evans losing control of himself and he followed this up by three shots that brought the insulting sergeant and several other Glandelinians down. At once there was a noisy confusion, among the other Glandelinians who scattered, yelling for their comrades to come and help them. Evans immediately dashed off, and fifteen minutes after Evans saw a mighty horde of wild Glandelinians swarming through the woods with a colonel in the lead. Evans was a good sprinter having been a great racer in his earlier day, and if slim Jim in the comic could ever beat Evans Evans in running I'd eat my hat and shoes before anybody who reads this. The brave Glandelinians were amazed at the terrific speed of their fugitive and fired a volley to try and bring him down but the bullets flew wild. Evans seeing that he was pursued said to himself as he glanced backwards;

"I hereby vow myself, to give those swarm of cooties a merry time to day. At least this excitement may give me a chance to find my way out of this labyrinthian of woods."

The Glandelinians were yelling and firing the officer officer shouting wildly;

"Hitler up men. He is certainly without a dispute a racer, but we will tire that blasted christian spartan of a dog out around then we will have the critter."

Evans continued on, tripped over something and fell sprawling. He got up quick enough, but four of the Glandelinians had almost come upon him.

"Well those imps think they have got me?" "Heh-heh." They are too close to fire at at least I have no time to draw my guns. But this ladder I tripped on gives me a hunch. Just watch your Jack Evans." And immediately he seized the ladder, standing it almost upright and jumping on the fourth rung started a great plan balancing act he had always done with ladders, when he was a kid to show off before his little girl friends, and when the four Glandelinians came up he made one spring catching a brute in each of the large spaces between the rungs bearing the Glandelinians violently to the ground, their rifles flying vigorously in the air, and being discharged as they fell.

This stunt amazed the Glandelinians, who were far behind, but Evans was far out of range before they could fire, and several of them had to halt to pull their four comrades free from the ladder. A score of other Glandelinians managed to gain gain on him, but in a free fight he laid them out, shot down twenty of the others who tried to catch him and diving into a garbage can, nailed six Glandelinians under a window sash, by nailing it down and nailing it fast with a hammer, as the Glandelinians had tried to crawl in all at once expecting him to be hiding in the house.

Then continuing on Evans said to himself; "Gee this would be a happy day for the whole bunch of Glandelinians if they could grab me now, for what I've done to them."

Evans by his fast sprint managed to reach the Angeline River, catch a small ferry boat with a veranda on it, but simultaneously fifteen Glandelinians caught the same boat. Evans saw throw them of them sawing away at the on slantwise beams holding up the veranda he was standing on, but quick witted as he was he tied a rope securely to the railing of the veranda, and attacking a hook on the other end, fastened it to the coat collars of the unsuspecting Glandelinians. Evans jumped off the veranda just as it gave way, pulling the exceedingly astonished Glandelinians down with it into the icy water with a great splash.

"I guess I've lost the Glandelinians my by this time all right." Thought Evans to himself. "By the time they scramble out of the water, I'll be across the river. By gosh I can't be too sure about that." He suddenly added to himself. "I see more approaching by the gangway. But he also got the best of these Glandelinians by making hastily a dummy of himself, and while the Glandelinians were about to throw it into the river, or discovering the trick he shot them up sending them scurrying down the quarter deck. Evans seemed to pursue them when one of the leaders seizing a big bowl of soup the chef was bring over to the captain, with the evident of scolding Evans, with the hot liquid, but Evans realizing his purpose instantly ducked, just as the enraged graycoat hurled it in his direction, throwing the scalding liquid all of it over the Glandelinians, who had been sneaking upon the rear of Evans with the intention of seizing him from behind, scalding them severely. At this moment the rest of the Glandelinians appeared, and after a lively fusillade of shots, which made a noise heard far down the river, Evans brought down all the rascals who dared expose themselves, during the full furious and hot fighting, and in the lull that followed Evans raced across the deck, poised himself gracefully above the bulwarks (His bullets and guns being waterproof) and dived into the water. The flatberged glandelinians fired wildly, in an effort to kill him, but he was unhurt and swam mostly under water clear to the opposite bank. However knowing that he had taken the ferry, the other pursuers had crossed the river by bridge, and he found himself still pursued. Reaching a small stone Evans had halted on a small curbstone, with the intention of taking an auto, when three citizens who were some of the pursuers in disguise at that, crept up behind him, with a tall barrel between them which they suddenly slammed over him, with all the violence their strength would permit. They slowly lifted the barrel, expecting to find him in death.

"WELL I'LL BE BLOWN FOR A DEAD MAN'S GHOST." Gaped one of the glandelinians, his face growing white.
"GONE SURE ENOUGH." Gaped another. "He him simply disappeared through the curbstone as if he was a spirit."

Dear readers could you guess How Evans brought it...

Well on the curbstone where he had been standing was a small cover over a sewer, which had a make to open and shut when any weight was forced down on it by a blow. Well that is exactly what happened, and Evans knowing the secret of the sewer cover, from its appearance, and noticing the approach of his would be captors, had been prepared, and so instead of being hurled down into the sewer as any one would have expected, he found himself shot with great speed through a passage way, and thrown out of another sewer, six blocks down the road. Indeed the glandelinians were bewildered, over the mysterious disappearance of their fugitive, and they were unable to find any trace of him, and in fact he was already out of their sight and within striking distance of christian lines. The glandelinians believed they had been pursuing a ghost in purple uniform, and all the way back to their own lines, they always expected that he would suddenly appear to them. Evans made for the christian lines in haste, reaching the picket lines in a very few minutes, and being challenged. The sentry recognized him however and permitted him to pass on. Evans not sure whose lines he was in and so decided to ask. On inquiring the guard told him that he was within Zimmermann's lines, and as he was not back as soon as expected they had already given him up for lost, and he told him that the Vivian girls were almost heartbroken.

"I would have been here more sooner." Your excellency. He said as the general met him, then he reached reached his headquarters. "If it had not been for me getting lost in the wooded regions. It was the enemy who showed me the way out."

"The enemy showed you the way out?" Asked Zimmermann.
"How comes that?"

"Oh I just happened to come within sight of their lines. I do not know whose lines it was, but nevertheless I heard a sergeant swear to get me, and called the Vivian girls very disrespectful names. I simply argued with them, and in fact they showed me the way out. And he added by teak telling of his experience.

"You are a regular comedian." Laughed Zimmermann. "And I wonder what the glandelinians thought of your mysterious disappearance in the last act."

"Maybe to them I'm a spirit now." Said Evans. "I heard one of them mention the word ghost, and this confirms my belief that they now take me for a ghost."

"I guess you had better return to Ricknell's lines as soon as you can get there." Said Zimmermann. "You stayed longer than we ever expected and we believed you had been taken." Violet and her sisters as Ricknell told me had almost swooned at the news."

"I'll go right away." Said Evans. "I can't stand it to see them broken hearted. I wouldn't have went if it had not been so necessary. In the meantime general telegraph I'm coming."

"I will do that." Said Zimmermann. "I feel it my duty to take away their sorrow the poor little girls."

Evans at once started off toward Ricknell's lines on the fastest horse that Zimmermann could secure for him. Ricknell's lines really was not very far, but nevertheless after he had traveled nearly half a mile from Zimmermann's lines he heard the wild thunderous roar of horses hoofs far behind him and saw a large swarm of McWollesianians charging across the opening toward him at breakneck speed led as it seemed by Starring and his two companions. He was taken completely by surprise at this unexpected occurrence, and believing them hostile enemies, he made a right wheel, and dashed down a road at break neck speed, Evans drawing his two guns to use if needed. He soon saw that they meant it for him alright, for at his rush they set up a frightful crashing fusillade of shots the bullets flying about him like hail, but neither he or the horses was touched though his hat was carried away by a bullet fired by Starring. Evans was fully aware that this was some of general Gorman's glandelinians for he had heard that these famous glandelinian boyacouts were in his command since the battle of Olorinia Francesanna. He believed they were the main cause of the pursuit, as they were the worse enemies the Vivian Girls had, and so he decided to show the rascally kids a thing or two. The pursuing glandelinians were now yelling like devils and riding with might and main never ceasing their fire for a moment, and it was a miracle indeed that he or the horse was not hit.

They were making a swift swifter pace than he had ever saw the glandelinians do on their fleetest horses, and fully aware that they would overtake him in no time he dashed for a tree with a low overhanging branch, and drawing his heavy sabre he made a powerful swing at the branch cutting it at one blow, the whole thing crashing to the ground, barring the progress of the wildly yelling glandelinian glandelinians who set up a fiercer yell of derision and again started a more furious fusillade, but again did not hit him or the horse as he was out of range.

"Go down the opposite road, and I'll take the right hand passage myself." Said the colonel to his men. "He got away from the other pursuers in the woods, by playing ghost or something, and it is up to us to get him as he is a spy. Good riddance for those Vivian dogs to if we catch him. We will show him what he gets for monkeying with John Manley's men."

Evans heard this remark and whelling his horse suddenly took the glandelinians by surprise by charging furiously and in a perfect fusillade from both Evans and the glandelinians the colonel fell pierced in the shoulder, and then Evans dashed off at a tearing pace, the glandelinians trying frantically with pike, lance and sabre to intercept him. Evans saw a squad of mounted men led by Starring swiftly gaining on him and suddenly wheeling his horse, he again played a good gun duel, with them, causing them such such heavy loss and seriously wounding even the lieutenant who led them that the survivors, were glad to beat a hasty retreat. Evans making a wild dash in which he captured Starring, quickly disarming him, and tying him crosswise on his horse. Then the mad race and fighting was continued, Evans saying as the glandelinians came thundering on still yelling like demons, and excited by the bravery of their fugitive;

"You will soon find out what comes of turning against the Vivian Girls after that Judas kiss of violet, when I get you within general Vivian's lines, and if those desperate pursuers gain on me again

I'm going to either make them go back, or throw you under the feet of the wildly racing horses. For treacherous enemies of the Vivian girls like you are Walter Starring of whatever your first name is, I show no mercy. I have none."

The new bunch of pursuers who were rapidly drawing nearer and nearer saw that their fugitive had Starring in his possession and knowing the fury of Evans when he is aroused they slowed down.

"They'd better slacken their pace." Replied Evans. "I may get out of their reach but I'll have to watch out for those trying to intercept me. If they try to close in on me I'll remember my threat and there will be one less enemy to cause the Vivian girls misery. He now far outdistanced the glandelinians to his rear but the pursuers rather than have anything happen to Starring gave it up trusting that the other two parties would catch him in time.

Evans could already see the tents of Ricknell's lines in the distance and this spurred him to greater speed. In a few minutes the other two parties of glandelinians appeared from two directions meeting each other, and forming a long line to va har blow leveling their lances to throw, but Evans poised his prisoner high above his head threatening to throw him under the horses' hoofs, and knowing that he would really do it, the amazed glandelinians parted ranks and Evans passed safely through the gap. The glandelinians fell fairly wept with a fury of rage and hurled a shower of lances but none hit Evans, and they had not dared fire or use their lances with too good an aim for fear of hitting Starring and now seeing that a party of christians was coming from an opposite direction, the outwitted foe, reluctantly gave up the pursuit going back the way they had come. The party of Abbeannians rode up at a gallop every one of them being officers.

"We saw those Glandelinians pursuing you and almost came up in time for an engagement." Said one of them who was general Franklinia. "How does it come that you alone forced them to abandon the pursuit?"

"Well they did not like my threat of the throwing my prisoner here under their galloping galloping horses." Answered Evans. "And they probably saw you and your officers coming, and were in no haste for a fight just now. I'm colonel Jack Evans of general Vivian's command and I'm with general Picknell just now."

"So are we." Said the officer. "But you can hardly tell his men now. As they have discarded their red uniforms mostly all of them having been supplied with purple uniforms a week ago, and had just put them on this morning. But you said you were Jack Evans. Well if you really pity the Vivian girls you had better hurry to them. All in prisoner camp, believe believe that you were taken as you were gone so long."

"I'll be there quick quick enough." Said Evans smiling. "I think if it was not for the enemy chasing me I would not be within eight miles of the Christian lines yet, especially Picknell's."

He saluted the officers, and then dashed off toward the lines, passing the sentries easily, and reaching Picknell's headquarters within half an hour, with his prisoner still on his horse. Evans dismounted, and unfastening him ordered Starring to dismount.

"You may have me now but Picknell is a friend of mine, and you will catch it for arresting me." The boy shot out.

"There's never a person that's ever treated the Vivian girls like you or your testimonial companions did accordingly to their accusation." Evans shot back. "And it will pay you not to get sarcastic, for I'll not stand it from any Mandolinian, and because you may know Picknell it does not prove that he is your friend now, especially when you left Manley's command to join that infernal centemede Germania Vivian who nearly made Violet and her sisters crippled and disfigured for life. If the still fear for you I don't. I spurn your very presence and the sooner I turn you over to general Vivian the better. There was a time once when I was sorry for you but now I'm your enemy as much as you are theirs."

Starring said no more and followed Evans sullenly into Picknell's headquarters. Violet and her sisters who were standing outside in the hallway gave a start as they saw him, and Evans presented the prisoner to them.

"Here's your friend Gerald Starring." Said Evans spitefully. "He tried his very best to capture me but got captured instead."

Indeed Violet and her sisters were amazed when they saw Starring with Evans a prisoner. They did not know what to make of it but Jennie said:

"On Evans you was gone so long, that we thought you were really captured. What delayed you?"

"In taking a road which was supposed to be the shortest way back I got lost in a thickly wooded country, and spent all night in a terrific thunderstorm trying to find the way out." Said Evans. "In the morning meeting the enemy's lines I shot three of them for talking disrespectfully of you little girls who persuaded, and I escaped across theriver, and reached Zimmerman's lines sooner than I expected. After leaving his lines another force of Mandolinians gave me a thrilling run, but I not only escaped but captured Starring who was one of my persuaders. I think I done well."

Violet and her sisters looked reproachfully at Starring and then Evans said:

"It is best to turn him over to general Vivian immediately." "I did feel sorry for him once when he even did all that he did, forgave him wept for him and interceded for him, when in trouble and still he shows ingratitude by remaining an enemy of you little girls. And even that day so long ago during the battle of Germaine he had the impudence of kissing you Violet, a Judas kiss it was. I believe there will be no one to intercede for him now."

"Are you really going to do it?" Asked Violet reproachfully.

"That's what I intend doing." Said Evans with a pugnacious expression; "I got away from my second persuaders by threatening to throw the scamp under their horses, which I would have done if they had still come on, and then get away yet. He and his companions are young scoundrels, treacherous enemies of you little girls, and ought to be hanged, and I'm going to do my best to capture the other two. And still you forgive them."

"For my part I can almost wish to see them brought to justice." Said Jennie. "But we do forgive Starring. It's his fault Starring turned against us, and deserves it more than him. I'm almost heartbroken to think that Starring though being a Mandolinian boy scout is only a weakling, or otherwise he would not have done what he did, no matter what his two companions would say or do. The whole three of them need it, and though the other two need it worse than him we still do forgive them."

"I think for my part we ought to consider first." Said Angeline with heat. "Any punishment meted out for him, would do him no good at all, and he is not really responsible for it. He and his companions probably have been led astray by the wicked Manleys, who only deceived them. It is true we cannot save him or his two companions from the well deserved punishment but our Lord always taught us to forgive no matter what they do to us."

"You little girls could not help him now." Said Evans bitterly. "I telegraphed to general Vivian, the minute I entered Picknell's lines, telling him that I had Starring in my possession as a prisoner. He gave me word to hold him and sent him to his lines as soon as possible. He truthfully told me that no one can save him from punishment even his own, and that those who tried to do so no matter who they are, will be considered as alien enemies trying to protect him and will share his fate also. So there is no use for any consideration for it. I firmly believed that you would not resent to his punishment which was the cause of my haste in telegraphing general Vivian with out first consulting you little girls. So you see it is too late if you intended to intercede for him now."

"We had no intention to intercede for him when it would be a grievous offense of hindering the punishment of an enemy of our country." Said Angeline. "We said we only forgive him. And we only wished to consider in on the subject of the Manleys who alone are the main ones who ought to be brought to justice, and not the lads as they were only tricked, and led astray. It would be unfair to punish them boys without giving them a chance. I'm fully convinced that his kissing Violet was sincere."

"Well be that as it may it's too late now." Said Evans. "It's only up to general Vivian now. For my part I spurn him, for he is a loathsome in my presence."

However all the little girls had the same opinion as Angeline and Jennie and Joice herself only turned away her face and almost wept stating that Manley himself was more loathsome than Evans could even think for scandalizing the helpless, and could have almost demanded the reason of not bringing that scoundrel to justice. But however for a moment little Catherine was more severe and stepping up to Starring with a pugnacious expression said pin pointing menacing finger at him,

"You had no business with your fake love toward us to dare, yes dare kiss our sister Violet. Master Starring, if I had known your treacherous character before when you did it, I would have laid you in the hospital. If you had not been a coward you would not have listened to your rascally comrades who poisoned your mind against us. We were good to you twice, when you was a prisoner among our lines, and tried then with stories of all our past sorrows, misery, sufferings and misfortunes but it did not soften your wicked heart any. When facing our fathers wrath, which was more terrible than any we ever saw before, we risked his terrible anger on us by interceding for you and we succeeded and you repaid this ungratitude to us. We have always patiently stood the persecutions of all the Mandolinian chiefs and their men, even old Federal, even Federal's sacrilegious actions toward us, but your s and that of your companions we will not stand for. I for one would not intercede for you now under any conditions, and I would not allow my sisters to do so either. Bah I spit on you. You are as loathsome to me as a roach on the wall."

"Then turning to Evans she cried:

"Oh Evans please take him out of my sight. I can't for one bear his presence."

And Evans did, marching him before Picknell who was joyful and surprised to see Evans. Evans told of his experience and then said:

"I the prisoner I have with me I know or he had told me is a known friend of your, and that you would fix me for making him a prisoner. He and his two companions are the worse enemies Violet and her sisters have, and all of the except little Catherine forgive him I thought I'd consult you on the matter. I've already telegraphed to general Vivian who he gave me instructions to hold the prisoner until I got the chance to bring him to his own heady headquarters within his lines."

"Truthfully I was his friend but what hurt me, was when the scoundrel deserted me to join Manley's Mandolinians the wickedest Mandolinians there is." Said Picknell. "But I did not know he was the enemy of the Vivian girls. I disliked his companions they were as filthy before my presence. But it was Manley who led the foolish lad and his two companions astray. Do the Vivian girls pardon him and ask for his release?"

"They all pardon him except Catherine, and she simply implored me to take him out of her sight." Said Evans. "That's all she asked. Her sisters however forgave him and wished to see him have a chance, Catherine alone falling out of their ranks. Catherine gave him pain, and then as I said before, demanded me to take him out of her sight immediately and I did so."

"Well I don't propose to do any interceding myself." Said Bicknell grimly.

"They did wrong to feel about it as they did and I have a mind to report it to their father. And the sooner you send the rascal to general Vivian the sooner you can be rid of him. If you like I'll send him to the guard house, until you are ready to take or send him."

"Is I'd sooner see him started off for general Vivian's lines right away so there would be no chances of his escaping?" Said Evans.

"I can have him sent under guard to general Vivian's lines." Said Bicknell.

"Do so." Said Evans it will be a great favor."

And Bicknell did, the lad being manacled so that he could not break away from his captors on the train. Evans was glad to get rid of his prisoner, and when he saw the fool marched off he went back to Violet and her sisters.

"Well did you give him up to Bicknell?" Asked Daisy, the moment he appeared.

"No I didn't." Answered Evans puffing at his cigar. "Instead he is on the way to general Vivian's lines now. Bicknell was going to put him in the guard house until we returned to your father's lines, but I feared he would escape by that time and so had him taken right away under a strong guard. What do you think your father would do to the wayward fool?"

"He is wanted by our father for great spying exploits, among our lines." Said Angeline bitterly. "What papa will do I do not know but what ever it is we cannot and will try to prevent it and face his wrath like fools again. Probably the punishment will teach starring a lesson."

"But papa would reward you handsomely for the capture of his two companions who were the cause of it all." Said poor Violet seriously with tears in her eyes. "If we ever tried to intercede for him now we would be born fools. We heard Bicknell threaten to report us over it. I myself dear readers think Catherine was perfectly justified for doing what she did, and that she and her sisters would have annulled if they had tried to frustrate Evans' intentions to have him punished."

He was also bound to capture his two companions and bring him to justice like he did to starring Violet and her sisters soon turned their thoughts to other matters, especially about the coming actions at Grosier, Andrea, and Francis' junction, and then Evans played a few games with them. What he liked best was to make garland of flower wreaths of the early spring blossoms, already growing and place them on their heads. Then he would draw two of them close to him embracingly, and tell them the story of all he and they had experienced and of what he went through when a little boy. Violet and her sisters listened to him with interest, and when he was through Violet and her sisters told about themselves, when mere babies, and Angeline told of the rascally but repentant glandelinians who deserted her on a lone island, on which she was wrecked when out with a sailor friend.

"You must have been very courageous little girls when you rescued him from that seething geyser, when it was about to erupt any minute. He had tried to cause your death by means of the geyser and yet you rescued him when he almost fell in."

"Well at first we did really hate him as much as a poisonous snake." Said Violet. "But then we couldn't see him perish like that. And besides that experience made a better man out of him."

"I guess it did." Said Catherine. "But what became of him? I have not seen him the day we rescued him."

"He is in the glandelinian service for I've seen him often in various glandelinian armies." Said Evans. "They called him Boob-Head but I'm sure it is not his right name."

"And I wonder if he is the same rascal as he used to be?" Asked Evangeline. "We ought to find his location some day and try him out. If he has really changed despite being in the glandelinian service, he won't allow the soldiers to persecute us."

"He was one of my pursuers this afternoon." Said Evans. "He was in the bunch that tried to intercept me. He looked fiercely at me when I threatened to throw Starring under the horses of the glandelinians closing in on me."

"I'm sure then that he has forgotten his vow." Said Violet. "He knows your our guardian."

"I don't believe he does." Said Evans. "I don't believe he even knows me." Another night passed away a quiet snowy April night, and early in the morning Evans went scouting some in hastily reporting that far away in the north he heard a frightful roaring sound which never ceased. Bicknell also heard it, and the sound gradually grew louder and stronger awoke Violet and her sisters from a sound sleep. A first it sounded to Violet and her sisters like the great prolonged noise of the Francis Glorinia battle and Mt. Calvernia's eruption combined in one. It was a frightful sound and filled them with a strange dread. Bicknell had the opinion that Mt. Vivian a volcano fifty miles away northwest of Angeline was in violent eruption, and went out with the Vivian girls and Evans to see it but to his surprise the sky in any portion of the northwest was perfectly clear though a strange sickening haze was making the sun which was rising in the east red as blood from a wound.

WHAT CAUSED THE STRANGE NOISE!!!!!!

At half past eight in the morning the situation had become considerably worse, it seeming from the strange noise, that the interior of millions of far distant volcanoes seethed and boiled, and using his powerful glasses Bicknell would at times see small white pillars of smoke shooting across or northward and upward in the north northern skies, the noise almost causing strange terror and consternation to poor Violet and her sisters. At certain long intervals there would continue a terrible roar like distant thunder as if the whole world was splitting asunder, and the whole army was in wonder and excitement.

"What in heavens name is it?" Asked Evans of Bicknell when he returned. "I could swear that our world was about to blow to pieces any moment. Ain't it some volcanic eruption, beyond the sight of our vision?"

"I must---be." Said Bicknell. "But then I know that the explosions of a volcano volcanic eruption could never be so confounded continuous. What direction is the armies of general Vivian, Vivian, and Hanson, who you left to visit me?"

"Northeast of here." Said Evans. "Surely you don't think a battle could produce such a sound."

THE FRIGHTFUL CARNAGE OF FRANCIS LILLIAN.

Evans then went to inquire if Violet and her sisters were awake awakened by the noise and found the pretty little girls standing by the northern window of the main hall of Bicknell's headquarters looking intently to see if they could discover anything that made the noise.

Violet and her sisters looked around at his approach. "Oh Evans we are almost frightened stiff at such a horrible noise." Said Hattie. "What sin did we commit that we have to hear such a terrifying din?"

"None." Answered Evans. "And I can't make it out what it is at all but Bicknell is going to send several men in that direction to see for they can find out almost anything. He thinks it is some distant battle with your father's army, or your uncles, and its my opinion that either Mt. Calvernia, Francis, or Vivian are in eruption though we see no signs of volcanic activity north of us. My isn't the noise frightful?"

"Maybe if we use our field glasses we will be able to make it out." Said Daisy.

"It'll do no good for I've got better glasses than any of you little fiaries have, and even with them I could not make out what it was to save my life. I would probably take a giant microscope to detect anything at such a distance. But it is surely two things. Either a long line of far distant volcanoes are in their mightiest eruptions, or what Bicknell

"If Picknell sent any man out there, they probably will find out what it is." Said Violet. "But I'm afraid if the noise got's any worse, it'll shake our shelter down on top of us. A lot of dishes five minutes ago in the kitchen fell from the pantries, and the crenellations of all the windows were banging...."

Indeed the terrible clamor had got on the nerves of all in the whole of Picknell's army, and if it had not been for the frantic pleading of Violet and her sisters, Evans would have went forth himself to find out what caused the terrible roaring sound. He had remembered the terrible noise he had heard on the train while on his way to the Christian lines with little Francis Millian, and had from statements realized that it was from the terrible battle of Damiscanama that had been raging so furiously that night. But what was the cause of this clamor?!!?

For a long time they stood there then as the noise seemed to waken a little they felt that it was abating, and went into the parlor to have their time to themselves. Evans played a game of checkers with them and as he was purposely allowing Violet to win on his there was a terrible shock as if some violent concussion broke loose and which prot prostrated them and the table they were sitting around when playing the game to the floor, with a crash of smashing chairs and badly bumped heads. The windows were leaning violently against their casements, the pictures on the wall fell to the floor, and the plaster of the ceiling gave way with a crash making clouds of white dust that almost choked them. Simultaneously there had come a redoubled crash and roar far in the distance and as the little girls were helped to the thier crutches by Evans and while they were rubbing their heads where they not banged, they felt the house swaying as if there was a severe earthquake, and could scarcely stand.

"It's an earthquake." Cried Evans. "We must get out of the house before it gets worse. We might be killed."

It took them but a short time to get out of the room and into the corridor, and as the rocking continued with increasing violence they made for the entrance, to the courtyard of the mansion. They decided just now that the best shelter which was in one of the officers' tents which if shaken down could not injure anybody. But many a tent was found crowded by soldiers and though they wished to give room for them Evans wanted one not occupied and soon found one, and into this one they went to stay. Until the terrible clamor would cease to vibrate the ground so violently..... There happened to be one solitary soldier in the tent however, who arose as the little girls entered with Evans, the soldier removing his hat, but at Evans request he seated himself and went back to the work he was doing. Evans and the little girls were silent for quite a while listening to the continual racket in the far distance, and watched the man at his work. In the tent Violet and her sisters thought they could resume the game without interruption and so went again. Three games were won by Evans against Violet but every one her sisters played he lost. Then he took them all against him in a single game, and lost ten games to their one after playing all morning....

"Oh Evans it's just like if you didn't know how to play at all." Protested Violet. "Why can't you win?" "We win a every game, when we at the start though that you would win...."

"Oh he doesn't on purpose." Cried Violet. "We have played with him all kinds of gin games, even hide and seek since we first came into his house and he didn't win. He simply refuses to win on us. If there was somebody winning on him, I suppose there would be a fight in a jiffy."

"Maybe there would." Said Evans. "But just now I've hit upon a plan. And this time we will play seriously. I propose to go and see what causes that racket and we you little girls do not want me to go. Well I hardly can resist the desire. If I lose I won't go but if I win I'll go. How is that?"

"We will play it." Said Violet and the real serious game was on. Evans played hard against them, winning seriously and then losing advantages, but finally as he was about to win he got a bum card and lost the game.

"I wouldn't go now if I was requested to by one of the generals." Said Evans almost angrily. "I had a feeling within me during the game that told me if I went there would be trouble with you little girls, and I losing the game proves that danger is lurking somewhere. One of the distant Blengigloxennans we know so well that dwell within the region of Abbieannia came to me and told me this last night. He said to play a serious game with you little girls and if I won I would meet safely all the way and you would be protected, but if I lost and went anyway I would be leaving you to hopeless peril. I'm sure Germanias. Vivians spies are within or our lines for I saw many size us unperceptibly as we left the building. So I'm going to watch out for the scoundrels."

Evans was right when he knew a tent was van vacant opposite his, but a just a moment ago had seen two suspicious landelinians pass his tent size it up tent and all and enter the one opposite.

"I have a plan." Said Evans opposite. "I'll pretend to leave but also have a score of soldiers guard you armed to the teeth. In that way the well will nab the rascals."

THE CAPTURE OF THE WOULD BE KIDNAPPERS.....

Evans whispered something to the soldier working inside the tent and he went out and soon came back bringing unseen by the suspicious characters twenty of Picknell's Abbieannians. Then after telling them his plan Evans pretended to quarrel with and scold the Vivian girls, threatening that he would leave to return no more, and indeed the ruse worked. The landelinians saw Evans leave in an apparent rage, heard the Vivian girls crying as it seemed, and said to the leader in the tent with him:

"Now's our chance. Evans their guardian had got into a row over the game he was playing, and deserted them because they won and he claimed they broke their goodness by cheating him their best friend. Now is our chance to enter the tent undetected and put an end to their lives. For Germanias. Vivians want's them killed."

The landelinians hearing one of the Vivian girls calling piteously to Evans to return and forgive her and her sisters, thought sure they had the chance they wanted and stole cautiously toward the tent. Evans was hiding between two tents on the other side of the company street and saw the rascals ten in number steal toward the tent and saw that his scheme which he had planned with the little girls had worked and that the landelinians were walking right into the trap.

He had known that mere testimony against the landelinians would be nothing if he had arrested them just because they looked suspicious to him and so decided to catch them red handed by a ruse. He had told the little girls that pretending a quarrel, and kidnapping them would be probably the only means of luring the suspicious ones into a trap, and it was working fine. One of the rascally landelinians drew his dagger intending to murder his victims and in they went only to find scores of swarthy purple coats suddenly surround them. Then in came Evans.

"Well the ruse worked all right." He said nodding to the prisoners. "And so you rascally landelinians thought I was having a quarrel with Violet and her sisters, and deserting them. Well it was a quarrel, a kind that we planned among ourselves, to trap you rascally landelinians, and we succeed. Now kindly tell me if you think you are going to harm the little girls?"

"I'll have to admit that we Christians have the best of us." Said one of the landelinians. "We will get them yet though as Germania is bound to destroy them."

"You landelinians are not arrested as prisoners or war, or neither spies but as would be murderers of the Vivian girls." Said Evans with a sneer. "As for that Bull-dog Germania. Vivian he will never harm the little girls while I'm around." Boys. He said turning to the men.

"These rascals were going to assassinate Violet and her sisters." "Lynch them. Lynch them." Cried the purple coated nickellians. "Savagely! Crucify them. Crucify them."

"The law of the Angelinians is crucifixion, but we better lynch them as crucifying is a waste of time." Said the sergeant and away the rascals were brought, to be led before the tribunal for their sentence of death. The verdict after a trial of several hours was hanged hanging and then the next day any one could have seen the would be murderers hanging from the stoutest limbs of trees which this inscription fastened on each tree by the enraged Abbieannians who hanged them;

"These ten excellent landelinians were caught sneaking into the tent occupied by Violet and her sisters with the intention to murder them, and show us their interiors under orders of that skunk Germania. Vivian. Well this is what we do to all landelinians who attempt to murder children and especially the Vivian girls called Violet and her sisters."

They got hanged after the shors shortest trail ever made by our tribunal.

THE REVENGEFUL W. SQUADS.
IN THE COMPANY OF LEONIA BICKNELL.

Evans was infuriated over the attempts on violet and her sisters and later in the day Evans walking past general picknells headquarters nervously raked by the continual din in the distance which really was caused by a great battle raging at Francis Millar only thirty miles away east of them, came upon what appeared to be an Angelinian soldier but who wore the same black rakish slouched Glandelinian hat with an ostrich plume in the back. Evans was at once suspicious that this was another fool, follower of Germania. Vivian seeking to harm the Vivian Girls at Germania command. Evans demanded whether he was an enemy of the Vivian Girls, and the rascal mistaking Evans for another companion on the same errand answered: "Yes I'm an enemy of the Vivian girls. They are little contemptibles, Oil O illia monsters. I'm for direct action against them if anybody happens to ask yuh, and;-----"

"I'm for direct action mydemself." Yelled Evans furiously grabbing the rascal unexpectedly, and carrying him under his arm as if he was only a bundle of paper. "Beating you follows up, and chucking you into jail, taring a and feathering, and hanging don't seem to do you and an anticarthis Glandelinians very much good so us Anh Angelinians and Abbiennians will have to resort to very much greater cruelty. We'll try soap and water on you. We'll make you drink it."

Evans was as good as his word for he did force the rascal to drink soapy water and had him locked up and held for trial on the charge of entering the lines for the purpose of murdering the Vivian girls. Indeed the very next day while the same terrific din was continuing Evans had persuaded Violet and her sisters to sing for the men and using the Bicknellian Y.M.C.A. for the audience Evans had the little girls on the stage, and during the singing which was the most beautiful beautiful Evans had ever heard and all hymns at that, their voices sounding like that of celestial beings, a rascally fool sitting in the seat behind Evans was heard to shout out loud;

"BAN THOSE DIRTY CENTRIPEDS WILL NEVER SING AGAIN IF I CAN HELP HELP IT. GERMANIA VIVIAN WANT'S THEM KILLED. AND MY WHAT ROTTERY SIO SING SINGING. GIVE THEM THE HO K AND-----"

There was the crashing noise of someone's fist, a fall and sudden in all saw Evans standing upright with blazing eyes and doubled fist as he shouted;

"NOW IF THERE IS ANY ONE ELSE AROUND HERE, WHO WANTS TO STUDYASTROMY ALL HE HAS TO DO IS TO SHOOT OFF HIS MOUTH LIKE THIS NUT DID, WHILE THE VIVIAN GIRLS ARE RENDERING THE SOFTEST STRAINS OF THEIR HYMNS."

"GOOD BOY. HURRAH FOR EVANS. HURRAH FOR EVANS!"

Shouted the audience with a roar that drowned the singing of violet and her sisters, and the roaring sound outside. "He knows how to knock the insulting rascals to their senses. Hurrah for Evans."

After this if there were any more rascals in the Y.M.C.A. Violet and her sisters were able to proceed uninterrupted, as they did not dare interfere and arouse the wrath of this hot tempered guardian of the Vivian girls. However it was when violet alone sang a hymn, her sisters joining in the chorus, when a Glandelinian spy made a remark about violet and her sisters, which though Evans did not hear correctly verified his suspicions and he dragged the rascal close out of the Y.M.C.A. slamming him unmercifully as he passed by the main entrance toward the building, the rascal trying to say something but Evans shot back at him with:

"Not another word out of you or I'll give you another good slap over the nob. I'll turn you over to the f. guard as a spy."

Several soldiers ran up in seeing the commotion, and hurling the rascal in their midst, Evans walked back to the Y.M.C.A. saying to the soldiers;

"I don't care a rap what you do with the nutt. He annoys unprotected children when they are trying to sing."

"Lynch him." Was the cry as Evans entered and after that no more was seen of the brute.

After the performance Evans happened to be in a small town near the camp, with two of the little girls with him, the owner of the store a Glandelinian alien having charged forty five cents for a few oranges Evans wished to buy for Violet and her sisters. Evans felt appalled over this and said said said rather hotly;

"You buy oranges for fifty cents a basketful, and sell six oranges for one dollar. Don't you think that is an excessive profit these times of war?"

"Well for people who is against Angelinia I don't sell so high." Answered the store keeper rather sarcastically. "And I'm not in business for the sake of the old Vivian girls and gutter-snipe you know." Evans was after him like a flash intending to strike the insulting wretch over the head, with the handle of his umbrella, but the store keeper did not stay to meet the enraged Angelinian, but fled out of the store by jumping out of a window. Evans did not say a word but nevertheless he threw down everything in the store, brought scores of men, had everything of value taken away to the camp, and learning that all in the town were either alien enemies or disloyal Glandelinians, he raided the town capturing them all, carried off all valuable property, and then burned the town. And all this on account of the insulting remark about the Vivian girls made by the store keeper. That very same day Evans had learned from Violet and her sisters that another proprietor of a store, had been making terrible sacrilegious insults about them, and also selling or trying to sell them poisoned fruit, which violet and her sisters did not eat from suspicion of the small in the fruit, and so Evans went to pay the rascal back. The store man was a big lumbering oxen built regular born Glandelinian which Evans at once realized and also an agent of general Germania. Vivian and as he entered the store he retorted: "You are just the man I want to see. I heard you insulted the Vivian girls, and sold them poisoned fruit, to kill them. Is that so?"

"Yes that's so." Answered the rascal. "They are enemies of Glandelinia. And so Am I you skunk." Said Evans making a swing at the plants jaw, and knocking him to the floor, following this up by turning the counter over on top of him. "We'll since that time is it Germania intentions to get the ones I love so well, or is it the war that has scared you rascally Glandelinians in giving the Vivian Girls all the misery you can think of. Oov to perdition where you belong."

As a result this town was also raided, and burned a few hours later. Another incident which happened on the same day was when one of Evans supposed friends suddenly came up to him, and suddenly shaking hands with him said;

"Hello Evans me boy." "I'm going over to Oakville to defend a young fellow who was arrested for striking one of the Vivian girls early this morning. I've got just about five minutes to make the last train."

"You will never make that last train." Said Evans pointing his gun at him. "You are under arrest for attempting to defend an enemy of the Vivian girls."

And so this man soon met the same fate as the other persecutors of poor violet and her sisters. At dinner time Evans was sitting at the table in the officers quarters, with the little girls, a strange Glandelinian, captain sitting on his left. Violet being able to get around, better than her sisters now without the use of crutches was standing along side of the stranger requesting him kindly to remove his hat, which he was wearing at the table. "It's against the rules to wear a hat at the table in this place." She warned him. "So you had better remove it."

"Now I don't intend to remove me my hat for you, you Vivian simpleton." Said the rascal sullenly. Evans suddenly shelling amazed at his words. "The presence of you little Vivian thrash sitting at this private table is getting on my nerves."

A howl of rage came from the officers at these words suspecting at once that he was a foe of violet and her sisters, but it was not necessary for them to do anything, for Evans blazing with wrath, had knocked the wretch senseless to the floor with a telling blow on the forehead that made the Glandelinian see a million stars.

"Take the Glandelinian out of here. Another Glandelinian. Another Glandelinian agent of Germania's army I suppose. Evans ordered. Evans was now fully convinced that many of Germania's agents were skulking around in Bicknell's lines waiting for chance to assassinate the for them. Indeed the whole Angelinian world was mad like that. Commonly all the mad soldiers, who at times felt as helpless as the children themselves. The little girls told Evans something of the awful tale as they had heard from Ricknell's conversation with his officers, and of Ricknell's intention to hunt hastily march to Pandora to protect that city which he was already making preparations for, and Evans finally gathered two of the little girls into his arms folding them in an embrace like that of angels receiving a pure soul in heaven and led them away where they would be unable to hear such stories to break their hearts. All that day thousands of panic stricken people continued to pour into Viviananna lines and Ricknell's also, with their tales of harrowing, fiery, and horror. Their minds were stunned, the events were too enormous to be grasped. It seemed indeed to have the inevitable and fatalistic quality of the great Abbeonnanian Gas catastrophe on that fatal Easter Sunday it had happened that was all, it was not to be escaped, it was there before one in the world like an earthquake or a conflagration, of a typhoon, tornado all in which its effects so much resembled.

Those who came within Ricknell's lines told their harrowing stories calmly sitting in their offered shelters with blank impassive faces only in the eyes that had looked on those horrors, the terrors of it all was still reflected. One was struck by their lack of rancor they seemed to have suffered so deeply for that. Indeed all through that experienced them and afterward, the Abbeonnanian soldiers were struck by the lack of passion displayed by all the fugitives who had so terribly suffered.

The Angelinians seldom hearing any of them express hatred of the foe, or any desire for revenge. They never even spoke of them as enemies and were in by no means in such a fury of rage and desire for revenge as had been observed among the Ricknellians fourteen miles away from Viviananna lines.

None of them so far as could be observed even acted in the tragic manner there were no heroics, no histrionics, they did not demean themselves as did people in the Romanticistic novels. I myself have read any psychological explanation on this phenomenon by the late Professor William James, who observed these kind of situations of the human mind in fact and made interesting notes of it at the great San Francisco earthquake calamity. In moments of great danger, of great strain, and tragedy, people were simple and natural, they did not act in the theatrical scene of the word. It was true with a pretty little girl whose name was Francis Smith, who on that horrible day about six o'clock in the morning heard soldiers sudden y beat on the door of her home in St. Francis and when her father and mother ran to open it heard shots and had not seen her mothers parents or sisters and brothers since. She took her doll in her arms, and climbing the garden wall found refuge in the lane of a friend for a night and day while on all sides the houses were in flames, and finally carrying her doll she dodged from street to street holding up one arm and waving a white handkerchief. But she was finally turned out of another shelter by the foe, being driven from place to place half clad, with her doll taken. She had been forced every now and then to kneel to the ground and to raise her arms above her head while the Germans pressed the muzzles of their guns against her breasts, or kicked or her or struck her and then holding her as a prisoner in the barracks under cruel treatment until two days later, then allowed her to return home only to find her house burned to the ground, and everything she or her parents and dead brothers and sisters had in the world gone. And she was an orphan.

On the same day this poor little girl had seen many religious including priests, seized made to march in front of the troop, kicked and cuffed, and spat upon, struck with the butt of guns, their hands being tied behind them, with barbed wire, and at the railroad stations near the barracks they had had been forced to remain standing, not even allowed to lean against the wall, and this for hours with repeated insults and assaults, and personal outrages, while his townsmen gone by one were led out and shot. I might go on indefinitely, recounting experiences such as these in full they would fill many volumes bigger than three of these series books itself. The old home of Jack Evans mother and father had been sacked and burned his relations and friends had been murdered as he heard from reports, and their bodies thrown into a cistern long lines of his towns people confined in the railway stations had been taken out and shot or cut down, children included, hundreds of churches were destroyed, sacrilegious which would be a sacrilege to relate were omitted, and hundreds of thousands of religious volumes rare and ancient manuscripts, unique collections of books printed before the year 1400 had all been burned deliberately to the last scrap when the glandelinians under Germania set fire to the public library.

This caused a loss of invaluable manuscripts and so on to about $45,666,789. Indeed who could imagine the vast and appalling tragedy that was being enacted by those sinister figures in lurid gray, with torch and ax and gun and there "Amid" the rolling smoke and the infernal glare. Ricknell's had now arrived to Pandora and was concentrating his main forces to meet Germania should he come that way, while the Christian forces under Logan who had fought at St. Francis with frightful fury for three days one of the mightiest battles of the entire war at that location with a loss that was inconceivable was now in retreat falling back toward Vivian lines at the right but fighting stubbornly as they went contesting with the desperation of cornered demons every step of the way. Vivian was advancing fast and it looked as if another parallel of horror along the battle line would soon resume with redoubled fury. Indeed a greater struggle of the entire battle was brewing and the main Christian armies for as the enemy had entered St. Francis Viviananna striving to the aid of Vivian was concentrating overwhelming numbers against Germania and also Ricknell was now moving his forces against Germania rear.

All the fellows of Glandelinian collected by the town released from the prison prisons there being already hands of half savage vagrants following the army of assassins. On the next morning while the battle was raging with devastating fury with Germanians and then Christian forces and while Ricknell was pressing his two wings hard and threatening them with complete annihilation and amid the roar of the conflict that beat the battles again at Anna Maria with general Vivian and Hanson, the millions of Glandelinian wounded had been evacuated from St. Francis and as news spread that Ricknell was closing on the Glandelinian rear and concentrating heavily against the weakened center, there was a few desultory shots and then the massacre was recommenced.

Late that morning the sound of frightful apocalyptic cannonading and terrible crashes of terrible firing more usual than ever which shook down buildings in St. Francis was heard from the west. That morning a part of Vivian's army had made a furious assault the most terrific ever experienced by Germania there had been a sharp fight along the Calsonia, and the Abbeonnanian and the latter of it not driving the Glandelinians out of Calsonia as was at first reported and back along the road and across the fields to St. Francis, but really annihilating all the Glandelinian divisions that opposed them making frightful slaughter and capturing fourteen generals including general George Wotruba.

And at seven o'clock that morning Calsonia was in flames the retreating main force of the foe having fired the town. The Glandelinians retiring on St. Francis had reached Gouvanna's night was falling, when Glandelinian reinforcements leaving St. Francis met them, and there in the twilight the two main forces, the entire army of Germania and Ricknell's collided together in a hellish storm of carnage raging with the most frightful fury for four hours more. The explosions of shells tore the battle field like a million tornadoes would tear through all the cities in on a landscape, riderless horses by hundreds of thousands, and terror stricken Glandelinian soldiers streamed into the city clothing covered with gore or torn to rags but despite the victory of the Christians, all over the city the retreating soldiers began firing wildly at the facades of the closed houses, the people ran to the cellars in terror, the soldiers beat in the doors turned the people into the streets, and shot thousands of them down, cut children to pieces, tore out their intestines, and set fire to the remaining houses or blew them up. There was hundreds of thousands of galloping horses riderless galloping about a mad blind demonic rage seemed to have laid hold of Germanians men, and they went through the streets, killing, slaying, burning and looting, torturing and massacring for hours whole three terrible days while the battle was raging so furiously outside the city before the news reached Ricknell and even Vivian's armies knew the vast and awful tragedy was enacted with such scenes as small the imagination.

The Glandelinian soldiers were running everywhere firing right and left at random random, through the streets which were so strangely illuminated, for their own destruction and devastation. On the order of their chiefs the Glandelinians set fire to the houses any spraying salons with inflammable liquid using the apparatus they had for that purpose lighting and firing in their incendiary pasties, breaking in windows with the butts of their rifles that a draft might be provided for the flames.

The inmates of the houses thus doomed ran out only to be either thrown back in or shot down at their own doors, or took refuge in their cellars to be burned to death and buried beneath the ruins of their own homes. Men women and children trying to escape over roofs were fired at by the soldiers in the streets, women, their babies or young children in their arms being hugged the walls tried to reach some place of safety but were cut down or sprayed with liquid fire.

The church of St Francis was set on fire the flames of the city's holocaust lighting up the sky, the glare being seen in general Vienna lines at Anna Marain the midst of this frightful inferno, amid the roar and glare of the flames with the dynamite like crashing of thousands of rifles the cluck-cluck-cluck-cluck-cluck-cluck of machine guns making a noise like riveters and that most hideous of sounds dominating all the rest, the massacre and the incandescence went on it continued all through the night, the great tower of St Peters Church bursting into flames, the soldiers refusing to allow the people to enter the Catholic Church, to save it. The great bell fell with a crash and down came another day, but the horror went on thousands upon thousands of children deprived of all their clothing despite the cold of the April weather, and often even young girl and women were assembled in tragic groups, between the ictering walls of ruined houses and burning dwellings, marched through choking, suffocating streets that were strewn with the dead bodies of men and horses, the women and children weeping screaming and imploring, and the soldiers compelling them to walk with their hands up or make them kneel or crawl, striking or striking them with their fists or with the butt of their rifles herding them through the streets in the midst of the rocking ruins while other ghastly soldiers with wine and whiskey bottles under their arms went roving past, crying 'DEATH AND DESTRUCTION TO THE CHRISTIAN DOGS.'

Finally however after being marched all over town the women and children were massacred. One large party of naked children were bound hand and foot then tied up in a great human packet by a long rope so they could not move and left to freeze to death or perish when the flames reached them.

would lead some one off and a volley would be fired. Then the other prisoners would be told that he or she should be killed, and that alike fate awaited them. One little girl bound round and round by cords was struck by an officer several times, knocked down, made to stand up then knocked down again and then she was hung by the wrists to a lamp post and finally after all this torture, she was choked to death, and her body "fell open," the rascal having choked her so hard that even when dead her tongue was protruded protruding almost all its length and her eyes bulging almost out of her sockets. And so for another day and another night the madness went on, the murder, the looting, the sacking, the robbing, the burning and the lust, with soldiers pillaging the houses, heaving the wine in great baskets out of the cellars to be gurgled in the streets, while men, women and children, were shot down and their bodies left to lie in gutters or on the so smoking ruins or thrown into foul cesspools. And among the survivors began that awful exodus. On all roads leading from St Francis the surviving fugitives went, old men, women, and children, nuns, priests, the sick, even women just arisen from child birth fleeing like cattle for the christian lines now so near. Hundreds of thousands of them in serried bodies were forced to march to Tiflis. In a dozen miles from St Francis followed as they feared by secret enemy enemies. It was a tragic beginning, many fell by the roadside scores of hundreds went mad, many wandered for days in the fields and woods around only to be shot or cut down by ambushing glandelinians, and some drowned themselves in the streams while being in a fit of insanity. Even after the terrible battle was over the whole of which Violet and her sisters had witnessed and the frightful slaughter of the glandelinian columns and the nerve racking crash of firing, the little girls were indeed more appalled at the harrowing tales the refugees brought in as they were temporarily sheltered by the Abkhazians on the journey to Pandora now heavily guarded by Zimmerman and a portion of Bicknell's armies could be made. Little Francis Smith finding her home in ruins had no where to go. She remembered Dr. Joseph's hospital in the town of Kramer where, when a patient from a Peruvian in the leg and foot she had found many friends even among the worst of men and had trudged all the way to Kramer but to find this town leveled to the ground as if by an earthquake and unapproachable on account of the furious Mane Mandelians. Mandelians in possession there under general Phellina Tamerion. So unknownly she had made her way past the sentries unnoticed into Bicknell's lines untill stopped by a guard. The guard, who had worked on the first floor of the hospital when she was a patient there, and who had been almost in love with her, so great was his true friendship of course just now he failed to recognize her, but nevertheless knew that she was one of the unfortunate fugitives and said to her kindly;

"Where'd you come from, little fairy? You look strangely familiar to me."

"I'm from St Francis," She has answered. "The graycoated soldiers turned my home, and killed my father, mother, and brothers, and sisters, and all my other relations. My name is Francis Smith. I know who you are. You was my friend when I was sick and in need."

An ugly expression came over his face as she spoke to him and calling the co corporal of the guard he had her taken right before colonel Evans, getting relieved from guard duty for two hours to see him also.

EVANS IS TERRIBLY ANGRY.

'This little girl is a friend of mine and has been wronged probably worse than the civilian girls you love so dearly.' 'Said the guard.' 'For in the great St. Francis massacre she has lost her parents her brothers and sisters her home and all her relations. I demand justice for this brutal our outrage. She was a little dear to every one in the hospital while a patient there where I worked before joining you comrades and even at the risk of her life administered kind deeds deeds to wounded Glandollins prisoners there a week, well as others and is this the repay she receives?
It's up to you to justify it.'

Little Francis was crying bitterly indeed and the soldiers around took pity on her. Some of the old diabolists recognized her before officers by the name of James Bernard Dunn, Thomas Volan, and Joseph Haley all being lieutenant general. Haley had been a cartoon in the hospital before the war and had taken her to the training room many times. They also felt that her miseries should be qualified that Germanic army ought to be deato destroyed and all eyes were cast upon colonel Jack Evans who stood like statue embraced by this scene.

Evans eyed the enraptured sanny and then looked down at the unhappy child whose heart was almost bursting with grief though she was striving hard to keep back the tears. Violet and her sisters looked on passively at her poor little fiancée and Jennie placing her hand on her arm firmly but gently drew her close to her own aching heart and said kindly:

"Evans appears hard but don't fear. If they were really righteous men I would pray for them for Evans is a man of fury now."

usually refined himself and immediately returned with him, having told the great general everything. At first at his appearance, Fran cis had thought he was a racially landstainian for he had a landstainian general's uniform on which he had been trying on as a mockery. He was silent also like Evans, both looking at each other. Then Evans approached he angry sentry said calm and calmly and firmly with such fire in his eyes that little Francis herself was surprised.

"Before God, I have never known myself to break a promise or a vow in my life. And you know what my vow is don't you?-----Well I always do what I threaten and promise, and mark my words this serious matter is always between me and God as we could call it. If through my own fault, or if I get killed, and fail to get Germania, God will do it an and in a remarkable short time too. When Violet and her sisters suffered that terrible agony of the damned as to say, after being maimed by Germania mine explosion, that in my delirium like rage I declared that God could strike me dead as a liar if I ow on my account failed to justify their suffering. Instead of coming after me demanding justice like you do you Abbeauxians had better pray for that blood hound because I'm going to hurl him down into hell where he belongs."

And Evans walked wrathfully away.
"You had better have a doctor examine my bra br! brains if you catch me praying for that warlord of the infernal regions." Shouted back the sentry.
"I pray for him. I'm no fool."

"Stay with the vivian girls. They will love you and when I return from the battle field, if I ever survive the coming fight, I will adopt you, or you may always stay with them if you so choose."

And folding her in an loving embrace he kissed her and even the Vivian girls and then went back to resume his duties. And indeed God was so kind that her friend not only survived the coming battles but also the war, and though the little girl never saw him again for a whole year, she still remembered him but had such strong attachment to Violet and her sisters, and Evans that she longed to see them, and he permitted her to do so. Evans was all upset over the St. Francis affair and when Violet and her sisters came in a few minutes later with little Francis he arose politely and said:

"There more I hear of that gutter snout Germania Vivian the more I'm itching to put him where he belongs. Couldn't you little girls help me out in the attempt when the battle rages? Viviananna as I heard will probably be in general action to-morrow and will throw Germanias away upon our charging front to smash him against our Christian army."

"What is it that you want me to do?" asked Violet.

"Be at a close distance with me but out of range of the enemy's assaulting columns, and signal me when you see Germania. I'll have you protected by two brigades, as I know you little girls cannot do anything yet in case of trouble."

"We will do it," said Violet. "We will help you bring him to justice."

Poor Violet and her sisters had indeed realized that the terrible war had swept away their homes, caused the loss of their brothers and the ones declared and dearest friends also and had almost caused them to be disfigured and crippled and blinded for life. Though Evans never knew it at first, because they appeared so cheerful the hearts of these little girls were filled with rending sorrow, and though for a while they had not said anything, as they never did care to share their sorrows with others, they had however when in many places, when entirely alone, hid their faces in their pillows while in bed and sobbed violently, and Gertrude Angelina now with them again, noticed their sorrows and though for days she had said nothing, she finally realized what was wrong and said:

"Never mind my dear little friends. All of your prayers have gone to heaven to that beautiful world where Jesus is and I know that if you always pray, Jesus will help you. I have seen that you always try to do the best you can, to be always good, pray every day are pure and innocent and gentle like little doves read the bible when ever you can and will get to heaven some day and see them again."

Here Gertrude was interrupted by burst of noise and groans and lamentations which broke from the fugitives on the outside and died away as a rumbling roar broke out far to the left. Gertrude Angelina was struck with a sudden emotion. He the spiritual faces of Violet and her sisters, the long locks of black hair, and their frequent noise and piteous cries for Evans not to go to the battlefields even to get Germania struck at once upon her fil feelings and she looked long and earnestly at them and shook her head as they once more huffed and guffawed and hurried their faces in their arms and sobbed and wept with a violence which alarmed

Gertrude Angelina, and many times Violet and her sisters had lain like we weary doves in Jack Evans arms in turn a brotherly love to them indeed and he bending over them soothing them by every tender word he could think of singing them to sleep at times and promising them many times that he would take no part in the battles, only watch a chance to get Germania.

It had been awoken after the three days frightful battle at Francis Lillian or Anna Maria and the one at St. Francis in which appalling losses had been inflicted on the enemy who were slightly successful to the world as reported before the world had learned the condition of Violet and her sisters and the whole of Abbeinnia was saddened and aroused when the Abbeinnian governments learned how the Vivian girls had been crippled and reported to it in newspapers to the population of the nation and Angelina and Calverina themselves begged Abbeinnia to hurry and repay Glandelinian dearly and organize armies so great in size that the war will be speedily won and the armies in the south would then be unable to reinforce the Manleys and the other wicked Glandelinian nations.

Violet and her sisters had always been known as the Darlings of the nation, and greater than the scene indeed than from the scene of President Mc-Kinley's death was the results of the news. All the churches no matter what religion all over the world offered Masses and Services for the poor Vivian girls and lectures were announced by hundreds of thousands per Sunday all over to the angry excited people of Catholic Abbeinnia herself which caused still more to indignation in Angelina while Abbeinnia looked with angry smouldering visage on Glandelinia a nation dread by the very demons of hell itself.

In fact worse things had happened as Evans well knew. Only four of the little girls came night remaining and probably if it was not for his tender care the others would have died and Germania would have won four victims at least which would convince him that he scoundrel that he was that he could get the rest.

All had witnessed the harrowing scene where Violet and her sisters that a sad day had lain swathed in bandages and suffering frightful torture. The little girls when quieted had lain as dead as they had at times fainted away from the tortures of their wounds, and it had been three or four hours at a time before the little girls came too when it would have been better to have remained unconscious than suffer like they did. To the last poor broken hearted general Vivian and the others had seen the golden bands tossed in frightful agony and at times Evans had laughed derisively outside on the porch or veranda stamping around, furiously biting his wrists or even a pillow in his rage and even swearing that God could strike him dead if Germania and his whole army did not pay dearly for it all. General Vivian had stood by their beds whose sheets were almost all bloodstained had reddened to see scarlet looking vacantly down. He fancied he heard the voices saying:

"IN THE RESURRECTION AND THE LIFE, HE THAT RESEMBLES IN ME, THOUGH HE WERE DEAD, YET SHALL LIVE."

All the Vivian girls lay there in all the tortures he witnessed he could hardly realize that it was the dear little Vivian girls that were suffering so unjustly. Nor was it the Vivian girls but only the frail seeds of those bright and immortal souls which by the mercy of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, and the tender care of Evans had recovered rapidly, while a horrible foreboding peril was hovering dark and menacingly over Germania and his army, a doom that would appall Glandelinian forever more, and make the very demons quake with fear and lag for mercy.

Even from the terrible misery, brave as they were, the little girls had been calling and moaning in uncontrollable grief, while sad hymns were sung and prayers continually recited. Then with wrenches of roses and lilies in their hands little children rescued from Glandelinians had with their own innocent pure hands decorated the lit the beds of the suffering little girls while a long prayer had been recited or read by the priest for their recovery, or at least relief from their indescribable misery.

How beautiful and peaceful the little girls had looked when lying quiet decorated by the tender hands of their little child friends with the wreaths of flowers, those beautiful flowers which speak so silently to all hearts of the Resurrection of the body, and life everlasting for the righteous souls. Now the moaning and cries of pain and misery had resounded in the ears of Jack Evans as he had bent over the little sufferers. By their window stood an oak tree where beautiful birds used to build their nests and many sparrows and tropical birds used to sing. Now the tree was missing as the recent typhoon had cleaned it out the forest regions.

Even now long after that sorrowful event since the tragic battle of "BRIGAND" the Christian soldiers or the whole nation, and the whole world had not forgotten its way it seemed yesterday that it happened, though from the excitement it had seemed so in every street of every city in Abbeinnia, Calverina, and Angelina were posters posted, fences covered with them, with the wording of revenge and rapine of the Glandelinian soldiery. These posters were seen everywhere on many fences, and trees in the country and even within the Christian lines.

ON SHIRMS OF EXPERIENCES OF VIOLET AND HER SISTERS WITH EVANS BEFORE THE FRIGHTFUL BATTLE OF FRANCIS ATLANTA.

Evans had many times come across one of these posters, which had been placed on fences and store windows and when he had read the inscription on it he had only turned away with a blind look southward and fire in his eyes. This was what was on the posters:!!!!

"The sweetest and most innocent of little children, who had done all the kindness they could, had been made to suffer unjustly by German's wicked intentions. They had been almost killed, were threatened with deformities and disfigurement for life, and suffered indescribable agony. Each little girl is between the ages of seven and eight."

THE center of in the center of the poster; there were other words, and they were in red. Those words always aroused the eyes of those who read these posters and these were:

"FOR THE CAPTURE AND DESTRUCTION OF GERMANIA VIVIAN AND HIS ARMY!
A REWARD OF 11,000,000 DOLLARS WILL BE GIVEN TO THE GENERAL OF THE CHRISTIAN ARMY. THIS REWARD WILL ALSO BE GIVEN TO PRIVATES WHO ACCOMPLISH THE SAME TASK AS HE MUST BE PUNISHED FOR HIS VILE DEED, AND AS A TRAITOR."

SIGNED BY GENERAL HANSON VIVIAN.

Evans had always had laugh loved to hear the laughter and merry shouts of Violet and her sisters whose cadence always fell like music on Evans ears, like bells at evening pealing, and now they played no more were silent sad and weary. Evans after reading the notice laughed wickedly then pointing to heaven he renewed his vow with tenfold vehemence. Though always cheerful in his presence, Evans always knew that sorrow was really present, and on the day Grace Andrea started that battle would have sounded Germania's Knell of doom had not a blunder caused the Christian army to be crushed and routed instead.

Evans had caught Violet and her sisters weeping with little Francis looking on with pity forgetting her own sorrow and loss, Violet and her sisters weeping as if their hearts would break. Evans did not disturb them but with down cast head left the room, and musing "Picks" almost knelt him on his knees to hasten the newly coming battle with Germania. Jack Evans always had a full feeling at his own heart that drew him closer and closer to the sad little girl. He followed her now more closely, when ever they walked on their crutches, wistfully, and when he saw them sitting so pale and quiet on some prostrated tree, there was more to him in their fearful eyes than he had ever seen before and it made his heart ache. For several days after his return with little Francis,illian he had begged them to eat some thing but they had only shook their heads sadly.

"Oh Evans," said Violet so pitifully that he could hardly stand to hear it. "The whole world still seems empty as an egg, she shall to me and my sisters. First to lose our brothers, and then to be crippled like this. We can't hardly walk a block without the help of our crutches. We stood it all from the other Glandelinian generals but we can really hate our wayward brother Germania and do." And she said this bitterly indeed.

"I have to confess that it is just as hard for me to bear or probably harder," said Evans with tears in his own eyes. "Your condition and the condition of your sisters is overruling me because I never knew such a sad fate had awaited you and your sisters. And to have this happen before I could even know it in time. I saw that crater the mine made and how it looked. One of the men told me you were fortunate to be about three hundred fifty yards from the explosion, and that only the flying wreckage of the blasted house and the concussion maimed you."

What Evans said was true. The advancing Christian reinforcements during the battle of Brigano had not taken notice of the insidious approach of the disaster and were taken unawares as well as the Vivian Girls.

THE DISASTER CAUSED BY THE EXPLOSIONS OF THE MINES.

The crater Evans had seen would have covered three blocks in width, was two thousand three hundred feet more in length, and nearly three hundred feet deep. Even when these series of mines had been exploded the concussion was felt with destructive effects in the neighboring towns, and even in Brigano the concussive explosion producing an sudden expansion of air which blew out windows in the city, burst wooden houses into fragments in a seconds time, and all the neighboring towns were leveled to the ground, pinnioning all the poor people beneath the tons of wreckage and killing them all from the shock of the concussion itself. Many houses were also wrecked in Brigano, the walls of one house the eastern end remaining while the remainder of the rooms seemed to have been gouged out, and the wall reduced to three store stories and shattered into grotesque ruins. $3,000,000 damage was done in Brigano by the concussion, 500,000 lives were lost and one million million fifteen thousand were severely wounded, and Violet and her sisters had been picked up a hundred yards away from the crater five minutes after the miniature eruption but only one or two of the little girls, had suffered less than the others. All the soldiers are found killed and wounded by the mines were so frightfully mangled that they could not be recognized. What the cruelties of child slavery could not do, what the horrors of child massacres, and the persecutions of the other Glandelinian generals failed to accomplish, Germania did, and within a few seconds at that, not only wounding the Vivian girls so frightfully and slaying over 150,000 Christian soldiers with his mine explosions, but wiped out towns by twenty, and partially demolished Brigano with a total loss of life including the tragedy of the towns up to 1,345,666 old men women and children, and soldiers.

Indeed the sorrows and miseries of Violet and her sisters, could not be described. They still gazed upon the dismal ruins of the once beautiful city of St Francis with an aching heart, when the Christians entered it after their bloody and costly victory there, and a feeling possessed them as if they had lost everything they had. Evans himself wished in his heart that it had only been a dream, that it really never happened to them. As soon as possible Evans with the little girls left the dismal scenes of St Francis longing for another change of scene to change the currents of the thoughts of Violet and her sisters. He knew Viviananna was already saying upon Germania from St Francis, that Wierstien and Nero were concentrating upon Marcucian watching Germanian movements in that direction and also the movements of the three Manleys near his location.

Violat and her sisters always went with Evans with melancholy steps and Evans could see that they were almost heartbroken and always made it his duty to stay closer to them to try to console them, and bring their thoughts to another channel....He drew Violat and Jennie to him and placing an arm around each said compassionately:

"Now try to cheer up you little dears. All this crying and weeping won't bring your wretched health back. Don't give up, you poor little girls. I can be your brother to you. And Germania shall be punished and promised so often."

Violat laid her head against his chest and sobbed. Evans was indeed touched and held her and Jennie in a long loving embrace for hours. Never had he seen the little girls in such sorrow. Evans had seated himself with the little girls near a railroad crossing and tried to console them by singing them some cheery songs, and telling the most funny jokes and succeeded a little. From where they were they could observe the wreckage of whole freight trains and passenger coaches also which had been left on the sidings when the enemy so hastily abandoned St Francis at the avalanche like advance of the heroic Christian armies. Not far from here was a small creek clogged and choked with wreckage, dead animals and twigs of trees. Violat and her sisters indeed felt sad and lonely and the warmth of the closing April weather made them feel worse.

To them it at times seemed as if they were the only living things in existence entirely. They had as it was reported to them lost all their best friends and brothers and relations as they were seen since the frightful carnage at little Morinia Franciscana. Mostly all their best friends were reported gone, and some of all their own horses, and one wicked brother almost disfigured them for life. To them the whole world seemed dreary and the presence of Evans alone seemed to console them.

In the meantime reports came that Viviananna was unable to advance in any further as the retreating Alabandians under general Germania had barred the great dam down in the regio region, and that Viviananna found himself barred by a great flood whose torrents were in full way at this point. Even the wreckage of far distant Jennie Wren town (Calverinia) thrown down so long ago by the Morinia Francis army concussion was water logged, and floated in many directions in the main flood.

Viviananna did not know what to do now as he feared the enemy was escaping he felt like giving it up. He was also enraged and declared that Germania did not fight fairly, as that the many sins he had committed had made him a yellow livered coward.

"The region is a sight." He wrote in his report of the disaster. "Even Marcucian is impossible to be approached on account of the floods made by the enemy and Zimmerman's army is retiring before the irresistible advance of forest fires moving in his direction set by Phelidian Glandelinians....I fear that to capture

Germania and his army is in vain for no one could cross this flood or advance against these forests fires and survive it. Though I will not give up, as I fear I ought to do, I'll wait until the flood recedes. Wierstien and Nero are able to advance, but what can they alone do against Germania's mighty army. And a terrible storm of battle is brewing near Francis Atlanta and a suspicious gathering of mighty opposing armies are concentrating in that region.

Unknown to him Wierstien had moved in a direction that was caused Germania intended escape to be barred, and general nicknell hearing of it still had hopes, and learning that series of bloody conflicts were raging elsewhere wrote to Viviananna of the facts, begging him not to abandon the enterprise, that though the flood was impassable to be crossed, that Wierstien had come upon Germania's rear, and cut off his escape to the southward....Evans had been telling the little girls of the flood and of Viviananna's standstill and of the series of battles raging at did different quarters.

"But then what will become of your intended escape?" Asked one of his lieutenants reproachfully. "The Christian lines must be also reached by us before the flood reaches Marcus Marcucian. As you are the guardian of general Vivian's daughters, it is your duty to pray and ask God to help us soldiers. We could join in the prayers."

"I have prayed." Answered Evans. "But he seems not to hear. I almost could wish I had the supernatural power to banish the flood, myself or throw it upon the region of the enemy and flood them out or out off their escape by means of the flood, or drown them all. It's the only thing in the way for us and general Viviananna. 'Where will pick up' be able to rent the armies for tonight?" Asked captain Buford. "At least the little girls though having it easy enough by riding in the carriage seems to be well tired out, and are asleep in their seats."

IN THE ENTRAILS OF THE VOLCANO MT CALVERINE THE BLENDING OF NEAR SERPENTS RESERVES THEIR PRESENT.

"Hang the army." Said Evans. It is Violat and her sisters I'm thinking of just now. Accordia park tavern would be a good place just now. That is if that region isn't flooded."

"I fear it is." Said another of the lieutenants. "Even the entire vivinoid vicinity of Jennie Wren town itself is flooded. For the Vivian girls we will have to find another place for them to rest."

"But where?" Asked Evans. "Everything is in total ruins in this region. There isn't a place for the little girls to lay their heads, not leaving out the armies."

Evans and his officers searched for some shelter but nothing of that sort could be found for never wherever they went they met the raging floods. Not a shelter was in sight. There seemed nothing else to do but to literally lay on the ground. The lieutenants decided to find some high rocky point, and let the little girls take their rest there, but Evans wouldn't hear of it, saying that it would be dangerous.

So they continued wearily on, though no more of the army had already halted, but after traveling for about a mile in a mountainous region they came within sight of a large ravine with sulphur colored rocks where an aperture could be seen in one side.

"Maybe it's a cave." Said Captain Buford. "We may be able to shelter them in there for to night."

Evans had his doubts but nevertheless, having all seven soldiers carry the little girls who were sound asleep he led the way into the ravine and soon the opening was reached. It was all pitch darkness inside and Evans fearing that the cave was without a floor hesitated about entering. He found out soon however that it was some opening, which though it had a floor and a ceiling had also a downward descent.

"I wouldn't risk it." Advised one of the lieutenants. "We are at the base of the volcano called Mt Calverine and this may be one of her mouths, and the wide ravine a closed up fissure. It may lead to where we do not want to go."

"But where are we going to sleep?" Asked Evans. "We cannot sleep in the ravine as I already hear a storm of explosions and firing going on somewhere and a shell may burst here and hurl a pile of rocks down upon us."

"I'll explore it." Said Captain Buford. "And see how it is like. But to make it safe I'll tie this long rope around me, and you can fasten the other end to that big ledge over there."

Thus was done and Captain Buford went in carefully. He went as far as the rope would permit him with two lighted torches in his hands, and came back without having to be pulled up to their surprise.

"It is a long tunnel like cave, but it seems to have a foreboding appearance and I don't like it." He said.

"I wouldn't explore it again then." Said Evans. "Let me do it myself."

"But you cannot tell what will happen." Said one of the lieutenants. "It may lead to some cave of the Crimseians, or throw us into the fiery depths of the "volcanic entrails."

"Oh hooh. You lieutenants must be getting timid." Growled Evans. "I'm armed against the Grimecians, and I'm going to explore the full length of that passage come what may."

With this he dived in. Fighting a torch he proceeded downward, watching carefully every step he made. The further down he went the wider became the passage way gradually widening into a vast huge cavern the most extensive cavern he had ever seen. Evidently over his discovery he retraced his steps and returning half the distance, hallooed for the others who were attracted by his cries and were soon by his side.

"I've discovered a large cavern," he said. "I wonder if we could reach Gromer Andrea by one of its passageways. As I know this cave well being in it many times when a boy and through every part. We could send the troopson ahead. It is a cavern the shade of the Blengiglonenean serpents of all variation."

"I'm suspicious that there are Grimecians around here somewhere," muttered Buford to himself. "And also from the smell I'm sure that sulphur and steam is proceeding the cavern." Maybe it leads to the abyss of Mt. Calverine. Evans seemed to know what Buford was thinking for he said:

"It does lead to Mt. Calverine all right and to the caves of the well known longiglonenean serpents. If we can find them we can ask them to help us."

"Maybe they won't permit us to enter their habitation." Said one of the lieutenants a little doubtful. "That is if we are strangers to them."

"You are at least," said Evans. "So do not try to enter until permitted. Otherwise they will raise an infernal clamor over your invasion. They don't trust any strangers no matter what they wear since this war is raging, and your entrance may cause your deaths. So take warning before it is too late. I and the others had the same experience once, and had a hard time explaining who we were."

Confirmed by one of the civilian girls who was now awake Captain Buford believed it and so all the strange soldiers decided to make the place carefully. Evans led the way through the large passageway until the place suddenly became one vast chamber over a mile wide. Strange loud signal roaring noises could now be heard and they believed it was the vibration of eruptions in fissures under the floor when it came from longiglonenean serpents. Evans now in wishing to explore the entire cave now as much rest was needed, so looked for a good place and finding it that laid down. Each man was given turn of watching. The first watch Evans choose and to keep himself awake he paced up and down singing hymns quietly to himself. At once he heard a strange sound unlike all the others and listened. Pretty soon he saw some immense object with eyes glaring like powerful searchlights advancing slowly but gracefully, and stepping behind an immense rock he waited devoutly with drawn revolver. Whatever it was he did not know but nevertheless it was moving toward the sleepers, its eyes at this moment turned toward the rocks behind which Evans was hiding, and seized with a sense of impending peril, Evans blazed away with his revolver until it was empty, and then drew another and emptied it also. Loud as the revolver reports were none of the others had been awakened, but as the sound of the last shot died away, to the cave was filled with an ear piercing, shrieking roar that belled in many echoes like the crash of a volcanic eruption, and which shook the whole place like an earthquake. Everyone was awakened by the frightful din, which passed off in moaning like cadence, and every soldier grasped his gun.

"What has happened?" gasped Violet appalled at the horrible racket. Though now everything was as silent as death.

"Maybe it was a Grimecian Gassook," said Joyce. "The roar sounded like one in a terrible anger or something."

"No it couldn't be," said Evans. "But I shot at some creature that had eyes glaring like searchlights. Now such a creature came to be in the cavern I do not know. But it's gone now."

"May have found it's way in as we did," yawned captain Buford.

"Gosh but I'm sleepy." "It is your turn but if you don't feel like watching you can wake one of the soldiers," said Evans. "Or one of the lieutenants will do it."

"I guess I can watch all right," said Buford. "Need not wake them. It's all right."

At this moment Evans had strode toward a large opening he saw in the nearest mound of rocks in the cavern wall and lighting a torch he looked in. He was appalled at what he saw. At once he saw that further progress was barred in that direction, and a frightful yawning was yawning in their way, and even inside the main aperture they had been heading for scores of those flashlights like eyes were answering blazing with tenfold brilliancy. To his left he found many labyrinthian passages, which led up upwards or downwards. Being in peril from the strange creatures, the most strange Blengiglonenean ever known to exist he decided to effect his escape immediately and lead the others through one of the largest apertures leading upward. He was also attracted by a weird glow from the aperture.

"I've decided to take one of the labyrinthian passages as it is our only way," he said. "We are going to be pursued by a score of those strange creatures. We are also barred by an abyss in the center which was not there before, and right where the master monster I shot at came from."

"What makes that red glow from that aperture?" asked one of the lieutenants.

"It comes from the Abyss I believe," said Evans. "And it is getting brighter. These caverns are of Blengiglonenean origin I'm sure and that I shot at one of them thinking it was something else."

So Buford strode carefully to one of the apertures and looking in saw a yawning gulf from which a huge dragon-like form with blazing searchlight like eyes like orbs, was working itself upwards shrouded in beautiful wings and from which a peculiar ruddy glow proceeded and looking down into the depths he saw what appeared to be a ribbon of fire, but examining closer he saw that myriads of creatures with phosphorescent bodies were swimming about.

"I believe it would be wise to start right away," said Buford when he returned. "I fear we are none of the longiglonenean caverns filled with Grimecians as I recognized one of the creatures now. Your shooting at one of them has probably made them think we are enemies and they are probably coming for us. So we had better go while the going's good."

"That's what we will do," said Evans stroding to the large passage.

In he went followed by the others. Evans noticed that the further up they went the steeper and wider became the passage way, and from the noise they heard they knew the monsters were following them.

Soon it was so steep that at times they had to almost climb until at last they found themselves in another cavern whose floor had a don downward grade. Evans seemed to know this cavern for at times he seemed to be leading. After a while the floor of the cavern became level then it gradually became to have an upward grade. Evans fearing that something might happen stayed close to the little girls, who who were carried at each section where they were unable to walk in their crippled condition. It was after some hours of walking through passages, and caverns of different kinds, when they saw a large opening where lights came from. To this they sped and soon found themselves on the outside again. A fresh cool wind was blowing from the north northwest and it was raining a little. Nevertheless saw that his small party and even his army were still barred by the flood as all in front of them was ragging torrents of water debris and slime. Evans drew the little girls closer to him for fear they would go near the flood and he swept away to destruction. As they traveled along side the roaring flood and watched its wild torrents with awe, Evans drew Angelina and Jennie to his side and said:

"I believe indeed that you little girls are becoming like little sisters to me. How would it be if your papa allowed me to become a brother to you?"

"A brother to us?" said Jennie. "Why we thought he said yes long ago." And she placed her arm around him Evans drawing her and Angelina tighter to him. When he let them go again Angelina said with beaming eyes:

"Do you know Evans that our old home is near Marcucian by the Pandora railroad and they are the places where we can see the volcano of Mt. Calverine more closely?"

"Yes little Evangelina I knew they were somewhere there," said Evans. "As your husband, I mean your father told me so."

Angelina looked at him with surprise and amusement as she said:

"I would look fine for a husband. For my size he could eat me alive if he felt hungry enough. You certainly did speak funny things Evans."

At this moment Buford broke in saying that the flood seemed to be increasing, as it was silder than three days before and that they must leave the region right away. So they did and arrived at the town of Francis by nightfall. They with difficulty acquired a half ruined house in the town and here they prepared for the night sleep. VIOLET and her sisters said their night prayers before going to bed. It was late at night when Evans felt someone shake him vehemently and heard a cry of distress. Evans seeing that it was Violet sat up.

"What's the matter?" He asked.

"Oh Evans, the landelinians are swarming everywhere outside, and are making big fires among the ruins. Let's get away before they come here."

Is that so? "Cried Evans.

"Yes," said Violet. "The fires they are making are throwing a glow so bright that it looks like the world was on fire...."

Evans got out of bed and attracted by a strange restlessness in the room, went to the window telling Violet to bring her sisters. He was indeed startled by an ominous red glow in the sky the nearest houses seemed to be outlined in fire, the glow was so bright, and he could see thou a thousands of pyrecoats in the distance approaching their shelter. Violet had already left the room, going as quickly as her crutches would allow her and finding Buford who shook him until he awoke. "What's the matter?" He asked rising. "What's making the room so red?" like as if the town was burning burning!"

"Oh captain the landelinians are here and are setting fires. We had better get ready to leave as the landelinians may come up to us."

The captain got up and went to the window. He could not see any of the buildings that were burning but nevertheless the whole horizon sky was covered or shrouded by the lurid glow, an awe inspiring sight indeed. At this moment the little girls noticed that another great fire had sprung up in the west as they could see an extra red glow which increased every moment the conflagration threatening to place the fugitives between two fires. At the same time a noise like a cannonading broke loose.

"Hurry and get your clothes on," said Evans to the little girls. "I'm afraid I'll have to leave it in a jiffy as the landelinians are coming closer and may set the ruins nearest to us on fire at any moment."

The little girls hastened to obey and were with Evans sooner than he had expected but only half clothed as there was no time.

"I wonder where we are going?" said Evans. "It seems we are caught between floods, ruins, fire, and the enemy."

"I don't know I'm sure," said Buford. "I don't care either as long as we escape the danger. I'm not afraid of those incendiaries and will make it hot for them if they dare to pursue."

The landelinians had already set fire to the ruins within reach of them and they could see the flames clearing the little girls watching it with awe as one window after another of wreckage was being set on fire in the distance, and became a sea of fire. The different colored smoke rose in ominous rolling clouds of terrible density, the tongues of flames darting up through it at intervals with unearthly brightness, and then settle back in the same awful glare, the sight being as appalling, and there was crash after crash which was deafening as blocks of razed and gutted buildings completely caved in looking like myriads of fierce infernos joining into one. Still standing proudly amid the flames were many fantastic ruins, which reached by the gray yelling hordes soon flared up. The landelinians were soon setting whole sections on fire and Evans said as they were leaving cautiously that the scene resembled "HELL."

"I'm sure I'd sooner remain here and be caught by the landelinians or turn up in the fire, than commit any mortal sin of any kind, or even the smallest sin," said Violet in a whisper to herself though Evans heard her.

"I believe you Violet you dear little earthly celestial child," he said. "I'd think it better to fear sin, than to brave everlasting torture in hell."

A few hours traveling within close view of Picknell's army brought them to a half ruined church, where the army stopping once more in the distance they took their rest. Violet and her sisters still thinking of the cruel deaths of their brothers and of their own cruel suffering and unjust misery could not sleep and started to weep again bitterly.

Evans who had been outside and on guard was startled by the sound of Violet and her sisters crying, the voices of his dearest friends strangely near, though proceeding from the ruined church near the altar. He could never mistake the soft faint plaint of their woe, the little voices wailing so piteously as if in the deepest distress yet, and

Evans felt a lump rise in his throat, as he lighted a torch and peered in. Peering forward through the darkness toward the Sanctuary the voices of the weeping Vivian girls seemed nearer and more piteously plaintive at every step. Then as he finally neared the altar rail he saw near the unharmful statue of our Lady the fair little Vivian girls weeping piteously.

"My poor little angels," he said approaching them with deep pity. "Then he paused for from the children came the same fragrance that he had noticed many times before a beautiful fragrance of the most sweetest flowerflowers in heaven this odor filling the whole Sanctuary and he saw as he put out the torch, that through some means they suddenly seemed ethereally beautiful to behold and wore beautiful gauzy dresses whiter than whiteness could be dreamed of, which he never saw them have on when they entered the church, while also to his surprise a soft radiance as of moonlight surrounded them. He was seized with a great feeling of awe and said:

"Don't cry little angels!" And pulling little Jennie to him held her tightly in a fond embrace. "Don't cry dear little girls and tell me why you became so ethereally beautiful."

Violet and her sisters smiled into his face.

"Oh Evans we felt so bad over the loss of our brothers and best friends that we wept so," said Jennie as she nestled against his breast. "And Oh Evans please stay by us here and keep us company with us. Oh Od. For we feel terribly lonesome without him and you."

"Poor little dears," thought Evans as he hugged Jennie tighter. "A pitiful plight to be in indeed." The adding aloud: "I'd give anything you dear little celestial friends if it had only been a mistake, and your brothers had not died, and how did you find your way over the wreckage here in my darlings when so crippled?" He asked as Jan Jennie showed signs of happiness in his fond embrace.

"Our Blessed Queen by the blessed Virgin," said Evans. "Our virgin have helped us to wend our way through the tangled wreckage and debris." Answered Violet in tones of sweetest music.

"Dear little pretty innocents as you are," said Evans hugging Jennie closer. "Indeed what beautiful saint like trust in God and his Blessed Mother. You are I know always the poor little dears that have seen nothing else all your lives but a world of woe and many times I have told you that I mean to see that your sorrows shall end and they shall. I hardly even do now believe that your brothers are dead and that there was only a mistake. Well now my precious angelic children tell me how you come to have this fragrance about you?"

"I do not know," replied Jennie. "And Oh Evans you are my guardian. Could you not find out if they my brothers are still alive and if they are take us and our friend to a country where there are no cruel wars to tear it up." And little Jennie turned eyes of such appealing wit and wisdom upon him that he was overcome and he held her in a still tighter embrace and kissing her saying:

"I'd sooner allow the landelinians to cut my vitals out than see you or your sisters come to further harm like before. But go promise me you will stay with me and do not leave without my knowledge and that you will not cry any more."

"Oh indeed indeed Evans we were only crying because we felt sad and lonely and forlorn and then without us expecting it you came to comfort us, and now we are happy and will soon come to you outside when we finish our prayers...."

"God bless you, you dear little girls," said Evans softly, gently laying his hand on Violet's head and then kneeling beside the altar between them. "But I'll stay and pray with you."

He stayed as long as they remained and as the pretty crippled angels left the altar railing with him, that same sweet odor more fragrant and delicious than any earthly flower or any kind of incense filled the air about him and to his surprise he fancied he saw a luminous golden halo appear above the fair heads of each of the little girls. A feeling of strange awe came over him an overpowering sense of being among the celestial inhabitants of God's heavenly kingdom.

"Divinely beautiful," he thought as he helped them one by one over the wreckage. "Surely before God himself there is none other like them in this whole world."

Evans indeed was overawed at the appearance of Violet and her sisters as they reached their resting place, the look looks of holy innocent little girls transfigured, or the rapt serenity of seven little child saints who had held communion with the supernatural. Even a soldier with them were silent, at this sight, and they were now aware of a celestial fragrance permeating the air, the same ravishing perfume that had sweetened the Sanctuary of the ruined chr church. The odor lingered and sweetened all the atmosphere about them, an odor not of earth's fading flowers, but distilled from the roses and lilies of Paris Paradise. Evans remained with the little girls, the odor now proceeding from him also as it adhered to his uniform."

ANOTHER ATTEMPT TO DO HARM TO VIOLET AND HER SISTERS, AND HOW EVANS ESCAPES THE DANGERS OF DISGRACE.....

In the meantime a prowler crouching among the wreckage near Evans and the little girls surveyed Evans with lively glee. Then he stole off bringing two other men back with him. They looked, whisp whispering close to each others ears.

It's Germania's orders, and he said not to return until we are successful."

'AT ONCE.' 'I

'Yes and silence them for good, and all.'

'How can we do it?' Asked another.

'Easy.' 'Said the leader.'

"I don't see where it is east." Growled the third.
"Why?"

"Because if we make a rush now on their guardian over there may pop at us with his gun, and also there a large bunch of soldiers with him and the dog-gone christian army is so close. It's Hicknell's too the most dreaded of them all."

'Can't we trick him or something?'

"Yes if we get him away from the Indian girls, which we want, our chance is good. You know those little girls are wanted even by Manley, and he has offered a great reward for their capture dead or alive."

another. "Not for mine. If do the job we want the reward." Hissed the two of ugly men watched and planned. Evans presently got up for he had suddenly got startled by the reflection of a blaze against the dark walls of a ruined building some distance away.
The two of ugly men watched and waited.

"Go, please..." He gasped. "It must be another fire." "I'll see if it's a big one before arising any alarm."

He rushed away full of that thought and the distance however was so short that he hardly slackened up. Then bounding around a corner he suddenly came upon the cause of the blaze. The fire was of a pile of wood stacked up against an iron wagon hoop mixed with a great abundance of tar paper that smoked like a burning tar roof. Just as he discovered the decoy fire three stalwart men, each stronger than he, leaped at Evans, all being armed with long muskets, and Evans caught unprepared was helpless.

WILACK[®].

The first blow knocked off his hat.

The second crack at the hands of another assailant, landing on the side of his head sent him to the ground. Evans was so dazed by that glancing blow, that an instinct of self preservation made him close his eyes. A third blow knocked him out senses. Then two of them lifted Evans quickly and flew down one of the side roads to where a covered wagon stood followed by the leader. Then they lifted him into the wagon and placed the covering over him, the three men then getting into the wagon, one of them taking the front seat to drive, and drove some miles out into a into the recently torn battlefields. F After a two hours drive Evans came to himself again and tried to move. While one of them drove however the other two sat in under the cover so close to Evin Evans that he could not have sit stirred without arousing them. He could hear them muttering in a whisper to each other and he tried to catch what they were saying, but in vain. From the feeling of the road Evans felt or rather reckoned that they were on a pretty good country bit of highway and the loneliness of their route explained to him why the three glandliniens were not taking any greater precautions. After a little while the wagon made a sharp turn after which Evans knew that the driven was dring up a steep incline. Shortly after the wagon was stopped.

'Out with him.' Ordered the leaders.

Two of the men lifted Evans out of the wagon and carried him into a cornfield. "Dope him with whi skey." Ordered the leader in a whisper. who strangled Evans u until he becam became unconscious. "Then we wil' desert him get our soldiers, go for them kids and kill them."

One of the men drew a bottle of whiskey from his pocket and sprinkled the liquid well over the bare breast of the colonel's shirt, especially under the chin. He also forced a good quantity down his throat. Half unconsciously Evans spat it out, but it left itself on his breath. When he had used about three quarters of the liquor the plauditekn pressed the flask into one of his shirt pockets. Then they went off leaving him at to recover at leisure. They went back to their leader and wagon and drove off toward their lines and bringing a force made off toward where Violet and her sisters were. However to their chagrin they could not get the living girls as easy as they thought, as Ricknell having come to see them and Evans found him missing, and so I placed ten thousand men in the vicinity so protect them while others were sent out to find Evans.

It was early in the morning before Evans recovered. Then something in a daze he staggered to his feet and started off toward the ruined town. He was a little dreaming that the whiskey bottle was in his pocket. He arrived at the whiskey on his clothes and wondered to himself whether the civilian girls would suspect him of desertion and whiskey drinking.

By the time he passed through the town, hearing an heavy and furious firing and drew near the vicinity of the ruined church, Evans began to wobble a good deal, and began to feel sick from the one 1' of the whiskey. All of a sudden he was brought to an abrupt halt by a forcible hand that was laid upon his shoulder.

"Why Jack Evans what on earth does this mean?" Demanded an angry heartbroken voice.

It was general Bicknell who spoke. Besides general Bicknell, stood Hushbaum McWhirther looking in amazement at Evans who was straggling so as to need support. Evans was also conscious that violet and her sisters and several others besides little Francis were crowding around him, and all that looked highly curious.

around him, and all that looked highly curious: "I didn't know," Stammered Evans his head swimming worse before Bicknell's voice. It was the first time that he had ever been as angry with him. He had always been to him like a brother, a father even since he came with the Vivian girls. Put Bicknell hated anything like drunkards, and so thought poor Evans had deserted his post on guard duty, deserted the Vivian girls whom general Vivian entrusted to him to so faithfully or stolen away from them to get whiskey, and so though almost heartbroken charged him with deserting the camp and the Vivian girls placed under his charge to go on a drunk.

EVANS: "Bang nie knalls angry voice." "More than that you have abseah absented yourself out of our sight since later yesterday afternoon leaving the vivian girls exposed to the dangers of swarms of antuseading glandelinians who fought very gallantly all high night long against thousands of my man, in their efforts to capture the litt girls trusted to your charge. We thought you had gone inside the church but found that you was not there or anywhere around. WHERE HAVE YOU BEEN?
BREN: "BEN! WHAT HAVE YOU BEEN DOING ALL THIS TIME?"

"I got trapped your honor. The fire was around a wagon hoop. And that three men clubbed me and-----"

"That fire? Three men clubbed you? Oh poof. You've got to give a better account of yourself."

"He we will give an account of himself if you listen long enough."

Said Ruebaum wo-whirther rather irritably for the false sus picison on the h colonel in nicknell's tone, and the curiosity of the pressing crowd of soldiers angered him a good deal.

"And gracious goodness I smell liquor on you young man." Announced nicknell in a raucous voice as he bent forward and sniffed.

Wo Whirther started as though he had been stung, a horrified look appearing on the faces of Violet and her sisters, but in an instant later he murmured: "No, no I can't believe this and won't as long as general Vivian the great general had known him he had never sinned or drank. Then suddenly he gravely reached forward lifting the half empty flask from Evans' shirt pocket.

"This does not prove anything either general." Said Mc-Whirther "The boy always hated liq liq liq liq." "If these signs mean anything they may mean he has been drugged by someone--" "So." Cried nicknell interrupting sternly with tears in his eyes: "So ty this is the way you have been putting in your life time while guarding the Vivian girls. Evans! I'm going to report you to general Vivian right away and j--"

"See here sir!" Retorted Jack Evans stung pat the point of endurance. "If you will stop running over the field general Bicknell, and battling at every conclusion you can think of

----- if you will only stop I say-----and wait for about three minutes,----- to listen to Mc-Whirther and me, may be you will know more." Then growing more angry Evans blurted out: ";;;;;

"You are a big fool and a second-rate general Bicknell." "What this christian army needs is a general or a man for a general!"

"That's so." Cried several generals in the crowd soldiers who were admirers of Jack Evans and poor Violet and her sisters. "The lad is not bad. There is some explanation. He must be sick. General Bicknell is a fool."

"What's that, ?" Demanded the now frenzied general flushing but ignoring the crowd. "You was away out of our sight, when you was supposed to guard the Vivian girls, failed to answer, when called, and then because I gave you just now a just scolding, you yourself use the most abusive language. What ever you or your friends think, or say, you seem drenched with whiskey. I'm going to report you to the Angelinian government, have you expelled from my sight, and throw you out of the army altogether, and as to the Vivian girls I'll send them back and you never will see them again, when I report your case to general Vivian, and because you generals among the crowds took part against me, I'll have you expelled from your commands, and besides I'll give up the whole expedition or come what may. As for general Germania I care not what becomes of him. He can escape for all I care. I'm done with you Jack Evans."

With this Bicknell strode into the h church, ordering the soldiers out, reporting to the officers to order a withdrawal. Mc-Whirther tried to persuade him to be careful what he does, but he wouldn't listen to a word; having Evans placed under arrest, and marched under strong guard to his quarters. Evans felt very bitter indeed, and worse for him yet he was not allowed to go and bid the Vivian girls good bye, who were being taken off by soldiers to be sent away under Bicknell's instructions. The poor little girls were crying as if their hearts would break, and begged Bicknell not to send them away but he was unmoved.

"I believe Evans is really innocent in this matter." Said general Dargin coming up at this moment. "Because last night I was awakened by strange sounds and noticing that Evans was gone I got up and went outside.

I was startled to see the Gladelinians attacking the brigade - of four troops you placed around here to guard the Vivian girls, the firing on both sides being so hot that I aroused my nearest columns, and came to the rescue vanquishing the assailants after desperate fighting on both sides of which over six thousand fell on my side. I heard heard three men remark or say something about Evans but I could not make it out. The three men were here all day yesterday, and I saw 'em see me, and let loose a fireball of pie of photo, but I escaped. After the disappearance of Evans I came upon the decoy Bonfire, Evans explained about. On the ground I found two abandoned guns, badly scorched at their butts, as if used on someone, and the hat belonging to some Angelinian colonel. Here it is."

And he produced the hat. General Bicknell took the trophies, and went with Dargin to the point where the bonfire had been. A large iron hoop from some big wagon wheel lay there, and a round of was the evident of a fire. Near the hoop lay two guns, and one had slight bloodstains on the edge.

General Bicknell picked up the guns and examining them, called Mc-Whirther who came on the run.

"There seems to be a mistake after all." Said Bicknell, to him in a tone of repentance. "There are eight feet marks on the ground, two of which seem smaller than the others. Dargin found a hat here which I'm sure belongs to Evans, and also two guns. I fear they had lured him here late yesterday afternoon, by means of this decoy fire, set upon him and then doped him."

"Now you see that you were in the wrong." Said Ruebaum Mc-Whirther rather irritably. "Evans is innocent and you blamed him of a wicked act. The Gladelinians did it thinking, thinking that by luring him away, they would be able to seize the Vivian girls."

"I can see that plainly." Said Bicknell soberly; "Anyway we must at any cost get hold of those rascals and crucify them for it, and watch all the other Gladelinians to make for they will try it again, and probably succeed this time."

Just then general Bavaria Hentelson came up and said to Bicknell:

"I wish to say that I have three men, and evidence from them of a kind, which I feel certain contains something about colonel Jack Evans: the sprinkling with liquor and the thus thrusting of a flask into his shirt pocket was also a trick on their part to get him separated from the Vivian girls, so that in case they failed to get them, others would while they were without their strong guardian. The three men can be brought here to explain, and I'll bring bring them here if you wish your excellency wishes it." Pip Proposed the general. "They were captured during the battle among the ruins last night."

"It is not necessary." Decided general Bicknell. "We have found proofs too. Here are the guns. Two of the rascals may have banged him with it." ((

The guns were given to the generals, then Bicknell and Mc-Whirther returned to the church, sending orders that Violet and her sisters were to stay. Finding Evans he stepped into his tent and said:

"Jack Evans, my boy, I'm very sorry that I made the mistake of accusing you, of leaving the Vivian girls, while guarding them to a drink liquor. I offer my apologies before the same little girls, which I placed my chag charges against you. You know Evans that I hate anything so wicked in my presence, a doer of it when a personal friend of mine breaks my heart, and angers me terribly and before the presence of general Vivian's daughters, especially drunken fools and it's perfectly just to punish such that that person does it, with a disgraceful death. The same will have been your sentence when court-martialed."

But as the three men did it to you, just to get you in this undeserved trouble, and to get the victim girl, I only pronounce you innocent again. And again I apologize for your unnecessary shame in this matter for your undeserved suffering."

There were tears in General Nicknell's eyes as Evans took the proffered hand of the great Abbeinnian general.

Evans: "It was only a burst of temper that made me do it. The curiosity of the officers, soldiers and the reproachful wistful faces of poor Violet and her dear sisters, aroused me. I'm afraid I'm afraid that I have broken their hearts, because I'm sure they believed I really did what you suspected."

General Nicknell was only too glad to repeat his apology all over again. A day after Evans was back with his little charges, and as they with the Abbeinnian army proceeded on their way they soon reached the place where little Evangeline lay, and Catherine had seen the boy, and asked where Heaven and their mama was.

"Here's the place where I first met a boy, and looked him where heaven was," said Angeline. "I hope that poor boy is really in heaven."

"He was a good boy," said Jennie. "And also brave. I believe he is in heaven or in the army."

"What was the boy doing when you first observed him there?" asked Evans. "And don't you remember his looks and face features?"

"Reading a book," said Daisy, looking at him with surprise at the question. "Why do you ask?"

"I do not remember him, I suppose," said Evans, ignoring her question and smiling. "But I do. I even know him."

"Know him?" said Catherine with a laugh. "And pray who is he?"

"That was myself."

"You Evans?" exclaimed Evangeline almost overcome by surprise. "Surely you are joking."

"No indeed," said Evans. "It was me all right. I thought it very strange when you asked me whether I knew where Heaven was."

EVANS OWNS UP SIX BOSSY GIANDELINIAN. ALONE....

At this moment six gray-coated soldiers appeared, and drew back in surprise, when they saw Evans and the crippled little girls.

"Those crippled little girls are not your's, and we want you to give them up to us," snarled one of the graycoats who appeared to be an officer, while the rest fixed bayonets. "No Christian dog is allowed to protect the Vivian girls nowadays. It is the Gandelinian law. We are Germania's men, or secret service men, sent to get them."

Evans was taken completely by surprise at these words.

"I'll never give up the Vivian girls, while I got a drop of fighting blood left in me," answered Evans growing very angry.

"What's that you soldier strapping?" said the tallest Gandelinian. "You who are a prisoner must think yourself very merry to answer us like that. You have got to turn them over to us and you are under arrest."

"We under arrest?" laughed Evans. "Why you six will with all your weapons are not enough to place me under arrest. And who told you Gandelinians that I was afraid of you?"

"Can't be helped. It's even Germania law," said the wicked Gandelinian soldier. "And where did you think you were going with those pretty gutter-snipes, whom us Gandelinians tried to kidnap?"

"There's no one here that can insult the Vivian girls, and not he payed back for it you rascally bloodhounds," said Evans.

The Gandelinians became enraged and the talkative one advancing said:

"See here if you call us good Gandelinians rascally bloodhounds why I'll-----"

"Do nothing," interrupted Evans, drawing up his fist, and telling it fly at the corner of the man's jaw. He went down sprawling and no mistake about that with six teeth knocked out of his mouth. The others however rushed in on him brandishing their guns above their heads, intending to club him, but Evans hit quick and hard, the leader being on his feet once more like a flash. Evans was outnumbered heavily, but he managed to throw all his assailants down throwing in a his fury, and the men were knocked down one after another, and sent rolling like foot balls. Once more they went at him with creditable nerve and skill, but again they were flustered in the mud. At this moment a squad of Nicknellians arrived having seen the attack upon Evans, charging upon the assailants as they were about dealing with him, putting a stop to the fight and taking the Gandelinians as prisoners. Badly beaten as they were the Gandelinians took it in without a murmur one of them saying to Evans though he had been the fiercest of his assailants:

"You are a good d. scrapper Colonel Evans and I praise you for it though we are foes. And I hope you good luck in the future."

"What was the cause of the attack?" asked Lieutenant Growley.

"The Gandelinians thought they had me a prisoner," answered Evans. "They wanted me to turn my little girls over to them and I refused. Their leader then assaulted the Vivian girls and I hauled off."

"Ha, ha," laughed one of the sergeants. "Did you see it? The colonel was licking the six of them a fourth time. I believe if we had it come it could have subdued them to death."

"We'll do you ever!" muttered Evans as the prisoners were led away. "Coming along as losses of the whole Gandelinian army." Only the one who admired my courage and fighting men had to be against the leaders' intentions though he fought the fiercest in behalf and defense of his five comrades."

Two days later General Nicknell was compelled to advance large portions of his armies in scattered formations to keep them from being outflanked by the flood menaces, Germania all the while retreating southward toward Grosser Andrea. Engaging portions of Nicknell's army in severe conflicts of brief duration every day.

WERE VIOLET'S SISTERS REALLY CAUGHT IN THE ROARING T ORRENES, AND WAS THEIR WILD GRIEF STILL?

Night came black and stormy one of those spring Galverinian hurricanes, having broken loose with all its fury. The rain was falling in sheets torrents, the lightning flashed and the low thunder boomed and banged in a deafening roar. On account of the heavy torrent of rain falling all night steady, as if the flood gates of Heaven were opened, the floods had increased in volume and ran wild in its furious rushing torrents, and was even threatening the refuge of our friends, who could not sleep for the noise of the screaming glaze, which was lashing the floods into frenzied surges which roared like the breakers along the shore of the sea in a storm.

On account of the hurricane being such a screaming fury and growing in fury every minute, Evans led her on the watch and noticed that they were in danger of being surrounded by the roaring floods, and immediately raised the alarm just as an earthshaking thunder roll tore the skies in a deafening of salvos of echoes...

But now escaped seemed high impossible and to life her horror hallowed that where Violet's sisters had been sleeping there was a myriad of broken strewn trees and branches swimming in a rushing torrent of water and they were missing. He looked high and low for them scanning the far further distances of the raging floods, but could not find them...

"Horror! they must have been caught by the raging torrents and swept away to their deaths," he gasped.

At this moment amid the wild fury of the hurricane the spiritual like form of poor Violet now appeared, and Evans saw that she was weeping as if her heart would break crying like a child who never did anything else. She was crying so violently that Jack Evans, courageous as he was, was at first almost frightened.... Violet cried on so bitterly that the place seemed like a purgatory to Evans Evans.

"Oh Evans she!" She sobbed amid the wild shrieking of the glass which seemed to be at its height, when she succeeded in controlling herself. "My sisters have perished in the flood. The soldiers cannot find them."

"I've missed the little girls myself but I did not think you knew it yet." Said Evans his own heart almost broken by the grief of the little girl.

"Oh my dear poor sisters." She wailed piteously. "To think they perished in the flood, and left me alone in this cold cruel world. Oh what shall I do? Oh what shall I do?"

Jack Evans persuaded Violet to lie down, and though she seemed not to hear she soon cried herself to sleep, and not a human sound filled that grief-stricken spot after that, even the fury of the elements to subdue at such such a piteous and heartrending appeal. It was surely a cruel or occurrence for poor Violet. For all she suffered before and during the whole of the night for poor Violet. For all she suffered before and during the whole of the night for poor Violet.

And Angelina was, to even have this cruel affliction. It was dreadful. It seemed as if she had lost all her sisters, brothers, and nearly all of her dearest friends and a report just then came in to Nickolls that general Vivian was killed at Anna Martin which had not long ago.

And now she seemed almost alone to her. Next morning when she did awaken Violet lay still and quiet without speaking. When Evans did succeed in arousing her, she stood by his side with her eyes staring vacantly, and her face white as if she were dead. She did not seem to hear anything that any of the soldiers or Evans said to her, and then broke down sobbing for hours, while a search was made in vain. Evans tried to soothe Violet by every word he could think of but in vain.

"Oh why is it that I should be left all alone." She cried piteously. "It would have been better if I had died also in the flood."

Despite his own heartrending sorrow Evans and the soldiers had now escaped from death, by the flood and many times by great shell explosions and snipping by the enemy. Violet herself was caught in the flood though at first it was believed that she purposely dove in, and would have been swept away if it had not been for the net like activity of her friend Evans who even swam bravely after her crutches borne off by the current and bringing them to her. Evans after this was always by Violet's side who walked slowly with the help of her crutches.

When a halt was made the army camped once more, Evans drew her toward him and placing his arm around her said:

"Why be so sad?" "It may be true that your dear sisters and brothers have been reunited in death, but some day you will see them again. You cannot guard that God may even cause it to come out that your sisters, brothers and even all your friends may not have died or perished in the battles and flood. Keep on praying and God may grant you any request. Don't give up hope."

"I know that." Sobbed Violet. "If the flood did not get them then where could they have gone? They did not desert us or get separated. Oh Evans I absolutely know that they died in the cruel floods. I feel as if I was forsaken by all in heaven and on earth. I'm so lonely now."

Evans felt sorry for poor Violet. Even the loss of her sisters had filled him with utmost grief, though he did not show it.

"Never again." Thought he. "Would he hear their sweet voices, their sweet singing and their beautiful forms. Never again would he see as happy a time as he had then. To him it seemed as if he had lost everything, and what would general Vivian say when this news reached him? Violet herself would have believed that poor Evans did not care a bit, if she had not caught him hiding in one of the ruins and weeping himself in a heart broken manner and promising anything possible as a donation and sacrifice it and if he would only make it true that the little girls did not perish. Several times Evans and even Violet had felt like committing suicide, but the fear and knowledge of the result prevented them from doing it, and also that the thought of doing it would not bring them back. Her own grief added to his, as if they had been his own dearest sisters. That same day while Violet was mourning for her sisters so piteously a large portion of Nickolls' army got into a clash with the enemy, under Manley himself who suffered a heavy defeat and loss despite the ferocity and desperation of their fifteen attacks which they made.

Even where Violet and Evans saw the smoke of the battle of Evangeline. Staff Evangeline Stanley could be heard a battle that was reported. Evans more grief stricken than he showed, wished that he was in the battle and that he got killed. Getting nearer the location where cannons were thundering

In ear-splitting an, salvos, they saw thousands of dead being brought to a desecrated spot, a general among them who had been placed in a rudely made coffin. At another point the expedition like advance had met a tragic check, for in the terrible battle on the Stanley, where more frightful slaughter ensued on both sides with the few slightly successful general Nickolls' main aid, general Harrison Baldwin was mortally wounded, and his army cut to pieces and routed in disorder. Evans and the rest were ordered back from the region by the other generals who had said that the zone was exceedingly dangerous as it was John Manley's main army with the other two Manleys that barred their way, and that with so many conflicts raging there seemed no safety anywhere now. Evans and the others reaching a railroad line, had secured a load car being bound to get as near the scene of battle as possible but but reaching Sarcosse they found that the remainder of Nickolls' army had been halted there and that passage was only allowed as far as inside the to city. Three hours after they first heard the battle in which hundreds of thousands of poor soldiers had been killed, and many were buried in the deep mud or carried off by the flood, Evans entered the city with Violet, the windows of the houses looking from the commotion of the battles which were now raging fiercer and fiercer. Violet wept and sobbed for a whole hour without interruption and though his heart was heavy with grief Evans stayed by her but could not say anything as from his own grief he was unable to speak. Evans took poor Violet into his arms, holding her as if by his own heart that now drew him closer to her. He followed sobbing Violet wherever she walked listlessly, and sadly, and when he saw her sitting so pale and quiet, amid the distant roar and crash of battle, holding before her tear filled eyes one of her sisters' bones, though holding it upside down and seeing no letter or word of what was in it there was more sorrow in those still fixed fearful eyes than in all the moans and laments that she had met up. Even that morning when driving into the city, near which the Nickollsians had stopped, Evans had went into a restaurant, and ate a light meal, though it seemed to burn him at every mouthful so great was his grief. But though she did not weep or cry any more, Evans could see that Violet was still grief stricken, and refused to eat the breakfast he bought for her. He could not even get her to speak about her poor sisters, and finally said:

"You poor little dear if it was not wrong I would and your misery and cause you to see them again by putting a spoon into your meals and then go with you. But I can't do it and yet can't stand to see you in all this misery. It was Germania who made this flood. May this much blood of the murdered children be upon his so wicked soul."

"If it was not for the sin in doing it, I wouldn't care, and would do it myself." She sobbed. "But for the sake of your soul don't do it. God may touch us in time and bring us to them without your doing anything rash."

A few hours had passed away and Evans stood with poor Violet on a bridge which was alongside a railroad station in the town of Sarcosse-Allice which had as yet escaped the mighty disasters of the great war. Trains were coming and going, the inbound loaded with wounded Christian soldiers, and the outbound with reinforcements going to the scene of the distant battles. Some were coming in, being backups, and as Evans watched the trains, he thought of poor Violet at his side, who was so lonely now.

Though she did not weep much any more, Evans could see that her face was pale, and that she was so quiet. He himself felt very dreary, as the loss of the little girls was the greatest he had ever suffered. He himself felt sad and all forlorn, and had longed for another scene to change his thoughts, and so had begged Violet to accompany him to the bridge for his sake. So Evans and the others had left the miserable ruins of the towns and came to Sarcosse-Allice, and with poor Violet Evans walked the streets busily and strove to fill up the chasm in his own heart, with hurry and bustle and change of place, and inquiring about the news of the distant battles, and the people and soldiers who met him and the little Vivian girl with crutches knew nothing of their loss, for there they were smiling pleasantly, and talking about the battles raging in the distance, and reading the newspapers and speculating on the battles of the past, and who could see that all this smiling outside, was but a hollow shell, over two hearts, that were as dark and silent as two sepulchers. Wishing to cheer Violet up, and probably himself too, Evans had taken Violet to see the trains. For a long time both stood there silently, watching them pull out, and come in, and to many of the passersby they looked like two forlorn creatures indeed. Many looked with pity at poor Violet, and several shook their heads as they passed, pointing to her sorrowful face, and the crutches.

"Evans seems to be a singular man," said Violet to a friendly Llandelinian soldier she knew whom she met on the other side of the bridge. "I used to think that if there was anything in the world he did love beside myself, it was my dear little sisters, but though saddened over their loss for several days, he seems now to be forgetting them very easily. I cannot even get him to talk about them. If I really mention them to him he only rushes away."

"Still waters run deepest," said the kind Llandelinian soldier who had deserted Stanley at that time. "Why lately since they disappeared, or to their deaths, Evans seems to be getting as thin as a shadow. I've seen lately that he hardly eats anything. I know Violet dear, he won't forgo forget your dear sisters. Nobody would the dear little Blessed creary creatures." He added wiping his own eyes.

When she came back to Evans side, an officer of high rank, a general stepped up and said,

"You my lad, and your beautiful crippled sister, seem to be in deep distress. As I can see it in your faces, they are so pale. Is there any help that I can render to you?"

Violet sadly shook her head, and looked at him with such a piteous expression that he was deeply touched, and then she hid her face in her arms and burst out weeping.

Evans gave a harsh dry laugh.

"There is nothing that you can hardly do for us," he said rather irritably. "This poor little girl lost her brothers and sisters on account of that hog Germania vivian. It was his damn flood they perished in, and it is he who is guilty of the murder! And I won't do a thing when I lay my hands on him. Oh, No. I'll be like a snake coiled over its prey, who begs mercy in vain. They were my young nieces, as I'm no relative to them, but I feel the loss as if they were my sisters. Their father general Vivian is very good to me and though reported killed, it was confirmed yesterday that he is very much alive. But I dread the anger when he learns of his loss for I'm sure he will lay the blame on Or Germania and on me too if I fail to bring that son of a saten to his own terrible doom. And I'd sooner face the anger and rage of all the demons in hell than lose those I learned to love so well. They perished in a hurricane while we slept near the edge of the flood, not knowing it was so near to us."

"Poor child," said the soldier pityingly. "Too bad she has to lose so many at once. Haven't you two got any home?"

"They lived at 'Araucan dur before the war," said Evans. "I'm an escaped child slave, or was one way before the war began and became one of the rebel leaders during the child slave rebellion. We came here recently with the restlessness of grief over the deaths of her sisters. She hardly says a word now. Though she does not show it any more I know she still feels the loss of her little sisters as deeply as she can feel anything, and she has strong reasons to regret the loss of her sisters, whose winning ways and gentle intercessions had often been a paradise to many wounded suffering soldiers of both sides. She has been heart broken since her cry night and day and now she is free of sorrow less skillful and alert to the incidents of the day. She came near being run over by a speeding train yesterday, coming in loaded with ten thousand thousand wounded Christian soldiers."

"Maybe there is something I can do for you," said the soldier digging his hand into his pocket. "Here is twenty thirty dollar bill. I may help you to support your little charges."

"We don't need the three hundred and sixty dollars, as I have plenty of money myself," said Evans. Pushing the offered money gently away.

The general persisted almost forcing Evans to accept the money. Then shaking his head slowly the officer went his way. Violet still stood as silent as a statue on the bridge with her face hidden in her arms and sobbing vehemently, and Evans had to speak almost as soon as before he could get her to move. She came slowly away from the railing and the expression in her face made his heart ache. He placed his arm gently around her, and led her back to the camp reaching it in two hours. They did not eat very much Violet herself saying that she was not hungry.

Evans had meanwhile written to his brother general John Evans begging him to come and keep him and poor Violet company. Of the actual facts he had not the heart to write though he tried it several times. He had tried several times, and only succeeded in half choking himself, and invariably finished by tearing up the paper, wiping his eyes and rushing away somewhere to get quiet. When John Evans did come and heard the news from the soldiers themselves and of Violet being heartbroken he felt the same as his other brother.

Jack Evans did. Several days had passed and Violet was no happier than before. Evans feared that she was planning her young life away, and wondered what he could do to overcome her sorrow. Has there ever been children like the little girls in this very world of our own? Yes, there has been but those women were always seen on grave stones. Never again would he ever see their sweet sweet smiles their heaven's eyes and singular ways. Evans thought this to himself and the more he thought of it the more he longed to pay Germania a his just debts. That afternoon when Michael's army had halted at Corozane the orderly announced to Evans that there was a strange majestic looking man, who wished to see general Vivian, and had come into general Michael's lines inquiring for him.

"Show him in," said Evans in an early manner as possible. "I'll see him in a minute and tell him the whole truth. Did he give a card?"

"Did not have any," said the orderly.

"I'll go and see who he is then myself," said Evans. And he was as good as his word. He was indeed surprised when he saw who it was. "General Meltonia Seguniary," he gasped. "The one who rescued Violet and her sisters during the reign of terror in Germania. What brings you here?"

"I've come under general Hanson's orders to see the Vivian girls and give them a good 'lay party' when that war with comes," said the newcomer. "I have also a large roll of paper here on which is printed all the evil sufferings of the Vivian girls to be proclaimed in order to arouse the armies to greater efforts, and I would yearn again to see the beautiful Vivian girls."

"Nothing doing on that line," said Evans. "General Michael himself is not here. No one is here but I and Violet herself. It took nearly a week for us to get here."

"It took us more than two months to get here on account of the wreckage floods battle, and civil conflagrations," said Seguniary politely. "It was a terrible storm of battle at Evangelina Stanley and Joe Stanley. The whole of Valverinia which suffered so bad wished to make Llandelinia atone for the war she caused by helping to reform scattered Angelinian and Abbeonian armies. But the rules are that Germania for some reason should be the first of all to atone. Could to you tell me where his excellency general Michael is, and Violet's sisters?"

"Yes I could easily enough," answered Evans with emotion. "I'd have given all my fortune and life to have saved them little girls and their brothers from the ravages of this terrible war. They have gone to a better country where Jesus is."

So Seguniary said nothing but followed Evans into the library. "There," said Evans drawing out of his pocket two poisoned daggers and holding it with a trembling hand and a frightful scowl on his face. While his eyes glared wickedly. "I don't want to see or ever hear of Germania, Vivian again, and if anybody mentions his name to me I'll use one of these on him. Just as I feared it would be, murdered by one of those damned Llandelinian generals."

James Meltonia Seguniary turned as Evans was proudly walking out of the room and followed him softly and taking one of his hands drew him down into a chair and sat down beside him.

"My poor good friend," said Seguniary. "You are surely committing a sacrilegious sin if you permit all the sorrows done to the little girls, especially Violet to go unpinched. I know your heart is broke to think of those poor little dears with such dazzling beauty gone and gone forever and to never see them again on account of general Germania, and then forgive the brute as you threaten. I could not believe it. Any way what business had he been no cruel to Violet and her sisters when Bog himself had claimed it a sin to even forgive such brutes, and what will general Vivian say when he hears of the news and that you refuse to punish general Germania for his cruelty?"

Evans had remained silent when Seguin spoke but when he finished he arose impetuously and paced around the room passionately. Then turning abruptly he said with an ugly laugh that alarmed the general and made him think at first that Evans was sorrow had driven him mad.

"I FORGIVE GERMANIA! HA, HA! YES I'D FORGIVE."

him in a way that will make him wish he had never been born the second time. When a battle comes with him his army will never be relieved no quarter when surrounded and cut off from escape until I bring that fiend incarnate down with machine gun. I'll forgive him! I'll do something to him that will appall the whole world."

At this moment the rattling of wheels was heard, and then the door opened and in came general Margins who was admitted into the room where Evans and Seguin were seated, Evans with bowed heads. Seguin greeted him and then said:

"Poor Violet has lost all her brothers and sisters. She is the only one left of the little girls now. They perished in general Germania's Vivian's flood."

There was a passionate sole exclamation from the two generals:

"Maybe it's God's will that I should not see them in this world." Said Evans. As his tears fell fast. "And now I know why I found them so ethereally beautiful the other night in the old ruined church and such a sweet fragrance around them and the haloes. I believed that they may have been saintly children all the time, having died probably long before the war time, and came back in their spiritual forms to comfort poor Violet, and now were called back by God. I was in the presence of celestial children all the time and did not know it though she suspicious of it all the time. I don't dare to tell poor Violet this though, as the news might bring a shock that would kill her. She has had enough already and besides general Germania Vivian will know what is it to be in hell-fire when my vengeance is committed."

There was silence for sometime and all wept together over the plight of poor little Violet. At last Evans with simple Photos told the whole story declaring that Violet was all alone now. The next day after forced marches all day, they were before another halt to rest was made, hundreds of thousands of the soldiers were congregated too tight together near the region of the famous Mc-Golleston gun battle grounds to hear a speech from Jack Evans who was using a very large horn to make the sound of his words go far. Violet was attending by his side weeping as usual, an awed hush being over all present.

"My good fir friends," said Evans. "You all remember poor Violet's sisters who were called the darlings of the Angelinian nation. Well they have perished in the floods Germania made in his unsuccessful attempts to check our advance. For my part though I do not see any signs of it I am believing that over the loss of her sisters poor Violet is hovering between life and death from a broken heart. During the battle of Lorina Francanna it was reported that Violet's brothers had been killed and now her sisters are gone and only her father and uncle are left to her."

The whole nation and even the whole world who which probably by now knows of the whole occurrence is lending their greatest sympathy will be appalled at what will happen to Germania Vivian. The war now anyhow is all on our side for Manley was crushed at Anna-Maria. Anna-Maria and as reported is making all haste to escape the two armies pursuing him. I would have given anything to have seen the poor little girls back again and that they had not perished. But I'll repay Germania."

And here he gave a long narrative of the sufferings of the little girls throughout the war, and even before it, at the hands of the Angelinian generals and that it would have been better if general Vivian had sent them to Abbeinnian than allow them in the armies, as no place was safe in Calvernia and Angelinia just now.

"And I claim claim that Germania was mostly the cause of all of it. It was before God and over their heads that during the frightful times of the battle of Bridgton the Angelinian that I could do all in my power to get relief for the, them, save them from the horrible life long deformities and disfigurements that threatened them and to do what I could for Violet and her sisters, and for Violet, whose sisters died so quickly, also will do all I can to overcome all future child massacres, and to pay Germania back for what he did to the little girls. I so swore that when Germania's army gets into action with our armies and surrounded and driven to surrender, I won't give no quarter until Germania Vivian falls at my own hands, and if the Angelinians throw down their weapons and raise their hands in token of surrender no mercy shall be shown until I kill Germania. They are all child child butchers most of them and deserve it. All this I will do to repay for this child and her dear sisters."

As he finished there came shouts and yells of rage from the throng of Angelinians, mingled with shouts and yells, furious brandishing of arms and yells of:

"YES NO QUARTER SHALL BE SHOWN BOYS. DOWN WITH GERMANIA VIVIAN. THE PEOPLE DOG, KILL HIM. EXECUTE HIM. LUNCH HIM. DESTROY HIS ARMY DOWN WITH ALL THE CHILD KILLING BUTCHERS! HURRAH! HURRAH FOR ABBEINNIA!"

In the meantime before this speech Evans had with a sharp pang in his heart noticed that poor little Violet's hands had grown thinner from lack of food, her breath was shorter, and how when she walked with him she became so languid and tired. He felt that the sorrow over the deaths of her sisters was overcoming her altogether; and that she was starving herself from lack of hunger caused by her unjust misery. His heart felt a sudden throb for he dreaded that she was also going to die, or at least go insane from her grief. A few more days had passed, when Violet still refusing to eat was prostrated almost into a complete coma again, and the doctors verdict was that only the return of her sisters would save her. They were now at the edge of the flood. Evans being with Violet constantly being afraid to leave her alone a moment and having succeeded in getting her to eat a little or forcing her to restore her strength. Evans did all he could to comfort the heartbroken child whose face was pitiful to see, the poor little girl being back on a wheelchair. Never before had Evans seen greater sorrow especially for so beautiful a child, and I believe few would have stood all she and her sisters did without losing faith in God and revenging on their enemies. What caused Violet's prostration, was that rumors had been spread that Evans Germania had said:

"That the little child of a Violet Vivian deserves all the misery she suffered and was only sorry that he did not kill her sisters, with his own hands and sent back their remains. This only increased Evans desire to get him and put him where he belongs for good and all. The next day the whole Christian armies were in full forced march, which continued even all night long, the soldiers tramping through mud and mire knee deep, and soon again the roaring flood barred the way of Evans. But he went that day and night under the shelter of a rudely made hut then the next morning made an inspection of the flood which roared incessantly. The rushing to torrents roared like the sea in a tempest and probably sped at a rate of fifty miles an hour."

Evans at once realized the impossibility of battling the flood in this a region successfully, as not even the strongest raft could float without being dashed to pieces. They could hardly be seen. The roar of the flood was so deafening. Evans however was not daunted. He and the others followed the course of the raging flood hoping to find a calmer spot. But the more further they went the wilder became the torrents and soon they were blocked in this direction also as the flood was really progressing southward. The little group then decided to try the west. Rickard a very young man being less than fifty miles from the regions of Gromer Andrea. However Evans and his little group met failure either way as the flood progressing southward was all the wider toward the western direction a regular sea like expanse.

It was just as he feared. Marucian and even Angelina was utterly unapproachable. Evans and Violet almost despaired. They even began to think that the swamps had swamped Marucian and that Germania would get away after all. They believing that Marucian was not flooded, had wished to get there ahead of the rising flood storm. But they were disappointed for their way seemed barred even to Marucian. At one point where the flood was widest a long railroad bridge probably crossing a wide valley spanned across having been also mysteriously spared despite the near approach of the foe.

Trains had crossed it so even after the great Alorinia Francis was unknown but now known to all this whole railroad line nearest the bridge and the bridge itself being harassed by the flood was all in a fearful shape. All the underpinning piles and spiles were unsafe on the long bridge and Evans was the first to notice it, as he had intended to travel on it and defy the raging torrents.

THE FRIGHTFUL CATASTROPHE. AND THE RETURN OF VIOLET'S SISTERS.

He attracted the attention to the others. Many days already the bridge though weakened by the fury of the flood, had withstood the weight of freight and passenger trains, but now as Evans noticed, it would not stand under the weight of another single coach, as a good portion was threatening to give way before the raging torrent of the flood. Even then the smoke of a coming train was visible down the line.

"It's even worse than I dreamed," said Evans. "Why man leave look at that shaky bridge. There is keen danger for every bridge that crosses. No shouted one of the officers. Uncontrollably. "My God man don't talk like that. There may be crowds of refugee children on that train yonder."

Another of the officers uttered a sharp cry. Whirling the three colonels paired at the oncoming train which was completely loaded with children, and then it happened so naturally so smoothly that it was like a thing rehearsed and prepared for and planned for. The train rushed by them at a tearing speed fanning the blanched cheeks of the Christian soldiers and officers, with the wind of its passage. Violet screamed and hid her face from the awful sight.

The engine with its long string of passenger coaches about eleven pullmans rushed out upon the heights of the sagging bridge. At this moment with a volume of snapping and crashing that became fearful the superstructure of the bridge parted in the middle before the rain reached even the edge of the structure as though it was severed with a giant sword the other part still holding as yet, then with a frightful roar the entire half sank to the roaring torrent below.

The train advanced swiftly toward the roaring chasm. It was a moment of starring eyes, from speechless Christian officers a flying leap of the immense engine into space, and the deafening crash of falling timbers, a score of the rear coaches crashing through the floor of the bridge. For seconds it seemed the express poised in space then the entire remaining half of the bridge gave way, with an ear splitting roar, and the whole train plunged to the raging waters below amid the clouds of the shrieking steam from the drowned boiler that rose like a pall to the watchers. The roofs of the cars were just visible and from beneath them arose the heart rending death calls of the entombed ones. Evans and the rest rushed for the wadunet of the bridge still remaining, scrambled up, and ran down the quivering ties of the remaining remaining portions of the bridge as one runs in a dream. To them it seemed as if they were getting no nearer.

Yet the urge of their desire to do rescue, compelled them on. Below in the raging waters the engine coughed in death agonies, while the twisted tops of the cars protruded like ghostly tombstones. The water was a maelstrom of wreckage, and struggling children and guardians. Scores of children were climbing dazedly out of broken windows with curious listlessness, as though they did not care particularly to escape. Below them as the Christian officers gazed with horrid fascination floated many mangled bodies of poor little children being swirled hither and thither at the mercy of the furious torrents.

Forgetting their own danger Evans and some of the officers prepared to leap in. With a cry that rang a out above the dead and dying, the silent dead and moaning dying, three of the others also flung off their coats and disregarding the peril leaped into the raging flood. But with their arms once fastened upon the frail burdens they saw with the courage of strong men, indomitable in the face of death.

"Put your hands on my shoulders dear," panted Evans to a little girl he had rescued, his face lowering the make of his arm.

The little girl obeyed. Suddenly a shooting flood roller lifted them high above the level surface of the roaring torrent.

"Evans look out," cried one of the officers. Who after struggling desperately had gained dry land with the one he had rescued. "You are on the dragons teeth. The bottom of the flood where you are swimming, is soon with terrible rocks."

"I'm enjoying it," called Evans in exultant reply as he came where the water raged and foamed like dangerous whirlpools. Turning over he went down the furious breakers only back like a Hawaiian on a surf board. It was wonder full to behold him, and then his right shoulder met the submerged pinnacle. He whirled about and spun top like in the raging torrents of water, then dizzy with the excruciating pain, he struck out desperately still clinging to the child, even as another lunging blow from a sturgeon needle sent him spinning and almost out of the myrraw water.

However despite the blows his frame was too strong to receive any serious injury and Evans almost exhausted reached the dry land and was helped out by two of the soldiers who had regained the firm ground with those they rescued. Most of those who were able to escape were clinging to the tops of the cars and calling to Evans and the others for aid. But alas Evans or the others could not reach them as the floods in that locality could not be battled with any success at all. Those rescued however were taken out of reach of the flood, while Evans planned how to rescue the others.

"I have an idea," he said. "We have rope enough with us. Why not make a ladder and drag them over?"

One of his friends wondered if the ropes were strong enough and decided to test them. He found that rescue this way could be made with evidently good success and so decided to make three ladders out of each end. When they were long enough Evans cast the first line. Three seats were made but without success. The fourth cast was successful, Evans dragging over a little boy. For an hour and a half this was kept up until all still alive or not killed were by the wreck were rescued. And what astonished them and surprised them and filled them with sudden joy was that poor Violet's sisters were among the rescued. Most of these were taken to small eastern village by the Angelinians, and oh how happy Violet was over the reappearance of her dear sisters. Joice was the one who explained while they took up quarters in that town.

That stormy night, the waters arose so high that we were really caught in it but the current did not carry us very far. "She said. "There were large parties of Angelinian guards all along the shore of the flood and seeing us in the water they went for us in a jiffy. After being rescued we looked in vain for you and Violet, and finally found you by means of the train wreck. We were on that train going to Maroucian thinking you were there. In the first stop of the train we had bought some religious articles as presents for you and here they are safe and sound beside out second good ducking."

Evans could not help showing his awe and feeling as they presented the articles to him with trembling hands. The presents were holy pictures on little cards, but of great value, a $10 Rosary already blessed, sacred medals and other articles of different description. After thanking them heartily he hastily stored the articles away, but unknown to him he was watched by a crafty looking man who carried a frying pan of small size in his pocket. Late at night, Evans was awakened by someone moving about in his room and at first believing that it was one of the Vivian girls he paid no attention but at last he heard a voice say:

"I've got them. Now the thing is to destroy them and put them under his bed. The Vivian girls will see them, think he does it and be broken hearted and as angry with him. That may cause separation and when they leave him, while I'll have my chance to get the little Gutteranips and---"

"Is that so?" thought Evans springing out of bed with drawn revolver. "Another of Germanias secret service men after the Vivian girls I suppose. "Here you fellow drop those things or I'll drop you, you damned fool."

The invader gave a cry of alarm and rage and flinging the things down made a dash for the door but Evans thrust out his left leg and the rascal sprawled head over heels to the floor. Quiet as a flash Evans was on top of him. The man happened to be slim and was weak in strength, and made no resistance as Evans dragged him to his feet and as he turned on the light Evans saw that his prisoner was the most cowardly man he had ever set his eyes on. He was hanging his head and even did not lift up his eyes or head when Evans spoke to him.

"What in the world are you doing in here?" he demanded then all of a sudden noticed the little articles lying on the floor and realized the truth. A bitter feeling of rage and humiliation and shame seized him. He felt that his beautiful charges had been insulted and with a cry of half-screams and hatred he made his captive to the floor, then roughly dragging him to his feet, and throwing him into a chair Evans laughed good and loud. "Ha, ha. Well if you ain't the most cowardly rat I've ever seen. He started out. "Coming in here to tear up some little pretty little friends of mine. I have discovered the dastardly trick. Why I don't know what prevents me from tearing you to pieces. I feel like doing it. Got up from the chair and pick up those things, and place them on the table next to the bed." The man hesitated and did not move.

"PICK UP THOSE THINGS." The voice of Evans sounded like thunder hallowing through the room, and the rascal sorely afraid obeyed picking up one after another, and laying them nicely on the table.

"Now," said Evans going to the telephone in the room and covering his captive with his gun. "I'm going to call up all the soldiers nearest here, especially the military police, and have you punished for the insult to the Catholic church and to my little charges. And don't make a single move because even now I'm having a hard battle in trying to restrain myself from shooting you like a dog. No man has invaded my room and gotten away yet."

Despite the pleas of the culprit he called up the military police who soon arrived, laid hold of the man and marched him away.

CONCLUSION OF THE EXPERIENCES OF VIOLET AND HER SISTERS BEFORE THE BATTLE OF FRANCIS-ATLANTA.

LOST AMID THE INFERNO. NO THE SAVAGE FURY OF THE BLENGIOLOMNEAN GAZOOKS.....

After Evans and Violet and her sisters had received a call by general Vivian they had left Ricknell's lines and how he and the little girls escaped the ravaging fury of the frightful battles still raging with Ricknell's armies, they just left, and the forests, fires, and floods also Evans himself could never tell to save his life.

The scenes witnessed had been almost beyond endurance not only for the dear little girls who had just been through a trifling incident separated from their sister Violet, and caused her such sorrow, but for Evans himself. In spite of all they could do now, they could hear the thunder of what seemed another sanguinary battle, and indeed the whole world seemed in a terrible turmoil before them. Far away to the left and right, and behind them hills seemed to be volleying and thundering in mimic eruption, everything everything far to their front seemed to be a storm of fire and smoke and a perpetual crash and uproar almost sickened them. Yet Violet and her sisters saw the Anna-Maria affair felt sure from the looks of things, that general Johnston Jackson Manley had failed again in his second terriblest battle and had suffered disaster.

For a long time possibly hours, the little girls watched the harrowing scenes before them, and then night coming on Evans said: "Let's go before the fires spread all around us. The battle has wiped out the whole of Calverinia, but I'm sure Ricknell whom we have left is winning."

Violet and her sisters now able to get about without crutches obeyed willingly but ever and anon glanced behind them, at the terrible scenes they were just leaving. They could not tell indeed which was the worse scenes. The distant battles or the forest fires. The atmosphere itself was more sultry than ever experienced before during a hot Calverinian summer though it was only the 22th of April and no doubt it was produced by the forest fires burning so furiously. Violet and her sisters not liking to risk being caught in the forest fires again, did not stop once in their flight and Evans leading the way watched out for no skulking Landolinians would suddenly surprise them. How far general Vivian's lines was he or Violet and her sisters could not make out.

"Is not those scenes terrible?" asked Violet staring cautiously about, "Great fires, terrible battles, and slaughters, enough to produce earthquakes and great disasters. Put now I guess the day will soon be over. Don't you Evans?"

"I don't think but hope so," answered Evans. "We don't know as yet the outcome of the terrible battle for Manley and his armies sorely beaten as they are may make a man escape stand at Hamlet's." "That is my evil foreboding too," said Violet. "This war is terrible and has lasted already nearly four years or about three years and four months. How much longer will it continue I wonder." "No one can tell," said Evans. "Manley has to beat many strong armies in Angelinia, and Calverinia, and the war will probably last ten years or more."

They had now reached more shelter regions again, and soon after many days on a train reached a large Christian camp and finding it went off to the "Vivian's".....

It is now positively seen, after their many attempts that there was an impossibility of ever capturing Violet and her sisters alive as long as Evans was with them. As already stated, since upon series of attempts had been made without success. Once the little girls had been captured and though unsuccessful in attempting to escape twice they finally succeeded a third time. The little girls themselves told the story which is as follows, having some humor in the experience:|||||||

"The Landolinians who had made prisoners of us at Phelanburg Run had ordered us to roll up six rugs, so that the soldiers could take them out, the Landolinians having been ransacking this house. Looking closely at the rugs we believed that we immediately saw our chance to get away by rolling up by the rugs in a way to leave a good sized hollow in the roll, in which each of us could hide. This we did, but the rugs being heavy ones, was increased immensely by the weight of I and my sisters, so that the Landolinians who were to take the rugs out, had all they could do to carry them, with us in, and unfortunately for us, the man carrying the rug I was now concealed in, slipped at the head of the stairway and he fell, the rug suddenly unrolled precipitating me down the stairs so violently that though fortunately I was not hurt, nevertheless the precipitation of my quick flight down the stairs backwards, and every form of rolling, made me see as it seemed a thrill of stars, and planets of all colors. I literally went down most of the way head first, and the Landolinians carrying the other heavier rugs suspected the cause of their great weight, when they saw me go down those steps in such a hurry. And my sisters were at once seized the officer in the lower room, hearing the commotion caused by my fall rushed out, and seeing me rubbing my head where I was knocked in my fall said gruffly:

"Trying to escape eh? You little brat. Well you just come down right down to the first floor where we can watch you."

I felt very much aggrieved by my bad fall, and the pain in my head the dizziness and the aching all over tending to increase my agony and his insulting words driving me to anger I retorted:

"Say colonel Frank Francis, do you think anyone could come down any faster than I did?"

I and my sisters were brought down into the officers' quarters and one of the soldiers told of our attempt to escape, and how one of us had been accidentally dumped down the steps by private Henry Darger, who was carrying the rug concealing me. The officers laughed saying that us little girls would risk anything to get away.

"I guess you would," said Evans gravely. "As they were drawing nearer the Christian lines. Your daring escapes, and attempts to escape have made my hair raise on end at times. What you little girls dare to do would make me shiver with fright."

"Well I guess so," said Violet who was telling the story. We were then left alone for to escape openly out of that house with so many sentries around was suicide, and so the girls did not fear of our escaping.

In the dance hall of the mansion in which the Landolinians had taken possession of, the chief officers had given a grand ball which was in progress.

"Did you attend?" Asked Evans.
 "For a time we joined to ally ourselves of our intentions. Then going into a room outside of the dance hall, we saw extending there an immense fiddle box on wheels large enough to conceal a man and still be room enough for the fiddle.... At first seeing the fiddle came and its size we were amazed, but Violet poking me vehemently in the side vehemently said in a whisper:-----

"That Glandelinian musician must have brought his fiddle in a big dog-pound. Anyway sisters." "She suddenly added looking at me advisingly. "The musician must not be a dog. Let's hide in here and go with them till we are away from this house and the guards. This may give us an opportunity to escape."

"We did bring the large fiddle in with us, closing the door of the case after us. It became very close in there with us seven so closely packed to gether but we did not have long to wait as the box to our surprise and alarm was being wheeled into the dance hall we of course not knowing that it was the musician who was going to play that big fiddle. At once to our dismay the door of the case was pulled open, and Evans you could not imagine the consternation of the whole throng, when they saw us pulled roughly out and beaten unmercifully by the officers. But this second failure did not daunt us. We were immediately put into a rat infested cell, but instead of being afraid of the rats or mice, we managed to capture ten of the biggest rats, and over a four foot side, and placed them into a large box found in the cell.

The next morning we managed to work our way out of the cell taking the box with us, and turned them loose among the Glandelinians sitting around the big tables eating their breakfast, and causing such confusion that it even drew inside the guards, and in the panic we succeeded in getting out of the house, jumping on the nearest horses, uttering the rest, and getting away with a hundred horses, before the Glandelinians had time to pursue us with success.

A furious chase was started, and finally surrounded we hid the horses in a secure portion of a field and remained hiding under a bridge and finally escaping by pretending that we had been caught in quicksands by having thrown our hats and other loose material on sand of such real character near our hiding place. We had escaped other traps during this pursuit by means of tricks more clever than those already described.

That morning while we were riding along questioned by every soldier in gray we met, but slipping by them we were a thunder storm. Thunderbolts came up and we had to take shelter in an old abandoned cowbarn of moderate size. During the height of the storm, when the wind was blowing a screaming gale, the rain pouring in sheets of torrents, and every thunder crash ear-splitting, we saw a large party of Glandelinians led by a captain, ride up to the barn at a thunderous gallop. We found ourselves in a trap but we kept hid in the hayloft under the hay for hours, and had we once been detected, we would have been slain right there. But after searching for us in vain even among the hay, the Glandelinians left and then it was safe for us to leave the barn we started to make our way back to the Christian lines. But we were lost in a wilderness, and after being fugitives of the Glandelinians for about two weeks steadily we were finally drawing near a new Glandelinian camp along the Mc-Hollister Run-river, and saw what we realized to be a Glandelinian officer in tight, swimming under a tree, whose branches stretched across the wide stream. Thinking to Violet, who had a long rope and a long stick I said:

"Maybe we can force him to write for us a pass through the enemy's lines as he is a general."

I and Violet climbed up the tree, my other sisters doing so too to keep out of sight, I and Violet clambering onto the long branch which he was directly underneath, and began our prank. Near the officer was a large stork looking for fish, and as the officer drew nearer declaring to himself half aloud:

"Wherever Violet and her sisters ain't it, there is always peace Ding-dust it."

Violet made a noise at one end of the rope, and loosened his foot drawing it tightly around his ankle. The motion of our operations away from the branch so menacingly that a smaller portion struck the bird a resounding whack on the hind quarters, and thinking the man in the water was the offender, caught his nose in his bill giving it a sharp bite and took.

"Oh sister look I got a bite." "Cried violet to me with a laugh. "Maybe it's a sea ox or a walrus." I answered as Violet produced a small tablet of writing paper and a pencil, and extending them downward toward her prisoner.

"Good morning dear general." She said. "Would you mind writing a pass for us through the lines. And just say that we could have general Hindless auto for six hours or so and charge it."

At that moment I heard my sisters giggling.

"NEVER, while I live no Hyenas could bulldoze an old horse like I am." "I'm." "Reared the Glandelinian general. "You christian dogs that think you can get fresh with me could not last. HIMP HIMP. HIMP. HIMP."

He yelled but we were not daunted as he knew the Glandelinians could not even hear a shot at that distance from his camp.

"Lucky they couldn't hear a shot at that distance." "Though Evans to himself....

"Well I at once drew tight on the rope pulling the Glandelinian officer forward dragging him completely under between the legs of the bird, who gave a pugnaclous look."

"Talk to him birdie dear." "Launched my sister Violet. "Maybe he will listen to reason from a lady. We are not ladies. We are hyen hyenas as he says."

"This is Sadie general." "I said. "Maybe she will give you then next dance."

"Oh Sadie what a flirt." "Cried my sister Violet laughing as the bird put her foot violently into his face almost forcing it under the waxy water. "She loves him at first sight." "I said. "Maybe he will write the pass for us or we will love him and do."

"I WRITE IT GRASS." "Growled the Glandelinian general grabbing the paper and pencil as violet tickled the back of his foot saying "Kitchy, Kitchy, Kitchy, Kitchy, Kitchy, Kitchy, Kitchy." "BUT THE TIME WILL COME FOR THE DING-DUSTED WORM TO TURN AROUND ON IT. 'TILL STAND NO HONORABLE FROM THE DING-DUSTED WORM IN HUMAN FORM."

"And don't forget about the auto." "I said in answer. "And you should spell auto with a capital aut."

When the man finished writing the paper and pencil was rapidly drawn up by Violet.

"HA." "We heard the Glandelinian officer cry as he started to swim for the other shore. "Now watch me swim for the camp and tell them it is nix on the note. Haw."

But we were not brought with him yet.

"Why general." "Cried violet. "Are you going to go away and leave poor a Sadie?"

"Ah men have not got any hearts now-a-days eh Sadie?" "I asked placing another noose around the body of the bird. As the noose drew tight the man by the sudden stop sprawled in the water.

"AW---R---R---R---K." "Came from the bird.

"Hey general Sadie is calling you." "Cried violet.

"Don't cry Sadie." "I said. "He will come back."

The bird alarmed by the tugging of the rope started off into the air and by the time we were down from the tree, and started away the bird had dragged the Glandelinian officer, a considerable distance from the tree out of the water and toward the land. He had to cling to the neck of a cow toward which he was dragged before he managed to bring the bird down and unfasten the noose around his ankle. We knew that he was as angry as a tormented bull, and we reached the camp before he came to report his experience. We were soon then detected however, and realizing it saw that something must be done. In a barn near by was a score of rubber horses, which we discovered, and quickly drew out, putting in the place of the real ones, saddling them and then mounted seven ponies and campered away with the sixty horse horses belonging to the Glandelinians. Our escape was discovered, and at once there was a hue and cry, the nearest Glandelinians quickly jumping on the rubber horses. The weight of the soldiers at once flattened out the horses, making the soldiers go down with a resounding jolt suddenly to spring up again throwing the men off head first.

One of the men in a rage threw his musket at the horse that threw him thinking it was a real one, with the remark:

"Any measley pony that got's front with an old bird like I'm has got another dod-gasted guess, savvy." "Then the gun rebounded back striking the man so violently in the face as to make him see a thrillion number of stars, and knock him down flat on his back. I have to confess "Added Joos smiling now. "That this pursuit the Glandelinians made must have cost them a fortune. The Glandelinians under E Hindless the second continued the pursuit, the Glandelinians chasing us vigorously for miles on horseback until their poor horses became jaded. Coming to a country garage I saw our pursuers secure an auto, and at first I thought that our getting away would be nil. We rode hard with the auto full of Glandelinians after us full speed.

THEN THE FUN BEGAN.

That pursuit indeed at its ending seemed to be more fun than actual trouble for us. After two miles pursuit, the first auto was wrecked, they blew out seven old, and ten new tires, of the second auto, and had to wire the nearest Glandelinian camp garage for eight more giving us time to gain on them. When they did have the new tires and caught up to us again their third car caught on fire twice, the exhaust blew out, their engine went, dead, then they were huffed and buffed hitting on one cylinder, and though we were at last captured, we had to be towed into a garage at Zwingle, where while on the way two more tires blew out, and then the car caught afire again. We will never forget that that as long as we live will we sisters! Talk about your fun in spite of being prisoners. We never laughed so hard in our lives. To see old Sergeant Harwood Vivian, throwing and on the burning car, that was to tow us in also, in trying to put out the fire, and no body among the Glandelinian soldiers had a fire extinguisher. Several of the men were trying to put it out by wrapping their coats around the car only to have them catch afire until sergeant Moo-Wee as they called him, got water in a big bucket from a nearby creek and put out the flames on the two cars, just as the Zwingle Glandelinians came up to supply them with a fire fighting outfit, even the Glandelinian fire department came from three different towns. The Glandelinians even had the firemen hats on wrong, Ha, ha, ha, and when they all started to tow us in, we being guarded in the meanwhile, one of the men had a log chain about a foot long to pull us with, and when they got stuck in the middle of that big hill, and our lights went out, and we started to back down, and he hollered to the private in the tin Lizzie back of us to give us a boost, he tried to bump us up hill, and broke both his headlights and the tail light of the car we were on, and got his car caught in the rear fender of our car, Ha, ha, ha, and when he pulled it loose, the whole three of our cars, had besides the fire auto truck towing us, backed all the way down the hill, throwing the men into indiscriminate confusion, and rolled into the ditch, I and my sisters being thrown into the stream, which lucky accident enabled us to make good our escape, and reach the Christian lines without further adventure.

"Ha, ha, ha," laughed Evans. "Greatest joke on the Glandelinians I ever heard of yet. And what happened after that?"

"I don't know," she answered. "We did not stay long enough to find out. As we did not want to risk recapture, especially when we knew the mood the Glandelinians were in after that occurrence."

They had now traveled for quite a distance, it now being very dark the glow of the distant forest fires reddening the skies for miles. For a while they continued onward and soon found themselves themselves in utter darkness. Wondering where they were Evans struck a match and all were dismayed to find that they were in a labyrinthian passageway which seemed to go straight ahead but also slanted downward. On the right and left of this huge tunnelway were fifteen lay labyrinthian passageways. The ceiling of the main tunnelway was nineteen feet high from the floor and was eighteen feet wide. "We certainly must have walked into this place without warning," said Evans. "And we are lost."

"These labyrinthian tunnels have probably been made by Blenkglowr shnean serpents," said Violet. "We can hope to find them and have them liberate us."

They staggered along as fast as they could or as fast as the darkness would permit as the torch Evans ignited penetrated for a little distance only. After staggering, tripping, and sprawling, and rolling and sliding for fifteen minutes or so the tunnelway began to change to a curving and ascending position, and to their awe a strange lurid light seemed to reddens it for a distance while a sulphurous steamy smell pervaded the air. At times they were compelled to cough. The tunnel

The tunnel soon ended and terminated into a wide archy dome like cavern where from the floor at the furthest end to the end came from a glowing abyss constant explosions and deafening hisses. The cavern was so strong with the pungent biting sulphurous smell, that it seemed to fill their breath away, and as they were retracing their steps, they coughed and coughed, as if they just had the worse kind of consumption. But here again they were going wrong, for instead of going through the passageway, they were in a narrow tunnel which terminated into a narrow steep abyss. They were almost terrified, and though utterly dark, more fun fumes and intense heat arose from this dark gulf. And if it was not for a peculiar draught that passed through the tunnel the deadly fumes would have overcome them.... The heat though was terrific, and they again retraced their steps only to come upon an exceedingly long ledge, descending downward below and down perhaps, a thousand feet or more they beheld a lake of sizzling lava. They gazed upon the blinding hissing lake in dismay, and they realized that this ledge was as slippery as ice, proceeding downward running into the sea of lava so far below them.

Some parts of the steep walls, were somewhat soft, and red hot, and several other pathways were leading downwards, turning off from left to right. From the lava came the sound of hissing, the roar of explosions, hissing like the heaviest cannonading, the steam puffing from the lava surface in balloon shape clouds with a deafening roar. The floor of the cave seemed to tremble, the steam and heat over the lake was unbearable, and the fumes from the molten lava was appalling. Evans and the little girls looked like bloody beings from the bright reflection of the white hot lava. At one side of the ledge they were on a walled blacker opening and exploring it they saw that it was floorless, and that it was a large yawning gulf, it being dark as pitch inside. And no lurid glow could be seen at all. They did not dare go near this pit, which was so dark as far as eye could reach, but nevertheless they proceeded along the brink of the fiery abyss, they first came upon, watching like a chicken hawk, for in the distance molting rocks was running down into the main lake from other cravasses.... They had to be cautious as to even expose themselves to the fierce heat of the lava below, would cause them to be burned or roasted to ash, and mingling with the lake was molting rocks and as they progressed some distance, they were confronted by another gulf, but from the edge to its uttermost depths, as far as eye could reach, it was as bright as the lake itself, and going as close as they could without suffering from the effects of the tremendous heat, they saw it was dazzling bright with white hot lava, melted until it was like liquid tar.

They could not go as near as five hundred feet of the gulf, on account of the terrific heat, and continuing their way along the ledge, they saw many queer openings in the wall, towering high above them, shaping like all kinds of doors and windows, which of course were the openings to other lay labyrinthian passages. At last the narrow ledges were observed to slant upwards so steeply, that they could not progress any further without risking their lives. At last after four hours of traveling, they found themselves before a large opening, and entering found it to be a large opening, and entering found it to be a large cavern, the ceiling being awful high, and the cavern itself seemed to have no end.

After traveling a good distance, Violet and her sisters declared that the cavern seemed to be familiar to them.....

"This must be the same cavern I was in to find the serpents when I was very young," said Violet.

To the right of them was a large a lake of boiling water, which was constantly running into a roaring lake of lava far to the left. They were now in this inferno for seven hours, and having progressed from cave to cave, all this while, they began to grow alarmed and now facing the dark opening of what seemed to be the largest cavern of all they were afraid to proceed. This cave was incessantly echoing with deafening noises, and so they continued on in the one they were in. The glare from the distant lake of lava was dazzling, even at that distance, they beheld the brightness with awe. On they continued, and on, and on, until at last they came to another cave. It seemed however to be a tunnel than a cave which slanted downward steeply, and following it a certain distance saw at the ending of the tunnel a chasm, which seemed to have no bottom. They retraced their steps slowly and carefully, and soon to their surprise found themselves on the other side of the great lake of molten lava which at this point was in furious waves, rushing and splashing, and exploding in violent steam blasts, in all directions, a worse scene than that of a stormy ocean.

As the waves of the lava hit the wall one after another, the whole scene was grand. Sprays of white hot lava shot high into the air, the lava roaring and hissing in a frightful manner, and banging and cracking at the walls so fiercely, that the floor of the cave shook like an earthquake. The waves even spouted and boiled, and threw fiery spray as they broke like the regular sea.

Violet and her sisters and Evans watched the scene in great awe and some excitement and a little fear. Far to the left thousands of tons of lava, many millions of tons of lava, was pouring into the molten sea, with a roar like a thousand cannon. Cave after cave, tunnel after tunnel, they passed through. They were still lost in the labyrinthian caverns however, and finally they almost stumbled into the entrance of another huge cavern, which was fully lighted to a lurid redness, and were startled at what they saw. Five extraordinary monsters, more huge than the most immense dragons ever dreamed of, lay coiled up asleep with their enormous wings all spread over their huge bodies. Their backs were covered with golden scales but armoured, the underparts were of a deep purple of hue, and their heads though not a bit unugly looked frightfully venomous.

They were really all asleep, but not far from them there were smaller ones which raised their beautiful but venomous heads, and looked in all directions with fiery eyes as large as cups, which glared like radiant searchlights. "OAZOOKS," whispered Evans. "Be cautious little girls. If they see us there will be trouble we are wishing to avoid, and probably we would meet a frightful death. Can't you see their frightful venomous looks?"

They all hid behind a rock, as the baby ones crawled toward where they were before, lifting up their heads once in a while, and showing their fangs, which were like two blood suckers at the end of each which would inject very poisonous fluids. Suddenly the little girls were startled and appalled by seeing two eyes large as plates glaring at them, and a monstrous head as big as three bear barrels confronting them, with two gigantic horned weapons on the top of its head.

"Rover," gasped Violet. "They are Belngiglomeneans." "Rover nothing," roared the serpent angrily. "What do you Glandelinians want around here. Get out of here, or I'll tear every one of you to pieces."

"We are not Glandelinians protested Evans Evans. "We are fugitives and got lost in these caverns." "They are the Vivian girls."

The serpent looked at the little girls more closely and said: "Beg pardon but I guess I was mistaken in my suspicions. We have lost nine dens on account of the Glandelinians, and are bound to extreme means if they dare come near us again. I suppose you little girls are under the powerful protection of the Rover Serpents you know so well."

We ourselves are the very fiercest Oazooks that attacked the battle car that invaded our cave so long ago. I have a note to give to the one who operated it. The reason of our attack is simple. The car was painted gray, and so we thought that those inside the car were the wicked Glandelinians who had bayoneted our young. They had escaped in a battle car."

The monster lifted its huge head, forward toward a small opening and pulled out two white rolls of paper. Then it handed it to Evans with its mouth. Evans saw that this great creaky creature the biggest of them all had wings like a dragon, but the creatures far down below had wings of the prettiest butterflies, and besides fangs two rows of teeth like those seen in the mouth of a man. Evans had heard that the very demons fear these great Belngiglomeneans Oazookians, which were larger and more beautiful than the other varieties of Belngiglomenean serpents.

"I'll let one of the young ones go with you," said the beautiful creature. "She will show you the way out." Evans and the others followed the little one leading the way until once more they found themselves out in the fresh air. No sooner had Evans and the little girls left the region, when half a hundred gray figures sprang out from behind rocks and dashed toward them with wild yells. Evans fired bringing down several of them, but others rushed upon him knocking him unconscious with the butts of their guns.

"Where did he get that roll?" cried one of the men examining it. Violet tried to snatch it, but in a rage the Glandelinian grabbed her by the throat to strangle her. She gave a scream but he squeezed so hard, that her tongue stuck out and her eyes bulged. She struggled and begged God to save her. Then with an unearthly scream of terror the other Glandelinians at once scattered, while Violet's assailant let go of her and ran blindly toward the entrance of the cavern, but a huge head suddenly darted at him from behind a rock giving forth a tremendous roar which made the ground shake and which echoed and resounded in the cavern, the serpent bearing the message to the ground, and frightfully manly warning him. Frightened nearly out of their wits, the other Glandelinians turned and fled toward the woods, fur firing furiously as they ran, but roaring frightfully, and with it's eyes bulging, seven monsterous on objects, appeared attacking the Glandelinians, and four of them were the ones Violet and her sisters had seen in the cavern.

7-290

"Let's get before they mistake us for Glandelinians."

"Said Evans."

They all got out of range, and saw the Glandelinians being destroyed by the Grimecians. Violet and her sisters had been almost dead with fright, and they were still shaking as they hid behind the rocks. They remained in hiding until the serpents re-entered the cave.

"Those Glandelinians are all over the border of the Belngiglomenean serpents," said Evans. "The man that struck me almost knocked me senseless. It's funny indeed that the rascals could detect us despite our disguises."

"It is terrible," said Violet. "They ought to know better than to arouse the fury of those deadly Grimecians. But they slip simply won't leave them alone."

It was an awful experience indeed, and fearing danger, as it was a literal region for the hide of these serpents they discarded their disguises, rather meeting the Glandelinians undisguised, than face the fury of the terrible Belngiglomeneans, who would attack them.

"It was an awful scene," said Evans. "The Glandelinians Glandelinians take delight in torturing and murdering children, and get no remorse when they attempted to seize you little girls."

"Where is the roll," asked Violet.

"I recovered it," answered Evans. "I do not know the reason of the attack made by the serpents, whether it was for our defence, or a revengeful method over the sudden appearance of the rascals, but nevertheless they came at the Glandelinians like a streak of lightning killing every one who did not escape from their wild fury."

"One of the Glandelinians I recognized as the man who was threatened by Belngiglomeneans before the war came on, when he tried to seize a roll given to me by one of the little ones," said Violet. "But he got away."

"I saw him," said Violet. "And he certainly looked scared. And, is that not a large Belngiglomenean?" "She asked pointing to a large group of horsemen in blue gray uniforms. They look it to me."

"They are ex," exclaimed Evans excitedly. "Under cover quick before they see us."

They were in hiding none too soon, for just then there was the thunderous roar of horse hoofs, and immediately in front of their hiding place, a large troop of Condencians and Belngiglomeneans drew up suddenly.

"I know what I'm saying, and if my eyes are going bad, then what a good am I in the service then," they heard a lieutenant angrily.

"I saw Evans and those human centipedes here just a minute ago. They saw us coming and took to hiding that is all. I saw them right where this willow tree is standing."

"Well there is no use to get sore about it," growled the captain. "But this seems to be a wild goose chase just the same. If they were here they are gone now. And to find them in the darkness is impossible. But I'll report this to General Brooks, and he will secure the country for them. They must be caught under any conditions. You know Hanley and his two sons under their directions and commands is going to force the positions at Francis Atlanta as soon as he can arrive there and those little brats will spoil it all."

"You're only talking through your hat Captain," said the first lieutenant. "We could secure the country for a pin in a haystack to find them."

They have escaped and I knew they would. Had we rushed upon them as I proposed, before they saw us coming we would have had them. Put you doubted my statement, and delayed, and now they have escaped us."

One of the cavalry men picked up Violet's hat which she had dropped in her haste to get in hiding.

"They indeed were here," he said. "This bonnet belongs to one of them."

The cat Captain now realized the truth and said:

"Well they're all gone now and we can't find them in this darkness. Next time lieutenant I will take your advice. You have got better eyes than I'm, though you do wear glasses."

"I just believed those little brats were spying or doing something," said a sergeant to the captain. "Anyway I have always heard that those kids called the Vivian girls are dangerous. Many of our greatest generals have done their utmost, to capture them, but have not succeeded. And once you do succeed in laying hold of them it is impossible to retain them."

Violat and her sisters listened to this conversation with intrinsic interest, in fact, that when the Glandelinians began to hunker, Violat lost some of her cautiousness, and by a slight misstep precipitated herself on the ground in front of the nearest Glandelinian causing a hue and cry and some consternation among the foe.....It was all off now, they had to run for it, Evans went snatching Violat, before the surprised Glandelinians could seize her.

"AFTER THE DIRTY SKUNKS," Yelled the captian. "They were hiding by the roadway, and so we were listening for information."

The soldiers instantly swarmed into the woods, hoping that they would easily overtake the fugitives, as they had a belief that they would not be able to find their way through those dark woods through which at night roamed the fierce and blood thirsty timber wolves.

But the Glandelinians were fooled, Evans and the little girls did not pursue their way through these woods, as the Glandelinians thought, but went back to the road by another route, with the intention to make a cat-a-way with all their horses. They were all Glandelinians standing close to a tree, and Evans stole cautiously up to him, and noticed the gray coat as the man who had rode a little way and who made him run his own car into the ditch to escape an accident.

Evans walked right up to him, and ignoring the fixed bayonet presented to him said;

"I was in my ford with my father, and you were in your employers auto, and we met on a country road, and you made me get into a ditch or be shoved off. That was outside the city of Galverine before the war, and this is to DAY." And Evans gave him such a blow over the side of the head as to force him down against the tree trunk, with his feet perpendicularly in the air, rendering him unconscious.

"Quick little girls, get all the horses." Said Evans. And off they went taking all the horses with them. The other Glandelinians hearing the gallop of horses, rushed into the road in time to see their eight fugitives making off with all their horses. In vain they fired madly, in an effort to stop them. The range was already too great and the bullets fell short.

"They make me tired," growled the captian. "This is also the worse thing that I have ever seen them do, make off with all our horses."

At this moment there was a fresh sound of galloping, and another party of Glandelinian cavaliers came dashing up.... They halted as they saw the dismounted men, and getting information as to what had happened, the horsemen at once set off in pursuit.

Violat and her sisters with Evans had gained considerable distance by this time, but the Glandelinians were gaining so quickly on them now, that the fugitives had to scatter the horses in a wheat field and seek shelter in a tavern.

AN EXCITING THRUSTLE.

The Glandelinians saw them enter the tavern, and burst their way in. Evans shot two of them down, grabbed two more Glandelinians, humped their heads together making them see a hundred stars, a piece, sent another flying head first, against a closed door, with a chair sailing close behind him, rubbed another Glandelinian soldier's nose in the sloop can as he tried to rush on him, kicked another clean through a window pane shattering and all head first, and struck a lieutenant a stinging blow on the jaw sending him reeling against the thick portiere, with such force, that as he fell he brought everything down on top of him. In all this confusion Violat and her sisters had escaped through a rear door recovering all the horses and Evans also getting away was soon close behind them, the Glandelinians galloping after them full speed.

It was impossible however for the Glandelinians to overtake Evans and the Vivian girls, but nevertheless after a going a considerable distance, became alarmed for now he began to realize that they were lost, lost in a wild wilderness, facing inconceivable peril, as they were lost in the dark, with the Glandelinians no doubt scouring the whole region for them. Evans was at a lost loss as to what should be done. They were fugitives lost in a wild burning wilderness, facing inconceivable peril, both, from the forest fires and the Glandelinians, and thirdly from the fierce and ravenous timber wolves. They knew not where the Christian armies were, and maybe they were either camping, retreating or advancing. Evans had a foreboding that the Glandelinians were victorious for if they were not what was the meaning of so many seen so often!!!!

At first he did not say anything to Violat and her sisters, until when they began to suspect it, he said;

"I fear we are lost, so now we will have to be more careful than ever. There seems to be an unusual number of Glandelinians, about and those besides soldiers and fire we will have to watch out for. If we ever get taken by the Glandelinians now, we will probably never see our friends again."

"I'm armed," said Violat. "And so are my sisters. I'm determined that they shall never take us alive!"

"You are right," said voice. "We had many a battle with the Glandelinians, and ain't afraid to have another."

They all felt tired and sleepy but yet they did not dare lay down anywhere and sleep in these deadly woods. They had turned all the captured horses loose at finding themselves lost, as they were only another to them. They kept on traveling, and traveling, watching every side of the road cautiously, watching every movement of the bushes, or tall trees, for they knew that Glandelinian sharpshooters may be hiding in ambush either among the bushes, or in the top of trees, and so they examined all these and dark looking objects more cautiously than could be described.

Even if there was no immediate dangers from the fires; or the Glandelinians these woods, were infested with the gray or timber wolves as huge as the biggest hunting dogs, and as fierce and ravenous as dragons of the fable stories.....!!!!!!

But just now it seemed quite early for them to be roaming about and it was also evident on account of so much firing recently that they did not dare venture out for prey too soon. Violat and her sisters were anxious, yes very anxious to learn the outcome of the great conflict already past, and which probably was still raging. It indeed did seem possible to them that by the way so many Glandelinians were seen, that general Vivian, Hanson or Zimmerman may be beaten beaten..... that the rule of Gloria or Anna Maria may be already in Vanleys possession, and that the Angelinian cause was lost..... that the Christians were beaten and beaten completely. It was a as they feared, a complete war, won by the rascally Glandelinians, that the victory periled them still more, and that probably there was no escape for them now..... They kept on their tireless journey, until daybreak commenced, and then as it grew lighter, Evans decided to try and find their way back to the Christian lines. Their course was now south eastward, and feeling confident of reaching the Christian lines before long they conversed to each other more cheerfully and talked of experiences past, that they all went through. Soon reaching a hilly region, they selected a high rise of ground, and from this Evans surveyed the surrounding country, with his army field glasses. But all that could be seen in the direction south of him was nothing, but no smoke, smoke, smoke, and smoke.....

????? ##### ?????? ?????? ### ???

TTE THE DARING JAIL BREAK.....

"I'm sure if we don't do something pretty pretty soon we're goners." He said to Violat. "South east, or west, there is nothing, but smoke, smoke, and smoke. We may have escaped the foe, but are almost encircled by forest fires. This is the darndest, most jeopardized condition we have ever been in before. We are lost in the midst of inferno."

"Well what shall we do?" Asked Violat impatiently.

"And we have not eaten a mouthful for over forty eight hours. And do my eyes deceive me or do we see Glandelinians swarming up the hill in multitudes?"

"Indeed they are," said Evans. "We must make away before they discover us."

Away they did go reaching the base in a very few minutes, just as the Glandelinians reached the top. They were seen, but nevertheless and luckily they were not the Glandelinians that persecuted children, and had they been the Glandelinians having good windage, could have fired a volley volley that would have riddled Evans and the little girls. They paid no attention to the fleeing fugitives, feeling softly assured that they were not spying, and Evans and the little girls got away very easily, hardly a word being said. But this convinced them still more that the Landolinians had won the victory at Anna-Maria-Glorini's, and with a heavy heart they continued on their way. While they were continuing on they saw along the northwestern lower skies, what appeared to be a dun-colored cloud, mist or smoke, as if all the words at a great distance were on fire.

"Could that be so?" Thought Evans. "Has the Landolinians fired the latter end of their shot? Or is it possible that the forest fires was outcropping them? Or was it a cloud of dust?" They continued to gaze at the strange phenomenon, which seemed to be rising higher into the sky, thickening frightfully along the horizon line, now resembling a dust storm, or sand cyclone, of the deserts, now like the stroke of a wide spreading conflagration, and now like a reddish cloud, and already the sun rising high into the sky and clouded by it, as it swept overhead, passing over the sun disk like a screen, highlight no longer falling upon the plains.

Was it the forerunner of some terrible storm? Just at this moment there was a sudden rush and roar of wildly speeding horses, and before they could do anything in defense, they were seized by the foremost horsemen, who placed them on their horses. Violet and her sisters were terrified, for from the garb the Landolinians wore they realized them as the fierce Gargolians, Kurds, the most cruel of them all and the most savage. The Landolinians spoke not a word, but continued several miles, until they came abruptly to a large prison like building, from which not far away was a large camp belonging to the Gargolians.

"You have escaped the other sects of different Landolinians, but you will not escape us," hissed the leader. "We know you little green snakes too well to be fooled, and have prepared a prison for you, that you and your guardian will never for escape from."

Violet and her sisters did not say a word, neither did Evans, and when they were locked in their cells, and left alone with solitary guard, Violet determined to help Evans, and her sisters to escape.

Sgt. Sh. Shortly before two o'clock the guard made his rounds as he was ordered to do. He noticed a commotion in the cell occupied by Evans and Jennie. The little girl inside was writhing on the floor while it seemed as if Evans was strangling her. The guard not wishing to allow her or any of her sisters to be killed just yet, opened the door of the cell and rushed in to pull Evans off, and pick little Jennie up.

All at once he found himself in a vice like grip, and Jack Evans made short work of the guard, for before he could raise an outcry, to raise an alarm, and attract the other guards, Evans floored him with his fist, fracturing his skull. Jennie took the keys, and both stepped out. Violet and her other sisters were fully acquainted with what was transpiring, waiting eagerly at the doors of their cells until Jennie opened them. Other prisoners were also liberated, all Christian soldiers and officers. Evans and the little girls ran to the northeast corner of the jail floor, and at the foot of an aisle, there was a window, the bars of this window in some manner, having been sawed, this leading the Landolinian generals to believe that the escape of the prisoners was an outside job, as it was impossible for Evans and the little girls, to have sawed the bars in the short space of time in which they made their escape. Another circumstance that gave evidence to inside aid was that the guards on duty at the jail were found bound and gagged, and their weapons taken from them. Another guard was entering the bull pen, and suddenly Evans made his appearance, grabbing the guard and choking him into unconsciousness, and as he lay on the floor Evans went through the pockets of his gray uniform, took away his keys, and opening other cells released other Christian prisoners, giving them the guards' weapons. Evans and another man then took the senseless guard, and carried him into the bull pen, opening a cell and putting him inside, taking the precaution to lock the door of this cell after them---this cell being vacant at the time the guard was placed in it. They next proceeded to cell 410 and released six child prisoners, while Jennie opening cell 409 adjoining that of cell 410 and released three Christian commanders, opening to the bull pen door, and running across the corridor to the Illinois guardsroom, where they proceeded to finish the job of sawing the bars in the lower left hand corner of this window. Another guard came up but Evans seeing him approaching, struck him also, knocking this guard unconscious, and grabbing his keys, and going to more cells near by occupied by stolen children, released them. Evans bound and gagged the unconscious guard, picked him up bodily and threw him into one of the cells occupied by more Christian officers leaving them out and then locking the door.

Then they deliberately released themselves from the bull pen, went around to the cells occupied by more Christian prisoners officers at that, and left them out. Then from some mysterious place they produced a rope, which was made from pieces of new window cord, which was cut into hundred and fifty feet long, being doubled to add strength, and the loose ends after being knotted, were carefully tied with white twine. Evans now went to the window which he had prepared for their daring escape. The bars were two inches and a quarter thick, which were now almost sawed through. Evans snapped them with his strong arms, or hand saw, and twisted them all out in less than a minute. But there was still one more difficulty to overcome. Heavy iron gates hung outside, that opened back, like the French windows, a padlock on the outside holding each. Though the escaping Christians had never had access to this lock, it too had been fixed for them, and soap in the crack made by the saw, concealed the fact that it had been tampered with. A quick blow and the lock was broken.

Fastening the rope to the grating, each man tying a child onto his back, with other rope quickly let them down. Darkness was falling and they were far too off before the escape of all the prisoners was discovered or realized. Of course when the escape was discovered, it was too late to pursue, but platoons of cavalry and infantry were sent to all parts of the country, the infantry and cavalry with blood hounds to run down the escaped fugitives. Three days after their escape, each soldier being separated, and gone, each different way, so as to elude their pursuers succeeded in reaching safety, but Evans and the little girls were far from sight of any Christian life as yet.

Evans picking up a newspaper, was startled at what he saw. This is what he read:

CHRISTIAN DOGS BREAK JAIL, KILL TWO GUARDS, VIVIAN GIRLS, AND GUARDIAN GUARDIAN, FREN THIRTY PRISONERS. TRICK GUARD....

Five guards badly injured. Two killed. Ten overpowered; as prisoners drop by improvised rope, from window of which bars were already sawed. "SHOOT TO KILL." Manley's order. Vivian girls responsible.

Fight of the most desperate Christian prisoners, seven of them under sentence of death, a 11 notorious, as criminals against Landolinia, not only escaped themselves, but liberated thirty other prisoners, ten of which are child captives. By a clever ruse, planned by a prisoner, probably Jack Evans; they outwitted the main guard, overpowered, and killed him, killed another, felled five mortally, and bound and gagged ten others, locked them up in the cells, from which the prisoners were liberated, tore out bars, previously sawed, broke a padlock, previously cut, and lowered themselves by a rope prepared some time before, from the fourth floor of the jail. The men fled with the child children, tied to their backs into the woods, a while Evans and the snakes with him, called the Vivian girls, slipped into a ravine and vanished into the woods on the other side.

"Shoot them on sight if you spot them again." Was the order of General Johnston Jackson Manley; he gave to his own men last night, as he himself from Anna-Maria-Glorini, sent squads hurrying in every direction with bloodhounds. Grimly he added: "Don't let them start!" Recognized as the most desperate, daring, and vicious Christian dogs, in the world those Vivian girls have been hunted for nearly over three years and four months, at great expense to our armies, and when captured four days ago had been placed in separate cages, made of amalgamated steel, and guaranteed to defy the stoutest saw or file. Every precaution had been taken as it was known those Vivian girls are great at escaping the worse prisons.

The camouflage that led to the escape, was worked in this manner, "Evans was the only one of the eight, with a callmate, and with him was the callmate the Vivian girl called Jennie Vivian. This soldier who wore the uniform of a colonel was seen by the guard to suddenly seize Jennie by the throat, saw her tongue protrude, and eyes bulge, as if being strangled, and as he threw her writhing on the floor, the sentry took a taken of his guard, not knowing that it was a ruse, as the soldier was not really choking the little girl, opening and opened the gate of the bull pen, or exercise room, and opening the cell, to interfere was killed by Evans, who in turn overpowered ten others, and escaped after liberating the others. This was the most sensational deliveries on record...."

These thirty eight prisoners notorious criminals now at large, in the country, are no problem. Fleet for the Christian lines....

They are as follows:

Violet Vivian; sentenced to death, many times, on the evidence and proof of spying on the Glandelinian generals.

Joice Vivian; her sister; sentenced to death for the same reason. Jennie Vivian sentenced to death for the spying exploits, and the shooting of many noted Glandelinians and generals who were pursuing them.

Angeline Vivian, arrested many times, in connection with the deaths of many Glandelinian generals, and escaping as many times, despite re-arrests, last month, near Little Gloria. Francis Anna, and hunted like a dog for the murder of general Malin. Also sentenced to death. Hattie Vivian, one of the most notorious spies, in Calvernia, reputed "Brains" of general Vivian's crackmen army awaiting sentence for many and various spying expeditions.

Catherine Vivian. Sentenced to death for depredations.

Daisy Vivian. Also one of the most notorious spies, in Calvernia, also sentenced to death.

Colonel Jack Evans also called brains, or the brains of the whole Christian army, after revealing the Vivian girls from Glandelinian wrath, by some mysterious influence. Would have been sentenced to death for the attempted murder of unlaya son melnum, also for the attempted murder of one of the Tamerlines, a very superior general. Also believed to have shot, and wounded general Raymond Richardson Federal; in many battles. The ten children liberated were:

Sarah Lemington, five years old.

Frank Hanson, ten.

George Appleton. Nine.

Frank Earl four.

Jennie Francis Earl. Five. His sister.

Florence Lytle. Eight. A cripple. Sentenced to death, for saying her prayers, when not allowed to.

Grace Catherine. Nine. One half years old.

Henry Borolley. Six.

Vivian Francis Dunham Dunham. Ten years old. Sentenced to death for shooting Colonel Lemington, when his men raided the home of his mother.

Maxwell O'Connell. A six year old girl. Charged with spying.

The twenty men who were prisoners of war, and who were also liberated were;

Lieutenant Jacob Dunn.

Coporal Jacob Swartz.

First Lieutenant Paul Arcus.

First Lieutenant James Cox.

Second Lieutenant Jack Pollen.

Major John Maxwell.

Private Henry Johnston.

Private Frank Francis Smith.

Private John Joseph Hadley Logan.

Private Halsey Richard Logan.

Captain Thomas Phelan.

Captain Bernard Dunn.

Colonel Henry Joseph Narger.

Colonel Harry Narger, son cousin of Henry Narger.

Colonel Henry Reel.

Private Jim Daniels.

Private Daniel Lyman.

Lieutenant Colonel William Schloeder.

Major Henry John Schloeder, his brother.

When the main Gargolian general summoned at once by the commotion arrived on the scene, with his staff he ordered all the guards who were overpowered, and beaten by the escaping prisoners, to be brought before him, making them tell him again, and again, how the prisoner Evans, feigned murder, how the tricked guard had gone into the cell alone, and been attacked, and how they had been locked in separate cells, while the prisoners were actually making their escape. Thousands of investigations have been started, and it is assured that the prisoners, will all soon be run down. The whole country is now secured for them, and if they had not yet reached any of the Christian armies, they will surely be run down.

Evans looked at Violet and her sisters, who looked at him....

"We will have to keep at large a under any conditions now," said Evans.

"We are in for it now. If we don't find some Christian army now we will have to take our way to Abbieanna."

Evans and the little girls had been seeking shelter in an old abandoned farm house, and knowing that the foreword said on them are they got a chance to escape, they went to a nearby, and stopping a man on an auto, Evans got in and said sternly;

"Whom do you side with in this great war? Abbieanna, Angelina, Calvernia, or Glandelinian?"

"Glandelinian," said the man angrily. "Think when those blasted devils, assassinated even my own children, I'd stick up for them. Ha I'd die first."

"You are the right man I want," said Evans. "You have an opportunity to revenge your loss."

"And he showed the man the news of the great jail break."

"Good thing. I thank God that they did escape," exclaimed the man a gleam of hate in his eyes. "I have the paper my self. Got it this morning. I hate Hanley and his whole blooming army. They never could keep those brave little girls, in jail, and they never will."

"True," said Evans. "I was one of them." He gave a signal, and to the man's surprise the three little girls appeared.

"Here are the little girls," said Evans. "You will be satisfied by seeing us to get away."

The man gave quick look and then said;

"In with them. I'll find the Christian lines."

No sooner had they gotten into the auto, when a swarm of Glandelinians and Americanians horsemen came into view their light blue uniforms showing plainly against the background of the trees. The chase started, the Glandelinians riding with might and main, after the fleeing car, shouting and firing wildly. As they sped on they came to what appeared to be a narrow canon. Only the railing of what was once the floor of a bridge crossed this gulf, a very insignificant structure indeed. It was a very hazardous thing to cross, but rather than by falling into the abyss than risk capture, they sped for the bridge. The Glandelinians were coming swiftly in a cloud of dust, but the machine crossed safely, just as the foremost horseman reached the brink. Some dismounted walking, half way across the treacherous beams, firing volley, after volley, but Evans returned the fire hitting five of them, and causing them to fall into the gulf below. Those on horseback quickly dashed around another direction, and the pursuit was on in general. The fugitives were now reaching a railroad crossing, and only about two hundred yards distant a munition freight train, for the Glandelinian army was approaching at full speed. To cross they had to, for too stop was too late. But they got to the track just in time, to be struck by the train, and though the crushed, and mangled auto, was hurled fifty feet, with its occupants thrown more than sixty, marvellously, no one was injured, though for a minute every one was dazed.

The engineer having seen the collision, stopped the train right in the way of the pursuing horsemen, who raised Cain, yelling and cursing the engineer, for a fool, for stopping his munition train right in their way, when they were after escaping Christian spies.... Evans and the little girls, with the other man, saw an opportunity in the delay, and soon were hiding in an empty box car, in which they stayed until the train which had resumed its trip, entered the town of Benslay.

Then they got off, and learning that most of the inhabitants, were loyal to the Glandelinian cause, became more cautious as they traveled along the tracks, answering every question cleverly, and making no blunder, which would have caused their immediate detection, and probable arrest.... Suddenly as they were passing through the heart of the town, a squad of soldiers in greenish grey uniforms, came up to them the sergeant saying;

"You strangers are under arrest. I have been instructed to arrest all strangers, that should enter this place. There has been a jail break and besides, you people look like the ones, pictured in the papers."

Evans let fly with his fist, sending the sergeant sprawling head over heels on the ground. There was a motor truck, standing near a station, and into this the fugitives at once hurried themselves, Evans starting it off at once, while a pursuing multitude threw a shower of stones and other missiles at them, then the soldiers firing again and again but the bullets flew wild. A large swarm of the flocks cavily, and at once gave chase, and Evans and even the little girls fired with such accuracy, that the Glandelinians seeing their comrades go down for every shot, became disheartened, and abandoned the pursuit, as any way there was no chance of overtaking the motor truck. In a short time they left the town far behind, and trading the motor truck to a farmer for his nine horses, they at once set out for the railroad tracks, alongside of which they went at a spirited gallop for a mile or so....

Crack, crack, crack, crack. Four shots suddenly sounded, and the man who had first offered to take them to the christian lines, fell dead from his horse, murdered by the merciless glandelinians. After returning a pistol volley that was effective for every shot, the remaining fugitive dashed off another direction, to find a swarm of glandelinian horsemen closing in on them.

For a moment there seemed impossibility to escape the furious pursuers armed to the teeth, and as their pursuers were Gargolians, it seemed all the more difficult to get away. And far in advance of the Gargolians were twenty six harking, howling blood-hounds. Some of the glandelinians brought fly a shower of javelins, and as these flew wild fired a volley, that brought down the horse Evans was riding on. The approaching dogs howled and bayed, and Evans having been dismounted, and the dogs being upon him, turned at bay, and I tell you right now, dear readers, he fought the dogs right gallantly like an infuriated demon. He dashed them to right and left, after emptying both guns on six of them, and actually killed six more with his naked fists. Jennie then fired a shot that brought a Gargolian leader down, the bleeding at Evans feet. Before any of the amazed hooded soldiers, could fire Evans was on the once horse of the fallen man, and dashed into a thicket, followed by the remaining dogs, who set up a horrible clamor.

THE HORRIBLE MASSACRE.

In the meantime the battle of Anna-Maria Glorinia, seemed to have turned out as a glandelinian victory, and the apparently victorious Glandelinians all that night gathered together, the christian women and children, they had still with them, captured from other raids. Many priests and clergymen, had been tortured and slain, christian soldiers, taken as prisoners were massacred and the prettiest of the children not deformed or sick were carried off to the slave camps to be sold into slavery. All the while over forty four thousand women and children, who were taken into the Mac-Hollister Run regions where they experienced hours of cruel suffering. When the advancing glandelinians entered the city of Aurora, then a certain woman had begged the glandelinian chieftains, to let her remain in her home to care for her aged mother, who was in bed with consumption, but the glandelinians not only refused but made the aged woman leave her bed, and take to the road with the rest of the procession of fugitives. During the first days the fugitives were on the road, many of the children had been very courageous, but just after they passed through the town of Hannon, where thousands of little children had been massacred, several children in this procession died, and the mother had been compelled to leave her dead children at a river crossing.

The last of her children being a little girl was very ill in her arms, and when the procession of prisoners passed the bodies of soldiers slain in recent battle, several of the children suddenly went insane, several of the women even threw their children on the ground, and ran screaming out of the line of prisoners, toward the river. Others running wild, with their children hanging to their arms were shot down by the soldiers, many of whom charged the procession of prisoners, swinging their sabres and guns right and left and even firing point blank, killing and wounding many, before the bedlam stopped.

"God has gone mad I tell you, mad-mad-mad--" shrieked the infuriated glandelinians. "That is what your god is--he --i s---crazy--He has gone mad--deserted--- you foolish ---christian-dogs."

The minds of many of the christian prisoners were already shaken by their inability to understand why they should be made to suffer the things they had endured at the hands of these cruel glandelinians. More than one thousand of the prisoners mostly children, had already died, and every minute the procession of prisoners were afraid, general Estrabrook Francis Starring the Gargolian Guard chieftain would ride down upon them, and beside these were other Kurdish glandelinian bands in the region. The Zimmermannians who had charge of the christian prisoners, made them march in a narrow thin line, with the main glandelinian armies moving alongside at the distance of three hundred yards from them, the line of weary stragglers stretching out as far as could be seen, both ahead and behind, the fugitives allowed to have but little water, as the Zimmermannians would not allow them to go near streams for fear of either their escaping or committing suicide, but gave them water, when necessity compelled it. Soon it was seen that the Mac-Hollisterians and Zimmermannians guarding the prisoners, were talking earnestly with the Omerian guards, who were in charge of a party of child prisoners, from from Nancy and it seemed that it must have been that the other soldiers who had some experience already in guarding deported child prisoners gave advice to their guards, for the poor prisoners were treated even more cruelly, cruelly, after that meeting, for the old women and those too ill to keep on were murdered one by one by the soldiers, and even when children lagged behind, or got out of the line to rest, the glandelinians would undress them, lift them on their bayonets, and toss them away, sometimes trying to cut the arms on their bayonets, while their poor mothers, who saw their young ones being killed in this way for the sport of the wicked guards, could only watch and wring their hands, or hold their eyes shut while their children died, for any sort of protest meant suicide.

One little girl was carried off from the road by a Zimmermannian who first beat her terribly, when she tried to resist him, and then buried his knife into her abdomen, and tearing it open left her to die.

That afternoon the armies with their procession of prisoners passed the little Gargolians village of Green. The soldiers driving the inhabitants out and sending them into the other line of prisoners the soldiers looting all the houses, in the village, and setting them on fire. Soon there was a commotion, screams ensuing from the nearest portion of the line of prisoners, figures running here and there, with other figures in pursuit. One child was thrown to the ground, the glandelinians ripping her body open with their bayonets. When the big captured town of Labranon loomed up before the prisoners, the helpless children began to tremble with their dread, and many of them fell falling down unable to walk so great was their anguish, but the soldiers whipped them up and soon all were in the center of the town, all of the women and children, and men too being wholly wholly nude, the soldiers not allowing them to cover themselves, seeming to take a special delight in watching those that were without clothes did not obtain another garment from others not nude. These poor prisoners were compelled to walk through the streets of Labranon to the public square, their hands bowed with shame, while the glandelinian soldiers in possession there, jeered, at them from windows and sides sidewalks, and the roadside. A general halt was made here and all the prisoners still naked were bobbled to the cavalry horses tethered to trees, each prisoner with their hands tied behind their backs, and tied by the feet to the end of a rope fastened around the horses neck. Thus they left the prisoners, so that neither they or the horses could escape. At the distance the hills grew white with the figures of the Aghyadagi Gargolians guards, who rode down among the glandelinians there being millions of them.

After Evans and Violet and her sisters had ridden a considerable distance, from their frantic pursuers, they all halted turned at bay, and for three hours defended themselves, from behind rocky ledges against the frightful fury of the Gargolians, and only resumed their retreat when in danger of exhausting their ammunition, having shot down fifty of the glandelinians. The Gargolians were now more wary, and tried many various maneuvers to run down the fugitives, but in vain, and finally gave it up in sullen disgust.

The fugitive had already neared the town of Labranon and suddenly saw before them a vast army of tents, and prisoners here and therein multitudes tied to the horses. Not far from where they halted, they heard voices, and dismounting they stole forward cautiously, and saw the three Manleys standing together in a group, conversing with one another.

"I thought I had killed that 'Jehannu' Manley," hooted.

"By God's sake I'll do it now."

"Don't do it," warned Violet catching the hand in which he had the gun. "Wait until we hear what they are saying."

"That those dog gone christian armies, under the vivians and that Williamsburger Zimmermann," hooted Manley said. "They have beaten us now, and we had to run like sheep before the advancing hosts. If they overtake us I'll have those prisoners, we took on our retreat out to death. It is maddening."

"And reports were, that that dog of a general Vivian was killed," hooted John Manley the main commander. "Why he was no dead that he descended upon us rear, while Evans and those blasted vivian girls, called Violet and her sisters were mourning over him. . . . He is now in advancing to intercept our retreat."

"And the worse of it is about the living girls, and their guardian Jack Evans. . . . General Darger, Garfield and I had captured them, locked them in a prison, near my right wing, that encamped at Salome that day, and what should the little monkeys do, but I'll bet thirty of the most dangerous christian prisoners, besides getting away themselves, and kill . . . ing two guards and mortally wounding five, and overpowering the rest. I've given orders through the whole landelinian-landelinian armed armies fighting the christians in this old Germanian country to shoot those blasted little devils on sight, that they are to be shot on sight, and my order is being disobeyed. Several landelinians have already nervous them, but did not try at all to kill them."

"I'll enforce the order," said John Manley. "The quickest we kill them the better. I still fear to feel the bitter sting of the defeat at Anna-Maria and will be avenged."

"I know who is the man who can shoot them on sight," said Huestaum Manley. "Those little snakes with their guardians are always heading north, not knowing where the christian armies are, and so are lost."

Get that general Darger to take out a squad of men, instruct him to locate the living girls, and slay them in ambush."

"A good plan my son," said general Jack Manley. "If they only knew general Vivian's armies are south of us, they could escape this trap."

"Good information," thought Jack Manley. "Well, let's see if to run into that ambush though."

As I was going to say, continued the main chief. "If general Vivian had really been dead, instead of being a false report, it would have been worse for us, for general Hanson the main christian leader, is a regular gorilla in fury. At Vivian's death, he being the main commander as he is would exert all his power to revenge it. And he is such a pugnaucious fighter that he should be set the chance he would crush my several armies like a worm, and probably what he has already done to several. I have intended many times to try and lure them great christian generals both into an ambush and slay them. With them too desperate fighters gone, all would be well."

"Yes but how could we lure them. That's the question. Nobody has been able to trick them yet, and so, but headed they are, that it is dangerous to arouse them," said Darger.

"Especially general Hanson Vivian the main commander," said John Manley his eyes flashing fiercely. "He is terribly hot tempered, a regular bull, a pepperhead, and flies off for every little thing. I had a quarrel with him during a lull of the pirates, when before we were fast friends. Now I always have hatred him. And to think he is the main head. No matter we meet such fierce and serious resistance in all the battles that were fought all over throughout the war. I have heard that he is impossible to trick, as no fox is as wily as he is."

Then he added, -

"But just now we can drop that matter. The main thing I'm depending on is to see the living snakes called Violet and her sisters. To kill them I must see it done. I'll hold you two generals, my father and brother on account of their escape hereafter."

"And it'll be done," said Johnston Jack Manley. "And here comes general Darger now."

Violet and her sisters saw a general of medium height approaching. He had a continual scowling way, about him, was quick and snappy in his action, wearing a long robe, in gray coloring with a hood unfastened and hanging down his back. When he came up to them and dismounted, he saluted the three Manleys as if he was trying to throw his arm from his shoulder, bringing his hand down to his side, with a resounding crash.

Violet and her sisters had never observed a fiercer looking man, in fact he was worse looking than general Raymond Richardson Federal himself, who still served, this individual now approaching with his pugnaucious scowl. Darger saluted him as he had done the three Manleys; and Federal said: "So the little brats got away from you, and liberated thirty other prisoners. You are a great one in holding prisoners. And you told me that no prisoner would escape from your men. And I told you I knew different. And now you see that I was right eh?"

"They did get away and shot my cousin, who was guarding them," said general Darger. "I'll get revenge on revenge or die as a liar. I hate their very presence, the god-damn little toads. They must be with us as they seem to possess charmed lives. I've never seen or observed them before face to face, though my men caught them."

"You can get your revenge easily enough," said John Manley.

"Take a squad of men out and make a search for them. When you discover them lure them in ambush and kill them. To prove of your success, bring their foul little bodies to me."

"I'll do your excellency," said Darger. "I hate them worse than the most dreaded disease, and I lust in their killing. If I succeed in getting them, I'll tear their bodies open alive."

"But don't be too reckless in that matter," said Federal sternly. "Those dog-gone, dod-gasted living girls can never be taken alive, if they once see a horde of men coming after them, and will not allow themselves to be taken. And if hard pressed they won't hesitate to shoot. Why the reckless devils as they are tried alone, one day without the help of any soldiers to make me a prisoner."

"I've heard about that," said general Darger. "But maybe there could be means of surprising them. As several times they have been taken alive."

"That is true," said Federal. "But then such chances are very rare. Your men did have the chance when they did surprise them but won't again I'm sure."

"They are certainly a pack of scoundrels," whispered Evans to Violet. "I would like to shoot them down where they stand, but then though they are good easy targets, we could not get away quick enough if we did."

"Well we know their wicked intentions," answered Violet. "And so must do our level best to be more against them. Any way it seems to be a man either on the christian side or on the enemy side by the name of Henry Darger. This is also suspicious besides mysterious."

"And he looks the same like the one whom we returned the man uscript to whispered. "Darger. "I don't like this. It is either he is treacherous, or there is something else. He seems to wear the purple one day and the gray the next. We will have to watch them or hide."

For a few moments the group of landelinian generals were silent Federal gazing around cautiously with his hawk like eyes, and fondling his scabbard.

"Those stupid little girls will never find the christian lines again if I can help it," he said to himself. Violet and her sisters nearly laughed at this remark but just then Manley who was standing very close to emphasize a remark, brought his head down heavily on Violet's hand, as she leaned forward to catch every word. The dear brave child was faint with a pain, but little heroine that she was she merely bit her lip, and uttered not a word. Another time they were nearly discovered for as the generals drew more closer, Violet gave a little snore.

"There's someone among those tickets," cried Federal but just as he strode forward, a cat walked out of the bushes purring loudly.

"Well it's quite a problem though to catch the living girls," said Huestaum Manley. "The young human snakes, are as slippery as eels and are known to never miss a shot. Their guardian called Jack Evans shot me during that terrible conflict with the christians at Little Gloria Francis Anna but did not aim well enough to make it a fatal shot."

"I came near being fatal my son," said general Jack Manley. "That boy Evans, is more dangerous than they are, and is as strong or stronger than Everett True in the Chicago Evening post I read every evening which comes across the ocean to me in the mails. But he has been known to do worse pugilestic stunts than he can, and it would be a great satisfaction to the whole landelinian army and nation, if some one would do their best to put him where he belongs. He is becoming a regular nuisance, for his conduct has a bad influence on the little sand Centepedes in general."

"I know one of the living girls threw a stone at me one day," said Huestaum Manley. "I've always heard that despite being little girls they could throw without missing. She missed me about twenty feet. Violet who had been the door of the deed was stung by this remark and she suddenly lost control of herself, expelling herself herself and said: "Well I must say that I did miss you that day, because of a sore arm, but I don't think I'll miss you now. And she struck him in the back of the head with the fragment of a rolling pin, she had found lying on the ground, near her, the force of the blow knocking him down. Knowing now that they were discovered, they made a precipitate dash for the woods beyond, Manley yelling for them to stop, and in a rage he got up and whipped up his pistol and fired repeatedly in an effort to bring them down, but it was only wasting lead."

A force of cavalry men came dashing up, in seeing the commotion. "After those living girls," screamed out Huestaum Manley in a maudlin rage. "T! She will hit me will she? But remember they are not to be taken prisoners. Shoot them on sight. Disobey this command at the risk of your lives."

The whole swarm dashed immediately after the little girls and Evans. Evans, feeling sure that they would overtake them, as the fugitives were on foot. To avoid being captured by the fierce Gargolians, Gargolians now after them, Evans and the little girls fled toward a steep rise of ground, crowned with a narrow line of rocks and boulders, and here they halted, loading every chamber of their weapons, fortunately having with them now a good supply of ammunition which they had secured after escaping from their former pursuers.

A narrow pass ran up to where their position was, a steep and narrow one, which the enemy's troops could only enter in double files, so that they would be dangerously, and fatally exposed to the fire of Evans and the little girls who could hold it successfully against a whole division of Glandelinians. As soon as they had entrenched themselves the Gargolians appeared, a piece of artillery to the surprise of Evans and the little girls, being brought into the pass, and in order to bear down upon the man and child fugitives, it had to be placed directly in front of their position, and within easy range of Evans and the little girls.

Scarcely had it been placed in position, when Evans and the little girls opened a rapid fire upon it, and which was continued with such marked effect, that the Glandelinians were compelled to withdraw the gun, without the chance of a single shot or discharge, and with a loss of twenty men.

The Glandelinian leader immediately ordered an assault, but the horsemen were repulsed with a rapid and accurate fire, as they entered the defile, none of the fugitives missing a single shot, and when the Glandelinians had reached nearly to the defenders, they had lost over forty five men in that assault, and fifteen more in the retreat and retreat.

Three more assaults were made in this manner, until the disheartened Glandelinians had lost nearly forty nine men, of whom twenty were killed or mortally wounded, though in the entire fight the total number of Glandelinians shot down by Evans and the little girls was over 124.

There had been three hundred Gargolians when the chase began and there were only eighty four left altogether when they finally abandoned the pursuit. Despite this harrowing situation, that Evans and the little girls had been in, they were undaunted, and after traveling a certain distance again found the Manleys with twenty officers, with them all talking excitedly.

Curiosity again overcame them, and once again they crept behind some shrubbery, to listen to what they were saying:

"It's just the way as I'm telling you." They heard general Johnston Manley exclaim in a tone as harsh as he could muster.

"Those little brats have overheard the plots, I and my sons were planning, and are now on their guard. I'd like to tear them open for that little brat striking you general Muebaum."

"Just at this moment the leader of the Gargolians, who had pursued the little girls and Evans, came up, and the leader dismounting saluted and said:

"Your excellency those little brats, formed a regular hornets nest for me. They shot down more than two hundred and twenty of my men."

"What's that?" Exclaimed Manley. "You fool. Why did you not try to get around them."

"It was impossible your excellency. They defended a hill which could only be surmounted by a narrow steep pass which they had went up like flying birds. And as fast as we charged, they shot us down like flies."

"Well it makes no difference what you say and I'll have no arguments any under any conditions, and don't start any for no man can contradict me or get the best of men in arguments." Said Manley. "You knew it was dangerous to assault that pass, and ought not to have done it. You were foolish and so there's no use in kicking at your own losses. I was your own fault."

"But by hell you must understand that I never knew that those little girls would shoot." Said the colonel. "It's even unusual to hear of little girls shooting, even a gun without being afraid of it, and these brats fired and without even missing a shot. The man with them only did the loading. Who were they?"

"They are the daughter daughters of one of those blasted Christian general in chiefs, called Robert Manley. Their names are Violet, Jac Joice, Jennie, Angeline, Catherine, Hettie, and Jackie or Daisy. They are criminals against Glandelinians."

"They are called the vivian girls." Said Muebaum Manley. "There has been millions of dollars offered for their capture dead or alive, but now orders are that they must be shot on sight, and those who do so gets the reward just the same."

"Who was the man with them?" Asked the Gargolian leader.

"Colonel Jack Evans." Answered one of the other Glandelinian chieftains. "He is even more dangerous than general Muebaum, and has went through many perils successfully, to save the little girls from us. He even risked his life many times by pulling them successfully through the worst forest fires that followed them at the rate of sixty miles an hour."

"PHE W." Whistled nearly all the generals.

"Much as we hate them and him we nevertheless could take our hats off to them for bravery." Said general Muebaum. "I never heard of a such bravery."

"Oh he is a magician." Growled Manley. "He is even a wolf in his ways, a secondarily a wolf."

"We had better not talk too loud around here." Said one of the officers. "Spies may be around."

"That's true too." Said general John Manley. "And those vivian girls, having escaped, with their guardian may be snooping around here again. All of them made a careful survey of the surroundings, even of the bushes close to them, but as they found nothing, they were not suspicious of being spied upon."

They had not even overlooked the hiding places of Evans and the little girls, but they weren't there, for having suspected this, Evans and the little girls had ascended a tree close by, and so were not seen, as soon the Glandelinians just now thinking that there could not be anybody hiding in the tree.

This time Evans and the little girls had to be more cautious, for there were too many Glandelinians near them to be careless now would mean suicide. All the Glandelinian soldiers were armed to the teeth, and they could fire on short notice. The terrible general Raymond Rith Richardson Federal, was with Manley again, and he continually kept his hands on his pistol holsters.

"The question is what's to be done with those prisoners we have." Said the Gargolian leader. "There is over thirty thousand women and children."

"We will see what is to be done with them." Said Manley. "The Christian armies are advancing with relentless fury, and if we are harassed too closely, we will deliver the prisoners to the sword. There are in the way anyway, and hinder our retreat."

"Seeing another group of officers approaching, and fearing it would soon be unsafe for them, Evans and the little girls started hastily down from the tree, but the limb on which Violet was still seated, suddenly gave way precipitating the little girl to the ground. Evans and the other little girls rushed forward to find Violet lying white and motionless, with the blood streaming from a deep gash in her wrist, near the thumb section. In falling Violet's wrist had struck the sharp edge of a stone, the fall itself having rendered her senseless. At first her sisters, and even Evans stood speechless with horror, and unable to move, then, once dropped on her knees by the wounded child. At this moment the group of Glandelinian generals saw them, and started forward with the fierce expression of demoniac delight, and hatred in their faces, but Evans drew both his guns and cried out:

"Hold on there you damn devils, or I'll kill every one of you who ere you stand. Don't even dare shout for aid."

Seeing the determined look in Evans' eyes, the Glandelinian generals halted, while Violet, as telling her terrified sister Jennie to hold up Violet's arm, prepared to tear her light winter skirt into narrow strips. While the Glandelinian generals were arguing fiercely with Evans, she bandaged up the arm, compressing the artery, by twisting a stick into the firmly knotted ends. Water was soon brought and in a few minutes Violet opened her eyes. Evans finding her unable to walk, lifted her up, but had to carry her carefully for fear of starting the artery again. The cruel Manleys at once sent a regiment of Glandelinians after the fugitives along with twenty of the fiercest bloodhounds. Evans now had difficult times, and now darkness was falling around them the little girls shivering with the dread at hearing the baying of the bloodhounds. They had to hurry on faster now, the crackling roar of rifles startling them. The little girls had gone on ahead, and suddenly he spied four or five of the little girls standing on the edge of a precipice and looking intently down into its depths. They neither saw or heard him, when he approached, and even when he called to them they did not move but kept their eyes fixed on a white object in the valley below.

"What is the matter little girls." He cried as the baying of the hounds grew nearer, and a new fear seizing him. "What are you staring at "What do you see. Is that a stray lamb down there?"

Joice turned her eyes upon him and answered in a hard unnatural voice.

"See a lamb. Our lamb, our sister Jennie."

"What!" cried the wretched man. "JENNIE? YOUR SISTER? WHAT IS SHE DOING THERE?"

Those words seem to recall the unhappy little girl to her senses. She burst into tears and it was some minutes before she could answer.

"Evans," she said, "Jennie, she fell over the precipice. She is dead."

Evans felt as if a sword was driven through his heart. He bade them follow and dashed down the precipice flying from rock to rock, until he stood or rather knelt beside the prostrate child, who lay as if asleep, not a limb being broken, not a scratch or tear on her garments, even the bonnet was still on in her hand. So light and brisk had been her step that it seemed he did not stumble or slip but seemed to have rather flown. As he tenderly lifted her in his arms he was surprised to see her suddenly open her eyes.

"I fell but the thick foliage of the trees I descended into saved me." She gasped as the top was reached, and it was found that she and Violet even could walk. "Otherwise I would have been killed."

Her sisters were overjoyed to see her still alive, and now resumed the retreat thenceforward bloodhounds already being soon following the scent sometimes pausing, sometimes passing each other, their waving tails and their quick energetic movements, showing that they were furious in the extreme, and excited to the highest degree. Now they disappeared behind the far distant trees, the next moment their black bodies shot out again like dark objects, and the other objects seen no doubt were the pursuing Glandelinians.

"We will have to run for our lives," said Evans. "We can take across the bridge which crosses this precipice. Hurry for the bridge the blood hounds are after us."

Evans seized a stick, and while the little girls crossed opened fire at the moving objects, and then crossing himself smashed down the bridge with stones. A few springs brought the nearest hounds to the edge of the chasm, one sprang over, only to disappear into the gulf below.

It was now, and seemed to comprehend all that had passed. His eyes glared with redoubled fury. There was vengeance in his looks, and determination in his attitude. For a moment he surveyed the wild gulf, which separated him from his enemies. The distance was measured at a glance. The bloodhounds heart was bold with rage and despair, and having lost his companion, life was nothing compared with revenge, so running a few paces back from the edge of the chasm, he set his body for the spring.

Club in hand Joice stood upon the opposite bank ready to receive the fierce dog, and she had not long to wait, for with one desperate bound, the bloodhound launched his body into the air, and like lightning passed to the opposite bank. His forefeet only reached it, and his claws firmly grasped the rock, the rest of his body hanging over clutching the cliff. Will he fall? Or will he keep his hold? To Joice life or death depended upon the issue. In another moment the beast would have sprung up and then was he to his antagonist. But that moment was not allowed him, for he had scarcely touched the rock, when Joice leaped forward and struck at his head, again and again. The blows were not well aimed, and though stunned the bloodhound still clung to the cliff. Setting her self for another blow, Joice came too near, and the next moment the claws of the maddened dog were hurled into her shoe. It is difficult to tell what would have been the result. Joice would have certainly been dragged over to death, but at this moment a hand was thrust forward from behind— the muzzle of a pistol was seen close to the head of the bloodhound, a loud crack rang through the ravine, and when the smoke cleared away the dog was seen no more.

Joice with her shoe badly torn, but foot uninjured, was dragged back from the cliff. No sooner had the dog been disposed of, when another powerful dog jumped the abyss landing clear across. It's head was hanging down, its eyes were bloodshot, its breast was flecked with mucus, and its lead colored tongue lolled half way out of its mouth. No sooner had poor Violet and her sisters set their eyes on the beast, when they turned deadly pale, screaming:

"Holy Mother save us. The bloodhound is mad. He's got rabies. The cowardly rascals even set rabid dogs onto us."

There was no escape, for the only escape was where the rabid animal now stood, snapping savagely right and left and howling something fearful. To attempt to pass it meant a sure and terrible death. Beyond was the abyss. Horror was stamped on the faces of the little girls. Evans saw the anguish of the little girls and he resolved to save them if he could.

"Back every one of you little girls." He said in his deep strong voice as quietly as if death did not stare him in the face. "I alone can hold that beast. Do not any of you little girls move until I seize it. Then when I have it securely in my grasp make a get away."

Scarcely had he finished speaking, when the rabid animal rushed at the terrified shrieking little girls. But it did not go far. Evans crying, "With the help of God," took off his thick coat, throwing himself on the foaming beast, hurling the coat over its head, seizing it in his iron grasp, and bashing it to the ground. A terrible death struggle occurred. The dog tried to bite fairly on every side, and if it was not for the thick coat wrapped tightly around its head, its long teeth would have tore the arms and legs of the heroic man, who never for an instant relaxed his hold, and with all his might regardless, alike of the horrible pain, and death that was sure to ensue should the dog bite him, he held the snarling howling brute, until the little girls had reached a safe distance. He then flung the half strangled beast from him, dashing it down the fearful chasm. He escaped unharm, and joined the little girls just in time to see a cavalry squadron dash upon them from the woods, the nearest man making a swoop with his sabre at Violet's head. It was too late to stop the blow. Down came the sabre. Violet screamed, and Evans in horror and terror could not stay the stroke, and in the blindness, which the sudden horror caused, he thought the rascally Glandelinian had killed her. However he and her sisters fired their pistols, so wildly that they moved their assailants down like flies, and during the confusion among the Glandelinians and the remaining bloodhounds, Evans caught the little girl in his arms, and carried away to cover with the other little girls. Evans and the little girls had just time to look at her from head to foot, in an endeavor to find the deadly wound the Glandelinian inflicted, that he surely must have inflicted, when by the yelling cursing Glandelinians with their roaring bloodhounds were upon them again. In the frightful struggle to the death, the man who had made the stroke at poor Violet fell mortally wounded, and the few survivors retreated in terror, before the frightful fury of Jack Evans. He then again looked to find the terrible wound, but not a drop of blood or a scar was to be seen. Thanking God for his mercy he took the sabre of the fallen Glandelinian, and found a single curl cut through. How great the escape. It was as if an angel had turned and de the sabre edge, at the moment it was descending upon her head. She quickly recovered her senses, and from her fright, and now as more Glandelinians were coming they hastened away. Violet now began to feel an intense pain in her wrist, though now the blood had been checked for good. The other Glandelinians with the remaining bloodhounds had crossed the chasm at another point, and so were on the pursue with hue and cry.

Evans felt sure that he would have to combat more of the fierce bloodhounds, and if unsuccessful he and the little girls would be killed.

"They seem bent on our capture this time," said Evans. "They are pursuing us with the utmost determination."

"We could easily dispose of the bloodhounds if they come too near," said Joice. "And they will not capture us. To be captured now means death. At least the Glandelinians will shoot us on sight."

"Couldn't we trick the hounds some way, and lead them off the scent?" asked Hettie.

"How?" asked Evans. "I so no way."

At this moment they came face to face with a an exceedingly wide stream of water. It seemed to stretch as far as eye could reach, and was too wide to swim. Knowing it to be the Rhine, they followed along its shore until they suddenly came to what appeared to be a deep gorge and over two rods wide, with a narrow wooden bridge crossing it.

"Across quick," cried Evans. "You little girls go first. I'll follow and cover your retreat."

The little girls quickly sped across, Evans following close behind. Just as he was half way across the Glandelinians with their baying hounds appeared, and opened a withering fire upon the fugitives.

Those in the lead immediately dismounted, and with the bloodhounds far in front of them, started to cross after them. Evans was soon across, reaching the opposite side, while already forty Glandelinians were on the rickety bridge, yelling and firing. Evans picked up to the surprise of Violet and her sisters, a two hundred pound stone, and hurled it with all his might at the bridge. The huge stone shattered that end of the bridge to splinters, and with a crash of rending timbers, the bridge now completely weakened by the loss of its supporting end, gave way, under the weight of the men precipitating them all into the water below. All these men managed to swim to safety, but this all delayed the pursuit considerably, and by the time they were on dry land on the opposite side, with their dogs, all dripping wet, the fugitives had gained great distances on their enemies. The glandelinians were wild with fury over this, and were more determined to slay the little girls, and the pursuit was resumed with redoubled vigor. The fugitives continued onward, until they came within sight of a large village, with houses close together. To make their escape from the glandelinians now seemed easy, for the village seemed to be inhabited by the Calvinists only. But not such good luck. No sooner had they reached the village, when the population all glandelinian soldiers became suspicious, and jeering remarks were made about them from every house to top. As they were passing through a wide street, an automobile filled with joyriding glandelinians passed them almost knocking the little girls down. Evans pointing his gun at the glandelinian officer who was driving the car, forced him to stop, and pulling him out of the car said:

"Just because we are strangers, in the village, you show such contempt for the traffic regulations. There is such a thing as the rights of pedestrians, but you don't let that worry you. So I'll teach you something!" And he holstered him with his pistols butt knocking him senseless. Persecuted by an angry mob for this, he overhauled a taxi threw its occupants out on their very heads, and forcing the driver to stop said as he helped the little girls in:

"Nobody can stick to the seat of a car, which I want when they're glandelinians, and they have got to be shown that I'm not to be monkeyed with."

The driver was compelled to drive the car southward, and reaching a side street Evans and the little girls got out, only to see a man step up and say:

"The glandelinians don't like you. They say you're dirty little gutter-snipes in among us. Every nut we've seen captured lately are dirty christian children, who works our armies to death. They make me tired."

"Better lie down then, for a little while, and relieve your fatigue, or tiredness,-----and mine." Holy Howled Evans, and he gave the insulting wretch such a blow, that he landed on the side of his head, with his arms thrown in front of him, and his legs sticking up in the air. Evans then hurried on the little girls following. As they kept on Evans noticed that a certain man was following him and the others, and it did not take him long to lay him unconscious on the sidewalk. Another instant came up to Evans and flourishing his arm wildly, and angrily, said:

"You dirty christian dog. You're altogether too fresh. I did not see any sense, in your striking that man down."

Evans was struck speechless, not motionless, and he walloped the man on the head with the butt of his pistol, and then chased him for several blocks, the little girls following. About half an hour later, when Evans and the little girls were inside a circus building, and viewing a performance then going on, there arose a hue and cry outside, and in came a large party of uniformed glandelinians....

"The Vivian girls, with their guardians are in this building." Cried the leader. "They are to be shot on sight. Where are they?"

"Quick before the performers see us." Said Evans.

But they were seen, and the pandemonium in the arena was deafening. By means of a rope, the clowns started off after up after the fugitives who were refuted on a swing board near the ceiling. Before they could escape Evans, had to first show fight, which he did. One after another of the clowns, and other men performers crumpled like doom demons with Evans, but were hurled down to the cloth screen below, some with the loss of front, or jaw teeth, a bruised mouth, bloody noses, black eyes, and even lacerated skins. Even the manager tried his hand at tackling Evans and the Comedians, but though these fellows were strong men, they were no match for Evans, and they were also hurled down one by one.

During the lull, which followed Evans and the little girls, escaped to the dome staircase through one of the dome windows and making to the roof of an adjoining building just as the persecutors soldiers and performers together came in a mass onto the roof of the circus building. One of the soldiers a regular sprinter caught up with Evans, but before he reached the roof of a second building Evans picked up a large pole, and sent it flying like an arrow the force of the blow, sending the man down into the street seven stories below in a mangled heap.

"Quick before it's too late." Was Evans exclamation and the fugit if live fugitives went across the roof like wild deer. Just as they reached the edge of the roof a man in gray uniform appeared, with revolver drawn....

"SURRENDER YOU DOD-CASTED CHRISTIAN DOGS." He yelled. "Certainly." Answered Evans grating by the coat collar and pulled him toward him with such violence, that his gun went flying, and everything flew out of his pockets. "Owing to the fact, that this is the last time you'll bother us, come on up to us and have it over with." And with this he bound and gagged the man and threw him onto the roof of an adjoining building. At this moment the swarm of persecutors appeared, and just as Evans and the little girls dashed away on the roof of a large factory, the soldiers fired furiously, Evans losing his hat, while Violet's dress was riddled with holes. The glandelinian soldiers and performers were pursuing the fugitives with the frenzied fury of demons, and twice it seemed they almost had them. Evans banged the heads of two soldiers together with such force as to render them senseless, hit another over the head with his pistol, brought the head of another against the smocktail, with such force as to make him see a cloud of stars, flung an old mop at another so vigorously as to cause the rag to wrap around the man's forehead, with the stick dangling downward, and striking another on the head with a brick potting

"It's taps for all of you!" The other glandelinians were appalled at the herculean strength of the christian colonel, and as he grabbed a stalwart glandelinian by the coat collar, and used him like a hammer, everything, watch, money, and letters, falling out of his pockets, the performers became afraid. Put the soldiers were only enraged by this, and tried to rush him but he grabbed another soldier, and swung him around like a wheel, creating such confusion, that by the time they recovered themselves, Evans and the little girls were six rods from them, and hastily climbing down into what seemed a stream running through a tunnelway under a building.

Evans dove in first, the little girls with cries of glee following. The sold soldiers were almost as fast as the fugitives, and Evans and the little girls had to shoot some of them down, before they could elude them once more. The chase now became really exciting. They had run though half way of the tunnel pursued by the soldiers who fired in vain, when more performers and soldiers appeared from the other end. Evans saw an opening above him.

"Quick for the opening." He cried. "Quick before it is too late."

Butting the action to his word, he helped the little girls up first, and just as he was about to start up, a swarm of soldiers made at him furiously with fixed bayonets. Evans turned upon his assailants like an infuriated tiger that is cornered, using his arms wildly, striking all about him to vehemently, that he cut several of them down, and caused the others to withdraw a considerable distance back in confusion.

"If the rest of you wish to continue living you will keep your distance." He shouted brandishing his sabre wildly. They however rushed him again with redoubled fury, but Evans out by this time, and with the little girls who waited for him.... He hastily closed the lid over the opening, and drawing forward a mule and carriage placed the mules foremost on the cover, and hurried away followed by Violet and her sisters. The glandelinians tried with might and main to shove the lid aside, and finding that something alive was holding it down they fired volley after volley at the cover, the deafening noise hearing the animal and starting a runaway. Then the lid was shoved aside just as another party of glandelinians came to help them up.

"Which way did they go?" Asked one. "Maybe that way." Exclaimed another.

"Well if they ain't else."

"They must be killed."

"Yes."

"Come!"

And away they went only to see the fugitives scurrying away, leap into an auto and drive off. Another auto was approaching at this moment, and the glandelinians hailed the driver to stop. He did so, and some of the glandelinians got in and away they went. They had almost gained on the fugitives almost running alongside the fugitive machine, when their two tires blew out with a deafening crash, and the car striking the curbing turned over being scarred against a telegraph post, its occupants being severely injured, several fatally. Several other autos were also in the chase but now the fugitive car had passed the outer limits of the village and crossed a railroad track just in time to have their persecutors held back by a sudden and unexpected flight. The just came up. Then a tire of their own machine blew out, and seeing further escape was impossible in the machine, Evans and the little girl, hastened from the car and toward the mountainous country south of them. But then there was no peace for them. Soldiers everywhere were securing the country for the Christian fugitives, headed by general nager himself, and as soon as Evans and the little girl reached a high and precipitous hill they found them themselves trapped for Alandelinians were swimming up on all sides of the hill. Evans and the little girl gave fierce resistance until their ammunition was almost used up, bringing down about two hundred Alandelinians, but it seemed impossible to stop their mad attack. There was in this vicinity a cable wire running across the hills, down to the wide valleyed country to the south east of them.

"That cable is our only means," said Evans who had been making bundles out of twigs of wood. "We can mount that rise there, and by the means of these hand bundles slide down into the valley valley."

"Evans you're a wonder," cried Violet, with delight and picking up a bundle.

"Yes we have thought of it," said Violet. "We owe our deliverance to him."

They all hastened to the point where they could reach the wire, and soon all were shooting down with lightning like speed, knocking down a score of Alandelinians who had reached the summit. Down down they went. Faster and faster, and then the wire hanging lower and lower, toward the ground as they descended, it found themselves precipitated onto the ground, in the valley having passed over mountain after mountain. The Alandelinians were both amazed and angered over this clever escape, and swarmed hastily down the shortest route in full pursuit.

"Quick to the Pandora railroad tracks," cried Evans. "I see a hand car which will enable us to get away."

All the fugitives ran as fast as they could toward the tracks. Several men seeing the fugitives ran forward to head them off, but Evans only yelled "Break you monkeys. How can we see where we are going, when you put these junkies get in out of our way." And the whole three were sent sprawling head over heels. Away raced Evans and the little girl, reaching the hand car which had a solitary man on it. At their approach the man stirred and to be fresh squirted tobacco juice full into violet's face.

"When a given quantity of fluid or semi fluid is projected into the air or ether, the resultant friction causes the molecules of the fluid or the semi-fluid, to separate and form a spray," said Evans coolly wiping his face with her handkerchief.

"I don't get you," said the man as Evans approached him. "Pile off--and take the train--it's a freight." Answered Evans throwing him off head first, the man landing in the position of a bow with his legs half bent on the ground. "You'll no doubt find a cattle car, and you can squirt tobacco juice to your heart's content--it's in spray full where it may."

Then Evans and the little girl jumped on the hand car and started off. Evans had to get off by three times, to throw the switch to get the car off the siding, and soon they were hastening off on the main line. The Alandelinians had come up to the tracks by this time, and saw the fugitives escaping on the hand car. At first the Alandelinians thinking them an easy mark, fired furiously and with apparent good aim; but the little only whistled about the fugitives. Seeing it was in vain, they were becoming despaired, and were about to give up when they saw a freight car pulling in and that the engine was taking water. At once the Alandelinians mounted the tender of the engine.

"Fugitives down the tracks," shouted one of the Alandelinians; to the engine. "They must be slain."

The engineer being a landelinian also had no sympathy for the fugitives and started the engine. The fugitives had just crossed to the middle of a long bridge, when the wild puffing on of an engine started, and glancing behind them they saw an engine loaded with gray coats, heading down upon them full speed.

"Jump little girl before it's too late," he shouted.

They all jumped and were all down, for the engine crashed into the hand car, sending it flying fifty feet into the air. Almost at the same time the little girl had mounted the railing of the bridge, and just as the Alandelinians had swarmed up to the railing, the fugitives were swimming for a long projecting beam from a dredge boat in the river below. The Alandelinians fired wildly and as fast as they could with their pistols, in a desperate effort to shoot them while in the water, but Evans already on the dredge boat fired twenty times, and for every shot a man fell dead or wounded. He helped the little girl up onto the boat, and had helped Violet who was the last when a man on the boat came up and said:

"Who gave you the permission to get on this boat?"

All Evans answered was "I believe you are the captain of this boat."

"Yes I am," cried the man in fury. "Get off you dog, with your pretty kids."

"Well then get off yourself or start the ship a rolling," said Evans sending the man crashing headfirst, against the bulwarks. "We are fugitives and are bound to get away."

Hearing the commotion the men all who were on the boat, came dashing up from the cabin, and attacked Evans, only to meet fine timber-logs, and find themselves in the river. The boat had now been started, but the Alandelinians had pursued in a large gasoline launch, overtaking the boat and now started hauling it in another direction. It again looked as if they were caught, but Evans used his brains once more. They were again approaching the same bridge, and Evans seeing a long pole lying on the deck, raised it, getting it fastened in the stout railing of the bridge, by forcing it through the small openings. Then to the surprise of the Alandelinians, they back climbed up the pole one by one like monkeys, Evans going last. As soon as Evans reached the railing of the bridge, he saw two Alandelinians starting to climb up. He at once dislodged the pole, letting the two soldiers drop into the river. Evans then ran to the long bridge once more, and seeing an empty auto standing on the side of the road at the entrance of the bridge, they ran for it and got in. Just as some of the Alandelinians gained the bridge, how they howled with rage when they saw them whirl away in the auto.

It was now too late to continue the pursuit, but the soldiers decided to wire every road to town in possession of the Alandelinians to watch out for the daring fugitives. But Evans and the little girl had not any intention of going into the more towns or villages just then. At a farm house they managed to secure a good supper, and a lodging and Violet's injured wrist was dressed. The farmer was a Guy Christianian and defeated the Alandelinians; but for the safety of his little ones and his property he pretended to be one of them. He knew that the Alandelinians would undoubtedly come to his place in search of the fugitives, and decided to hide them in case of danger threatened. They had a long and arduous conversation with the farmer before retiring, and the next morning the farmer was startled at the news, which he read at the morning paper after breakfast.

EXTRA!!! ESCAPING PRISONERS, SEEN PURSUED. ESCAPE BY THE THIRTIETH CHASE 7410,000,000 OFFERED FOR THEIR DESTRUCTION.

The Alandelinian girls with their guardian, caught by the Manley twice, escaped through a wilderness, and to a village, and escaped from village by means of tunnel, landing from under building, after being pursued from house to house. They reached mountainous country, and were trapped on a hill, but again escaped by sliding down a cable wire to the depths of a valley below. They then reached the Ma-Hollister and Pandora railroad tracks, fire on hand car killing the man found on it, and though pursuing train overtaken, and smashed handcar, the fugitives escaped and leaped into river, mounting boat, and throwing overboard all the hands. They were then pursued and overtaken by another boat hit by means of a long pole escape again to bridge, solid standing auto, and escape completely. A tall million dollar reward will be offered to any soldier, or Alandelinian citizen who shoots them down on sight. To capture them seems impossible."

The farmer farmer had handed the paper to Evans who glanced at it mostly with scorn.

"They will be making different news before a long," thought Evans to himself. "I'm sure we are not far from the Christian line now, and the sooner we start the better."

He asked the farmer how far the Christian line was.

"That I couldn't tell," he answered. "But the Christian lines are far south from here. I heard the Alandelinians are advancing though to force Manley to fight again or resume his retreat. You could easily find them now."

"Then I think the sooner we start the better," said the little girl.

"It is a terrible thing to see the country for us and so we must go before they get us." In the morning about twenty miles north of the city of Anna Maria where the terrible two days battle with Hunley and the two divisions had raged.

THE ELEMENTS NO MAN:

In this region the elements had gone mad in rapid supreme fury. One of the most terrific typhoons ever seen in America, attaining almost the violence of a tornado had swept in from the sea, traversed the wide extent of the Chesapeake coast, striking Anna Maria with all its hurricane ing ferocity. This was not at all new a subject of shipwreck: it came its destructive power through the extensive regions of the wide forest firemen - a hurricane the wild ocean of fire before it, and maddening seas of fire was pouring on Anna Maria.

And the frightful morning of the pain, the women were the first to see its wild approach, and telephoned to Francis-Atlantic, and Anna Maria of the great threatening danger. Soon the streets were filled with fleeing fugitives, who were hurried by the terrible wind, there being even no time to gather their belongings. Appeals were made by the telegraph station stations, for trains which arrived carrying the half smothered inmates from Anna Maria through the storm of fire and wind to safety, but in the regions of Francis-Atlantic was warning with the enemy it seemed that no aid could reach the town of Anna Maria.

Women and the little girls finding the future good by left hurriedly, the wind outside already blowing a screaming pain, and increasing steadily. They had traversed a certain railway deep in the heart of the hills of Francis Ridge, where a solitary engine was standing. Everybody around the station were in great excitement and alarm, and the engine was quickly being loaded with coal.

Just as the fugitives reached the station, the agent ran to women and almost falling on his knees cried:

"For God's sake men, show your faith in friendship toward us Christians. Save the little children of Anna Maria. They have sent their last call for help."

"It is dangerous for us now to go down there," said women. "I cannot to permit violence for my part I refuse to go. As I cannot leave these little girls out of my sight."

"But think of the thousands of women, and helpless children," screamed women. "The terrible typhoon driving forest fire down on the town of Anna Maria. They say they have the cars. Only want engines."

Violent pleaded with him, and women finally consented mounting the engine itself, as its engineer was afraid to go saying that the line runs into the heart of the conflagration. He immediately started the engine, the little girls helping to get on steam, and then as Violent took the engine, women moved the coal into the furnace. Running the engine was seventy miles an hour he continually set the whistle blowing. He soon reached the outskirts of the forest fire, which driven forward by a "lee" force of hurricane, was now travelling along the trees, almost sixty feet a second. Clouds of smoke black as ink continually surrounded the engine, the railroad bridge was even turning, but they were on fire, and soon reached the town when the inhabitants were about to close hope, or ever when pinning the frightful death that threatened them. At the approach of the engine they cheered, and waited for the long line of freight cars. It only took a short time for the old women and men and children to get into the cars, but in that short time thousands of houses were already burning, the smoke grew so thick that nothing could be seen but the fire, and the air was stifling hot, the terrible wind almost upsetting the cars, while the houses were fairly catching on fire everywhere, and thrown into boiling wreckage by the gale, which drove a blinding blizzard of burning debris in all directions.

Even the few minutes that it took the fugitives to get into the about ten cars, seemed an eternity to women, and the violent girls, who pleaded to them for God's sake to hurry, the fire is spreading rapidly in a terrible inferno, hurry hurry, or it will be too late. The engine was coupled. As soon as all were in the cars, and the doors closed, women started the train once more, and this time it was a wild race for life. The fire had become a horrible furnace for miles, the trees were falling, and the train was racing wildly through a sea of fire, the sheets of flames continually licking against the cars. All but half smothered and now smothered by the heat, women and the little girls kept to the back. Across the turning bridge the train sped with a thunderous roar, and no sooner had the last car crossed it, when the whole bridge gave way a mass of hissing wreckage. Temporarily of fire surrounded the fugitive train, smoke rolled up as if from violent volcanic eruptions, and the fox once themselves began to increase by the fierce speed of the train, the fugitives, half smothered, as it cloaked by the smoke, that found its way inside the doors, were almost shaken off their feet by the wild shaking of the cars. Women frantically by the word being found to put it through the shades of wind fire and smoke was so strong the engine as that as it could go, there were crashing down on all sides as fast as the hurricane could tear them down, and was to the fugitives should one fall across the tracks. For a time the situation looked hopeless to women and the little girls, but finally they left the conflagration far behind, and took a line to the right. But to stop here was suicide, the fire would have hit them. The fugitives having fled northward, to Chambersburg on another fire freight. Four or five times during the night the frightful fury of the tempest only to be delayed by the fire, the fugitive train being stronger, continuing on its way, the fire on the cars having now been dropped by firemen at the first station where a stop could be made. Chambersburg far from wooded country was safe from the forest fire, and here no storm was yet raging being as it seemed far out of the typhoon's path. For the brave women and the little girls were pressed through the streets on the shoulders of some of the men, a crowd of cheering men, women, and children, following them.

The hurricane however struck Chambersburg, but its outer limits only hit her, and after two hours it passed, followed by thunder, lightning, and a wind of rain. Chambersburg it did not rain at all. Early the next morning after all this excitement, women coming to the bank of the McWhorter river saw scores of bodies of dead children, they told together to her in groups of tens, floating in the water. Others lay on the banks, with bayonet stabs all over their bodies or crushed skulls. Skulls of other groups were found that had been washed up.

The Marylanders are killed in the prisoners they have with them. He said to Violet, that means that we must be more cautious."

After traveling for some distance women saw what seemed to be a human being sitting on the ground, while beside her were seven mangled bodies of little children of different sizes, from a very little one, to one as large as a woman. She did not speak or move at first, when women questioned her, but only looked at him with an awful sadness in her eyes.

"There were forty thousand of us," she said. "When women and the little girls had brought her out of the stupor of grief which had overcome her. They took us away without a moment's notice, a band of Russian Uzbeks riding down on our procession, between the Marylandian women, where we were gathered, and took all by the men a little ways off and killed them all with their sabres. The soldiers even killed my little girl by first strangling her, and then by mashing their heads together. They left me alive they said so that I could die of sorrow."

Women and the little girls were trying to get her to home, when suddenly the German with general Dargers, the most dreaded of all Dargers, came riding at their heads. They came upon them with hardly a shout or warning, so swiftly and silently, it seemed as if they rose out of the earth. The Arabian like horses of the curdow galloping down over yoking in their way almost rode upon the fugitives, the Russian firing in an endeavor to kill the violent girls, but missing and shooting the women.

Dargers himself gave a short command, and so quickly she had barely screamed, he pulled little Evangelina onto his horse and in another instant was carrying her in a wild gallop across the plains. Drawing his pistol with the intention of shooting her right there, but he never got the chance. In their infuriated rush the other Dargers had swept past women and the other little girls, and this enabled them to go to a Kingston's ranch. Women proved her marksmanship, by bringing horse and rider down with one shot. Dargers escaped uninjured, but his horse was killed. Before he could recover his feet, women and little Evangelina in his possession. The other Dargers seeing the women only rushed up, but Evangelina's sisters fled, bringing down all the men from their horses, and a horse and rider together, while women simultaneously only had spring upon the horse - a lieutenant trailing him headlong to the ground, where he sprang head over heels.

The little girls then leaped on the horses of the dismounted riders. Women lifted Evangelina on the one he had secured, and away they dashed down the road, with the Dargers after them in full gallop.

Wynn led them two-thirds way, but suddenly changed his course, leading into a field, across a field, of corn, wheat, and cabbage, or where it had lately grown, the landelinians firing without ceasing, and trying with might and main to overtake the fugitives. A captain was pulling steadily on wynn. Both rates raised their pistols, the two shots rang as one, and the captain and horse plunged headlong to the ground. Wynn also falling, throwing him to the ground, the captain's bullet having hit and Wynn and striking his horse instead, but Wynn was behind him and had stood in an instant. Another O'Connell, a sergeant, galloped splendidly on Wynn, and for several minutes the grandest sabre duel, seen elsewhere, the two swords clashing together, wild swings, and thrusts were made, at each other, and in some places to get the best of Wynn, when both fired, both shot in shooting the landelinians from his horse.

A tremendous rain was now on. Across the two bridges raised the fugitives, were hounded on by on a third bridge and leaped into the river, swimming to the other side, and galloped off with their wild persons far to behind. On and on dashed the fugitives, when suddenly an million shots seemed to crash, and pour in front of them, and all their horses sank to the ground, forcing their riders. A big swarm of landelinians came some running up but the fugitives had gained their feet, and were running off into the woods like wild deer. The cause of this sudden surprise, was that the fugitives had galloped into the very outskirts of general John Hanley's lines. Thousands of shouting yelling, landelinians swarmed into the woods, keeping up a perfect fusillade in an endeavor to bring down the fugitives, but the little girls and Wynn darted from tree to tree, thus escaping the storm of bullets. But some of them had received slight injuries, during the surprise. Joie had a scratched forehead, made by a flying bullet, Jennie and Wynn had a wounded right hand, sustained from the fall, and little Evangeline had a skinned knee, and they then only laughed, and taunted the pursuing landelinians with their handkerchiefs. The fugitives went deeper and deeper into the woods, and coming to a narrow ravine, hid in it covering themselves with foliage, so that the landelinians would not be able to find them. Soon the landelinians were swarming above the ravine. A score descended into it and searched every possible part but found no one.

"I told you they'd escape," growled one.
"Well I suppose you'dight in my disappointment," snarled another.
"Well what's the use of arguing over it," snapped the sergeant. "They're gone and we've got to make the best of it."
"Who were they?" asked a first lieutenant.
"The Vivian girls."
"The who?"
"The Vivian girls."
"The who did you say?"
"The Vivian girls, can't you understand?" impatiently. "The little snipe, whose names are, Violet, Jennie, Joie, Angelina, Catherine, Hattie, Daisy, and the guardian Jack Wynn with them."
"Oh I know now," said the lieutenant. "First time I've heard of them. I thought it was a man we were pursuing."
"A man was with them, a christian officer," said the sergeant.
"A christian officer? Ouch we have missed a good opportunity. If we at least got him it would have been a good capture. What was he like? Could you describe him somewhat?"

"He was a six foot man, not exactly good looking, but just the one a man having an interesting face, dark blue eyes, brown complexion, and red or dark brown hair. He is known as Colonel Jack Wynn."
"Oh the whole army knows him," exclaimed the lieutenant. "He's more dangerous than a thousand snipes. It's a serious mistake that we made that we couldn't catch him."

The captain was calling to them, and so the men left, all being greatly disappointed, that their fugitives escaped them so easily, after even riding on down upon them so suddenly without warning.

"Well Violet I guess they're going but yet we'd better be cautious just the same," said Wynn laughing. "But that sergeant certainly had some time to get the lieutenant to understand who you little girls were. He had to repeat it three times."

"Well I know you the best time," said Violet. "I guess it's safe for us to venture forth again."

"If we could only find the christian officer, all would be well."

On account of the old time fire, we were compelled to go far out of our way," said Catherine.

"There is more than one christian officer around," said Joie. "We may have the good fortune of running into one of them."

"I hope so," said Evangeline. "We are feeling unusual excitement these times."

They now crept from their hiding place, and reaching the brink of the ravine looked around carefully.

"There is no one in sight, but just the same we must use care," said Wynn. "Those landelinians are treacherous, and may be hiding behind the trees to fire on us, when we show ourselves."

For a time they stayed where they were, and seeing that nothing occurred, ventured forth into the woods. There were no landelinians about to their relief, it being so evident that they had returned to the camp in disappointment. The fugitives were getting hungry, and now set about to get something to eat. There was nothing to see however, but woods, woods, and woods, and Wynn believed that they were now lost for sure. The woods seemed of endless extent, but they were not discouraged, as they picked up walnuts and cracked and ate them. For over four hours they kept trudging through the woods, and soon came to a large break in the woods, and here was a large farm. A pasture was near, and in it were many cows, and a bull. In the little girls went through the fields, and pasture pasture defying the bull, but it did not do anything, as it was a gentle one, and soon they came up to a well looking farm house. Wynn knocked at the door. A woman came to the door.

"What do you want?" she asked.

The woman called her husband, who came to the door.

Wynn explained the situation.

"A soldier hey. And seven beautiful little girls. Sure come in good christians are always welcome here. No landelinian skunks shows themselves here."

Wynn and the little girls went in. Two children were playing on the floor, and looking around Wynn and Violet and her sisters saw religious pictures hanging on the wall. They got a hearty meal with the family, and then they asked to remain until the morning. The farmer's children were at first shy of the strange visitors, but soon got used to them, and listened what to what they had to tell the farmer, and his wife. They told him and his wife of their experiences, since the battle of little Virginia Francisanna.

"I'm always skeptical of them foires," the farmer said.

"There is always danger of them coming here. But we have missed them so far."

"You have not been bothered by the landelinians?" asked Violet.

"Only once," answered the farmer. "But they never molested us as the christian lines, unknown to them were unusually close, and they were taken prisoners, as it happened that many officers and soldiers belonging to the Abyssinians were in my house at the time, and the landelinians were taken by surprise."

The next morning Wynn and Violet and her sisters, after thanking the farmer and his wife, for the hearty breakfast, prepared to leave, but warned them to look out for the landelinians, as they were scouring the country for him and the little girls, and might come to their houses, and there is no telling what they would do.

"I'll leave before they come," was his rejoinder and then Wynn and the little girls hastened on. They had traveled a short distance along a river front, when suddenly the earth seemed to shake, and a thunderous roar almost stunned them. The fugitives were splashed all over with sticky mud by the distant explosion. Every once in a while a star shell burst in the air and in its lurid light the trees would be silhouetted, against its light like a lattice window. Then darkness. Then something shot past Violet's face, with a horrible scream and whizz. Her heart stopped beating as she ducked, behind a tree. Wynn hearing a noise and seeing dark forms moving. Another bullet cracked in the air, and the victims ducked, but a moan came from their rear. Their hearts stood still as they investigated, finding a graycoat lying on the ground, and by the aid of his flashlight, Wynn saw that he was pressing his hand to his right breast, the finger fingers being covered with blood. Wynn flashed the light on his face, and in its glow a grayish blue color was stealing over his face. He looked up at Wynn and said not recognizing him.
"Well sergeant they've shot me by mistake in the dark. I'm done done. For I was creeping upon Violet when the bullet hit me."

Then he was gone.

"Ouch we will have to hurry out of here," said Wynn. "They're still after us."

For a long distance their retreat was over a muddy road and country, the place being quite swampy.

The fugitives seemed to wash in mud, eat mud, and dream mud. They had never realized that so much discomfort, and misery could be contained in those three little letters; M-U-D. Even during the retreat the ground, the level ground, was mud. It was impossible to run without slipping down, and go a chute, the chutes, into the big Mc-Collector Run river so near by. It was cold, and raining cat's and dogs, mingled at times with hail stones, the thunder was crashing in deafening salvos, the teeth of the fugitives were chattering, from the damp coldness, especially Evans, as the little girls being used to the greatest coldness, felt it not, but Evans felt it from the damp coldness of his wet clothes, clothes, and the gale of wind then he blowing did not help matters much.

As they continued on a blinding red flare lighted up the sky in their rear, then thunderous crashes, intermingled with sharp whistling sound over their heads. A line of bursting shells, lighted up the woods, the din being terrific while the earth shook.

"What's up?" Thought Evans. "The flash flash of those distant guns, the screams of the shells through the air, and the flare of them bursting in a spectacle, that put's a Pains greatest display in the shade."

Then came the constant pup-pup-pup of machine guns, and an occasional deafening rattle of rifle fire, that gave the impression of a huge audience applauding the acts in a circus. Sometimes in the flare of a bursting shell, the bodies of thousands of approaching men, would be silhouetted, against the horizon like huge giants. Then there was a terrible crash of rifle fire, and bullets whistled around them. Then they realized that the shelling was done to light up the woods, so that their pursuers could see them. Every minute now was agony.

The fugitives knew they were running, but could feel no motion below the waste, patches on the ground seemed or seeming to float to the rear as the fugitives were on a treadmill, and scenery was rushing past them. Evans could continually hear sharp dynamite like crashes or glandelinian rifles in the air and in the rear, the crack of bullets in the air about him, and the little girls, caused by passing rifle balls.

Frequently to the right and left of the fugitives, little spurts of dirt would rise into the air, and ricochet bullet would whine on it's way. Evans and the little girls would continually fire in answer, and on his right and left, would stumble and fall. Some would try to get up, while others remained huddled and motionless. A glandelinian lieutenant about fifteen feet to the right front of the fugitives, turned around, and looking in their direction, put his hand to his mouth and yelled something, which they could not make out, on account of the noise of the bursting shells, and rifle firing.

Then as Evans fired, he coughed, stumbled pitched forward, and lay still. The situation of the fugitives was more critical than ever now. Danger even from the shells even threatened them, on all sides. queer looking forms like grey madantles were carrying in all directions oblique to their right and left.

One of the forms seemed to slip, and then roll or "hute that chutes into the river. Then Evans came to with a sudden jolt. Right in front of him loomed a giant form, with a rifle which looked about twenty feet long, on the end of which seemed seven bayonets flashing in the glare, in front of violet and her sisters, who suddenly ducked back in dismay. Evans lunged forward pistol in hand. He tore the rifle from the glandelinian soldier's hand, and shot him down with his pistol. Evans was then assailed by three other glandelinians, the bayonet from the rifle now missing, but he had clutched the barrel in both hands, and was swinging the butt around his head. The little girls could hear the swish of the butt passing through the air. One of the glandelinians gradually circled to the rear of Evans, it being a funny sight to see the glandelinians duck the swinging blow, of the musket butt, and trying to jab him at the same time. The gray coat circling to his rear relieved the butt of the rifle in a smashing blow, on the right temple, the blow, smashing his head like an egg shell. He pitched forward on his side, and a convulsive shudder ran through his body. Evans then got the other two, running his sabre through the throat, of the third soldier, who staggered forward and fell. Then something hit Violet in the left shoulder, and her left side went numb, it feeling as if a hot poker was being driven through her. She felt no pain, just a shock of nervous shock. A bayonet had pierced her from the rear. She fell backwards on the ground, not unconscious because she could see dim objects moving around her. Then a flash of light in front of her eyes, and unconsciousness. Something had hit her on the head. She never found out what it was. She dreamed she was being tossed about in an open boat on a heaving sea, and opened her eyes. The moon was shining, and she saw that Evans was carrying her. All that day since it happened to her, they had been vigorously persecuted by the rascally glandelinians, and now it was nighttime, and though it was late in April close to the last of it nevertheless it was freezing cold, and the ground was white with several inches of snow. They had but progressed a short distance, when suddenly hell seemed to break loose in the form of rifle fire.

The music was hot, and the fugitives dropped down on their bellies in the shallow ravine, they had plunged into, the bullets knocking up the snow in little white clouds, and snapping in the air.

Then the shrapnel butted in. Then panting and out of breath they legged it across the stream, by means of a narrow bridge. Evans and the little girls tearing their hands and clothes frightfully, in getting through a barbed wire fence in a field, but at the time did not notice it, their journey being too urgent.

Then Evans gave the order "Down on the ground and hug it close." Just in time to, because a volley of a thousand muskets skimmed over their heads. Violet and her sisters could see the flashes of their rifles, in the darkness, but the bullets were going over their heads. Then in the full they got up and ran madly on. Again the glandelinians started firing. The bullets were hitting all around them, when bang, they ran smash into another barbed wire fence in the dark and a sharp challenge "Halt who goes there?" rang out.

Then they dropped, the flash of rifles came and then the fugitives lay there with caution. From the roar and explosions of glandelinian shells, it sounded as if raw meat was being thrown to the lions.

"WHICH ONE OF YOU IS CASSELY DAMN ME GET YOUR HELLS T OGETHER, WHEN I SPEAK. COME OVER HERE."

The man called Cassel started to say; "Yes sir." When the maddened officer roared "SHUT UP!" and it seemed as if the lions were once again fed. Judging by the roaring the glandelinian chief must have eaten him. In about two minutes several glandelinians appeared with sea sweat pouring from their foreheads, and their faces were the color of a beat. They looked like wet weathens. Then came the words;

"Of course you don't know anything about it. You are just like the rest. Ought to have a nursery bottle around your neck and a nipple in your teeth. Soldiers, by heck! You turn my stomach to look at you. Win this war when glandelinian generals sent out such simpletons as you Sissies, as I have in my brigade. Not likely. No sir! Tell me what you don't know about the affair, about the Vivian girls, or their guardian shooting down my horse, when I carried one of the Vivian girls off. Speak up with it. Don't be gaping at me like a poor fish. Spit it out!"

Some one stammered;

"Sir I know absolutely nothing."

"THAT'S EASY TO SEE." Roared the officer. "THAT DAMN STUPID FACES TELL ME THAT. SHUT UP! GET THE H---LL OUT OF HERE BEFORE I GRIND YOU UP UP FOR PORK SAUSAGE! BUT JUST THE SAME I THINK YOU ARE A BLACK FACED LIAR JUST THE SAME, AND ARE DEFENDING THEM DAMN LITTLE RAT TOADS OUT OF THE STINKING SWAMPS. BACK TO YOUR LINES. GET. BEFORE I TEAR YOU TO PIECES."

Then all was silent.

The fugitives resumed their flight had gone about half a mile, when a shell came whistling through the air, and burst about three hundred yards to their right. Another soon followed this one, and burst on the edge of the road, about four hundred yards in front of the men. Then the next instant there was a blinding flash, and a deafening report. All that four of the little girls remembered, was that they were flying through the air, and wondering if they would land in a soft spot. On the other side of the road Evans was sitting, rubbing a lump on his forehead, with his left hand, while his right arm was covered with blood soaked cloth, blown against it from somewhere by the explosion. Violet had an awful headache, she vomited, and the skin on the left side of her face, was full of gravel, and the blood was trickling from her nose. Near by an old abandoned ambulance, was turned over into the river and was perforated with big holes, from fragments of the shell. One of the front wheels was still swiftly revolving. The shells were still screaming overhead, but the battery had raised its fire, and they were bursting in the woods about half a mile from them.

Slowly rising to their feet, they felt themselves all over, to make sure there were no broken bones. But outside a few bruises and set scratches they were all right. Realizing that they were in a dangerous spot, and that at any minute a shell might drop on the road and finish them off, they started off across a wide snowcovered field. To their surprise there came a rushing toward them a big surge of glandelinians Glandelinians, with bayonets glistening. They were Gargolian infantry, and in their regalia and respirators, they looked like some horrible nightmare. Evans and the little girls having secured ammunition, and guns from some fallen Glandelinians fired furiously. Evans had a small machine gun, which he used the Glandelinians going down in heaps, but now ones took the places of the fallen. Nothing it seemed could stop that mad rush. The whole gray line blazed like a furnace, bullets screaming a concert about the fugitives. Suddenly Jennie's head seemed to burst from a loud crack in her ear. Then her head began to swim like a top, her throat got horribly dry, her tongue protruded, her eyes stared, and a heavy pressure was on her lungs. The whole stretch of woods and fields, seemed to wind or float in the air. The noise was horrible, she sank onto the ground, needles seemed to be pricking her flesh, the blackness. At the same time there was a tremendous roar, that startled Evans, and the other fugitives, a screaming and whistling overhead, and terrific explosions. Four black clouds of dust and smoke rose up right in the middle of the roads and woods. The shells kept whistling overhead, twenty twenty four of them, and when the smoke and dust clouds lifted, the destruction committed was horrible. Overturned trees, limbs and guns, wagons smashed up, twigs lying all around, and flames spreading in all directions.

The shells had again been meant for the fugitives, but failed to reach them. The road and roadside were spoo spotted all over with debris. The other Glandelinians had continued their attack while Jennie lay unseen unconscious, twice the graycoats had almost reached them, but was driven back by Evans who manned the machine gun with good effect. The fallen Glandelinians were a ghastly sight in their horrible looking respirators. Then all of a sudden they thought hell had broken loose, shells started bursting in a sonorous salvoes, and all around them. Evans picked up little Jennie and the machine, gun and the other little girls following, they ran madly and blindly across across the fields, stumbling into muddy fields or holes, and falling full length over prostrate prostrate fences. Groping blindly they had last reached a village, or what used to be a village, before the concussion of the battle of Glorinda Franciscana razed it. For the sake of Violet and her sisters, two of which were severely injured, Evans decided to use peculiar cunning, to avoid all sentries, tents, and so on, not like those of the Christians, because if they were seen here by their foes they would face awful destruction. The thought of the impending fate made them sadder, the cold sweat coming out in beads on their faces.

At the beginning it was fun, now it was "Hell". On their left in the darkness, they could make out the shadowy forms of trees, crawling on their hands and knees, and crouching with fear at each shell burst, they finally reached an old orchard, and then again they started madly away, through a cemetery, falling over wooden crosses, smashing some, and trampling others under foot in the pitch darkness, while far behind them came the Glandelinians, with bloodhounds in full pursuit.

The fugitives now started on a madder race, down the ruined street of the village, amid the bursting shells, minding them not. Coming to a ruined house they halted to make a stand, and pup-pup-pup went the machine gun. Evans Evans had in his possession, and the front line of the graycoats seemed to melt away. The survivors wavered, but once more came rushing forward. Down went their second line.

The machine gun was taking an awful toll of lives. They again tried to advance, but the machine gun mowed them down. Dropping their rifles and their bombs the remaining pursuers, broke and fled in a wild rush, out of range of the gun. Being out of ammunition Evans had to abandon them the machine gun, and the flight was resumed. When they had just reached the middle of the village, they saw at about three foot intervals, standing a big Gargolian guardman with his rifle at the aim. The man in front of little Evangeline was looking down in his right. This fellow might have under any circumstances, been handsome, but when she viewed him from the front of his rifle she had by the goblins of child hood, mad imaginations relegated to the shade. Then came a flash in front of her, the flash of his rifle, and her head seemed to burst.

A bullet had hit her on the left side of her face, about half an inch from her eye, and it felt to her as if it had slashed her cheek bone. She screamed and put her hand to her face, and fell forward, hitting the ground and kicking her feet from the fury of the terrible pain. She thought she was dying. The blood was streaming down her face and the pain was awful. The bullets were cracking overhead. She staggered to her feet. Another bullet caught her in the left shoulder. It did not hurt much it just felt as if someone had punched her in the back, and then her left side went numb, her arm dangled like a rag. She fell forward in a sitting position. She then dragged herself to her feet, and screaming rammed on soon reaching her sisters and Evans who had been looking for her, stumbling over wreckage, tearing her clothes to rags, and lacerating her hands and legs. Crack another bullet caught her this time in the right shoulder, about half an inch away from her neck. Then she fainted. When she came to she was soaked with blood, and a big flap from the wound in her cheek, was hanging over her mouth, and the blood running from the flap choked her. Out of the corner of her mouth she tried to blow it back, but it would not move. She tore off the strips of her ragged dress, and tried with one hand to bandage her face, to prevent the flow, having an awful horror of bleeding to death, and she was getting very faint. It was tedious to snare ludicrous attempts of bandaging with one hand. The pains in her wounded shoulders were awful, and she was getting sick at the stomach. All the while hell was loose. An intense shelling was on, and on the whole her position was decidedly unpleasant.

When Evans and the other little girls found her they were horrified, but he bandaged her wounds, and now he was consumed with uncontrollable rage, and cursed the Glandelinians. A Glandelinian wave composed of Gargolians a magnificent sight passed, all looking for the fugitives.

One young graycoated soldier leaped into a shell hole, where the fugitives were refuge, but Evans fired, the Glandelinian leaping into the air, the rifle shooting off his hands as it exploded, landing about six feet in front of him bayonet first, and sticking in the ground the butt trembling.

The Glandelinian made a complete turn in the air, hit the ground, rolling over twice, each time clanking at the earth, and then remained still, about four feet from Evans, in a sort of sitting position. A dark red smudge was coming from his through his shirt, right under the heart, the blood running down his knees, making a horrible sight.

Evans was unable to leave this refuge, and so had to stay all night, the little girls who were wounded began becoming unconscious. When they awoke they found themselves in a snowy white beds, lying by threes, as three beds were the only ones owned by the farmer, who had rescued them, when called upon by Evans, who went a long ways to find a kindly farmer.

It was difficult to say how long the fugitives had to remain with this farmer, who though a Glandelinian soldier in disguise, and a fugitive himself, from the Christians was a kind man, and revealed his character, for the injuries of the three little girls were not as severe as they looked.

Three days later however they were let off again looking for one of the Christian armies. But no sooner had they strolled forth, when there came from every side, news of Glandelinian surprises and alarms. The Gargolian Curdes rendered contemptuous, and desperate by Manley's great defeat at Anna-Maria G, Glorinda had not ceased their ravages against the Christian towns, and cities, and even after Anna-Maria, Glorinda, when their victory there made the Christians full masters of that section of Calvernia.

It seemed now as if the Glandelinians had mustered their strength for a decisive series of revengeful blows, against the Abbeinnians and Angelinians, and the war storm threatening at Francis-Atlanta, was more threatening than ever. In from the southwest they came, unseen, unheard, penetrating the whole country, striking without warning, often where least expected, and no one knew when a hand of graycoated Glandelinians armed for slaughter, might not suddenly appear as if by magic from the apparently solitary wilderness around. No families in the threatened towns, could go to bed at night with the assurance that they might not be aroused, before dawn by smoke, flames, earthshaking explosions, musketry firing, thunder of cannons, and by the unearthly shrieking devil yell of the savage Glandelinians.

Evans and the little girls had no sooner resumed their journey, than there came word by other fleeing fugitives, of massacres, and of burning of towns on the Calverinian frontier, and later came similar tidings from the Angeline Run valley, through which other portions of Manley's army was advancing toward Francis-Atlanta. That night Evans and the little girls sought shelter in an abandoned barn, and had no sooner laid down in the loft, when Evans heard a slight creak, from the door of the room below. He looked in time to see it swing open, and three graycoats appeared in the doorway, each one behind a rifle, whose muzzle was instantly turned toward some expected sleeper.

lying on the floor. Surprised into dumbness, his gaze turned toward the window opposite the door, where the oiled paper that had served instead of glass had been swiftly and silently cut away with a knife and three savage heads appeared above the window base, each shining eye directed along a different rifle barrel, toward a prostrate child, several of which had also been in the barn, before Evans and Violet and her sisters took refuge there. Before Evans could form a thought the six rifles blazed forth in concert, and in an instant later the room below was filled with smoke, screams of pain, and shouts and furious curses from the Mandelinians, followed by a terrible chorus of piercing war screams from outside the barn, which had showed that the Mandelinians who had crept up so silently, were in large numbers.

Evans awakened the little girls, who whispering to them of the danger, and he and the little girls started no longer, but sprang up into the loft, and ran wildly to a little window at the end of it. Evans thrust out his head and looked down. This little window was over the one through which three of the savage Mandelinians had fired into the room downstairs down downstairs. He saw three other Mandelinians aiming in through the lower window, while the first three talking in in whispers among themselves, were reloading their rifles.

Others were shrieking their warwhoop, and brandishing their sabres and rifles, with which they were to complete the work begun with the rifles. Up from the ladder hatchway, amid the noise of the heavy bodies falling, and of the refuge men inside rushing to their arms, and yelling and screaming of Mandelinians, came the sound of another volley, fired probably through the doorway. Evans drew his head in, while the little girls waited with wildly beating hearts, wondering what to do, and fearing to look back toward the hatchway.

hatchway lest they might see the savage Mandelinians rushing up after them with gleaming sabres, and upraised musket butts. But none came. The noise from the room below, indicated, that sabres, daggers, and guns had business enough down there as it were, and after what seemed a space of several minutes, Evans cautiously looked out of the window again. He saw now but one Mandelinian, and that one soon disappeared through the lower doorway, into the room where his fellow comrades were completing the assassination of the unprepared fugitives.

The hideous shrieks of triumph, that came up through the hatchway, told clearly enough that victory was with the attacking party, and that the bodies of the child victims were being slashed open.

Suddenly Violet's blood turned cold. A sound of sharp eager grunting detached from the general hubbub below arose, immediately beneath the hatchway. A swamy hand appeared through the opening, grasping the loft floor against which the ladder rested. The little window at which Evans and the little girls stood was neither glazed or papered.

Each went out through it feet first, one by one, hung for a moment by their finger fingers to the ledge, then dropped to the ground below, fell on their sides, scrambled to their feet, turned their back to the house of shrieking laughter, and ran across the snow covered field, toward the nearest woods. Though the direction in which they went took them further from the Christian lines or armies, they nevertheless did not stop or turn on reaching the woods, but ran straight on, as fast as the irregularities of the ground would let them, their only thought being to put the greatest distance, between themselves and the yelling murderers behind them. After a long run they stopped for lack of breath, and began to consider their situation, as well as the rapid beating of their hearts, would allow them to do. Their shoes were badly torn, their feet suffering from the contact with stones covered out of sight by snow, twigs, roots, and the rough bark of fallen branches.

Little Evangeline alone had been separated from the rest, in their hurried flight, and a slight sound close at hand that of an instant movement among bushes suddenly drew her glance. From a mass of laurel, near the ground, gleamed a pair of eyes, directly at her on a level with her own. She started back thinking they might belong to a wild cat, wolf or some other crouching animal, but instantly the owner of the eyes swiftly arose, and stood erect from the bush, a fearful Kurdish Omari.

Evangeline turned, and ran cowering back one look, in which she saw the devilish Mandelinian, hurl his rifle after her, having no time to fire, as the gun was not loaded. Evangeline fell forward on her face, just in time to feel the end of the gun itself, which flew through the air like an arrow or arrow directly over her head, and then lodged in a tree trunk in front of her. The Mandelinian abandoning his intention of remaining in the bush, for which he doubtless, had his own reason, now glided after little Evangeline who had not half risen, when she felt the Omarians 2668. fingers grasp her neck in a choking grasp, and saw his sabre describe a rapid circle in the air in preparation for its deed into her back. The poor little girl, with a despairing look, saw the Mandelinians implacable faces, when the stillness of the woods was suddenly broken, by a loud detonation. Something dug into the Omarians' soldiers' breast, a horrible grimace distorted his face, a fearful cry came from his throat, his dagger sabre blow wide, and he leaped clear over Evangeline, letting go of her throat, as he went. The next moment he lay sprawling face downward some feet away. He stiffened convulsively, and never moved again.

Evangeline, looked toward the direction whence the shot had come, and saw Evans and her sisters approaching on the run. They had now traveled a certain distance, without further trouble, when a man approached them, shouted to them a warning to be on the look out for the Mandelinians, giving an account of how a party of Mandelinians had shot fifteen refugees in an abandoned barn, had thereupon gone to the Campbell's Orphan Asylum on the Mc-Holleston Run, found him and other men there with hundreds of children, and first made their presence there known by a sudden deadly storm of rifle balls. In the smoke and confusion he had made his escape unseen for the chimney chimney, which he had ascended by great muscular exertions, while the massacre was proceeding in the rooms below. He had dropped from the roof, and fled to the Angeline Run valley where he had given the alarm, which he now was engaged in spreading.

Under the guardianship of Jack Evans the small party of fugitives turned presently from the road, into the pine forest, proceeding some miles in silence, and then emerging on clear spaces, skirting swamps, and advancing over ground, that became more and more thickly covered with the April snows.

At last in the midst of the woods Evans held his fingers to his lips and they all stopped, for from a distance came the sound of a coarse voice, singing in maudlin tones, a tuneless song.

Evans and the little girls walked cautiously forward, in single file, and soon a low one story building came into view, among the trees. Further back half a mile off was a enormous sea of tents of all sizes. The howling of the song came through a small unglazed window of which the glass had been shattered out.

"I will look through the window, and see what is going on," said Evans, and did so and crouching down beside the window, and motioning to the little girls to do likewise he whispered:

"There has evidently been a battle some where. Sixteen Mandelinians are lying on the floor with their heads, arms or legs bound in bloody bandages or rags. Another is lying near them dead drunk, as his position shows, an officer is sitting on the floor also drunk, it is he who is singing. Two others are playing cards, another officer is having his back to the door, a lieutenant is facing it. The keeper of the place is lying asleep on the bar, and his wife is behind it peering at potatoes. If we are speedy we shall only have the two officers and the woman to deal with, and as she has seven boys here, there is an opportunity to dispose ourselves."

"Then let us go in at once," said Violet. "I'm game and so are my sisters."

"Softly," quoted Evans. "Let us all understand what we are to do. I've plied my fingers on the battle fields many a time, and having been a pugilist can do all these men up in a fair fight or foul. A door is unbarred we can all burst in at once. As that Arabian looks the strongest. I'll deal with him first. I'll strike him down with my rifle butt, and you little girls can be ready to shoot if he attempts to rise. Then I shall take care of the rest. But keep your eyes peeled on the woman behind the bar. If I'm not mistaken she will be the worse of them all."

Then he and Violet each looked through the slit to get a view of the chosen field of battle. Then they stepped around to the door so softly. All made a move to rush but started back on being confronted by the captain and the lieutenant who alone stood with pistol raised doubtless put suddenly on their guard by the sound of footsteps.

Evans was the first to recover from surprise. He made a swift lunge at the captain who which caught that person in the neck, almost breaking it, and sent him flying back into the room. Evans leaped after him the lieutenant turning to shoot, the Christian officer with his pistols, but Evans waived himself of this moment to bring down his rifle butt heavily on the rascal's unkept head. The lieutenant did not fall, but after staggering a moment, during which Evans reversed his weapon, turned to shoot, the latter uttering a savage curse the while, he thus opened his mouth wide, and Evans thrust the rifle of his muzzle of his rifle therein, and forced the "landelinian lieutenant" rapidly backward into the groggery to the very farthest corner, thereof pinning him therein with the rifle muzzle in his mouth.

"Drop the pistol or I'll fire you dirty "landelinian stunk." Cried Evans and the glandelinian officer perceiving his disadvantage, let Evans kicking the pistol toward Violet who picked it up. Jennie herself the 1 gallant little heroine that she was had been raining blows on the head of the captain, who now staggered, and gave up without protest leaving him free to draw the woman's attention from Angeline who was forcing one of her sons to change clothes with her, making him take them off from behind the counter. Of the sixteen prostrate men the drunkenest one sleep on through the fog, fray, the gory headed rascals, opening their eyes and looking on with apathy, while the proper men got down off the bar, and looked around for some weapon, all alike to take a hand.

At this moment Evans who continued to hold to the ferocious 1/2 lieutenant against the wall, felt something smooth slip into his left hand, he heard from Catherine "It's your to guard Evans dear." Evans saw at a distant glance that it was a small plan of a fortification, and thrust it into his waste pocket. The proprietor of the place had now picked up a fowling piece from a corner, and was aiming it at Evans, with a curse. It was knocked up by Hettie, who ten fell on it's holder, and was in a fair way to beat out his brains, when the woman seeing her spouse in danger abandoned her contest with Violet, and bounded phanter like at Hettie.

She lodged the point of her knife in the woman's cheek, and drew it out for a second blow, but did not need to as Violet brought the woman down with a bullet wound in the shoulder, and before she could rise Hettie had sent her the woman's husband reeling with a final blow, and had come to the aid of Violet, knowing that the latter had more than a match in the woman.

Hettie placed her feet on the woman's hair, which was lying about her head, and put the muzzle of the proprietor's rifle she had snatched, against the woman's forehead, and told her it was her custom to make short work of cut-throat she-devils, of camp following buzzards.

So she lay still, glaring and phanting. They now all had disguises on except Evans..... And Jennie entering the groggery, aimed both her pistols at the cowering lieutenant, and told Evans to disguise himself which he did. Then with rifles and pistols kept ready to shoot, they all backed out of the place, and then away they went scurrying to get away, before the two officers could run to the camp, to gathering party.

They had just left the woods when with great fury a "landelinian officer suddenly sprang from behind a tree, and would have thrust his sabre into Evans breast had he not quickly leaped aside. Furious in turn at so sudden and violent an onslaught, Evans caught the sword with both hands, near the guard wrenched it from the Glandelinian officer, and struck the latter heavily on the head with the hilt. The major fell leaving a curse unfinished and lay quite motionless on the ground. After a moment during which every suddenly appearing glandelinian, looked startled, another officer stooped over the fallen superior commander, felt his head and chest and said looking up

"He's done for. The blow has killed him."

Evans and the little girls had not waited to see the following issue, and sped on their way and had not gone far when they heard a shout behind them;

"Murder. Murder. Stop those fugitives."

On they went while the hue and cry gathered behind them, followed by a clattering of volleys, and a storm of bullets whistled about the fugitives. The pursuing crowd of glandelinians looked to Evans as he glanced back like a multitude and at its head crying stop that man, and the little girls with him louder than any other was general Federal himself.

All of a sudden a swarm of men armed with bludgeons rushed upon Evans and the little girls. Evans had no mind to make his bed in flat ditch, hence he met the middle rascal, with a violent kick in the belly, and getting instantly between two others, shot out both arms simultaneously, clutching at their throats. There was a sharp quick fight, and the rascals were beaten off. Evans and the little girls continued their retreat, without danger of further pursuit from the other glandelinians. But nevertheless their luck was none the better. Evans believed that they were over a hundred miles away from any christian army, and within the heart of the country in possession of Manloys armies. Evans in reality for the first time in his life was completely flabbergasted. He did not know what to do. The enemy was literally hounding him and the little girls, and to make matters worse forest fires were between him and the christian armies. Advertizements were even sent to every village still in the possession of the glandelinians, about the escaping fugitives, and so it was not safe to approach these regions, and indeed in fact, and without any dispute, they were not really far from the christian line, but in the heart of the regions in possession of the wretched damnable glandelinians ever living.

WH WHAT FOLLOWS.

Violet and her sisters were becoming discouraged, and filled with despair, and it is probable they would have given up hope, if they did not trust in their guardian Jack Evans. They were now in complete disguise. Evans as a glandelinian captain, and the little girls as boys, who lived and wallowed in dirt and mud. But then there were many glandelinians who could read through the clearest disguises made, and so the utmost caution had to be used. The "landelinians" were bound to kill the little girls under any conditions to satisfy Manloys terrible anger, and so they had to be careful. They were now going through an extremely dense forest, trees on each side of the road, being almost only three feet apart from each other. It was a terribly dark night, bitterly cold for so late in April and a blizzard was setting in on the wings of a fearful gale.

Noticing the rising storm, Evans decided to again seek for shelter. They had traveled for a long time on reaching a clearing in the forest, and were going toward it, when all of a sudden a sharp challenge rang out; "Halt where you are. Don't advance a step or we will get killed." Said Jack Evans. "Duck behind the trees."

Violet and her sisters did so.

"Who goes there?" Again cried the sentry.

No answer followed the challenge and so the guard fired his musket in the direction where he had heard the approach of the fugitives. Several camp fires suddenly flared up and men were seen running toward the sentry who had fired the shot.

"I heard something suspicious." Said the guard. "I challenged, but got no answer."

"I may have been a wolf." Suggested one.

"No I heard voices as soon as I challenged." Answered the guard. "It was a man. I also saw the figures of a little boy, which disappeared before I challenged the second time."

"You don't say." Exclaimed another. "A boy with children out in the woods at this time of the night. It may have been that Jack Evans and the Vivian girls with him in disguise. We'll have to organize a searching party."

In a few moments a score of torches were flaring and knowing their danger Evans and the little girls, hastily climbed the trees, behind of which they had been hiding and just in time for the searching party came swarming all around.

"I see footprints in the snow." Cried a man. "It ends to this tree."

"This way men." Shouted the one leading the search. "They have climbed the tree."

"Chop it down." Advised one.

"No fire into the branches a all of you men." Said the leader.

"Take aim."

The men obeyed.

"FIRE."

There was a series of deafening crashes, from their rifles that resounded, in the woods in dying echoes, but no result came from the volley.

"Funny." Said the leader. "That they did not fall down."

"All the men fired with apparent good aim." Said a sergeant.

"I know it." Answered the leader.

"Climb the tree somebody." Suggested someone.

"Not me." Said another.

"Nor I." From a third.

"No need of climbing it." Said the sergeant. "They are the Vivian girls all right. They have the ability of climbing from tree to tree like monkeys. And that is just what they have done."

"Then it is impossible to capture

"Then it is impossible to capture them in this darkness." Said the leader. "Back to the camp every one of you. I'll have the woods raked for them in the morning. We'll get them never fear." The sergeant was right in his statement. Evans seeing that it was discovered by the tell-tale tracks in the snow that he and the little girls had climbed into the tree, and knowing the consequences that would follow, told the little girls to follow him, and they swung from branch to branch till they reached the large tree opposite the one they had climbed, and from there they had climbed down to the ground, undisturbed by their pursuers, and skipped away in the darkness.

"It certainly was a burrow escape." Said Evans. "Gosh, we ran into a Glandelinian trap for the darkness. I wonder!" "We will have to get out of the woods before to-morrow morning." Said Violet. "They'll scour the woods for us, and then we will be killed surely this time."

"We'll get out of these woods to-morrow before to-morrow never fear." Said Evans. "If only we could find our way to the Christian lines, all would be well. But the trouble is we are lost in a wilderness with the enemy all around us, in fact we are in the heart of the country fully in possession of the enemy."

"Oh Evans is not that a large town burning yonder?" Asked Joice.

"And do my eyes deceive me or what is that going on in front of a stone building?" Said Violet.

"It's up to me to find out." Said Evans, and advancing a few hundred feet he clapped his glasses to his eyes. He suddenly uttered an exclamation, and telling Violet and her sisters to follow him he darted forward.

Drawing close to the house they were driven to just an anger at what they saw. Jammed close up to the corner of a large door of the house, was a terrified child, a little girl dressed in a white dress, with blue embroidery on the di edge but now showing yellow in the glare of the distant flames. She had on a purple waist and a blue Calvinian bonnet and she was standing almost bowlegged from her fright and bewilderment. Standing close to the terrified child, with crossed gun was a fierce looking Quarian Curde, and Evans saw the doll belonging to the poor child sticking on the muscled bayonet.

The Glandelinian girl was pale, her face sticking in the bayonet, and the terrified expression of the poor child infuriated Evans to the highest pitch.

"Damn him for a human devil." He muttered dropping on his knees and aiming his rifle. "I'll send him to the home of his kindred."

There was a flash a loud report, and the Glandelinian dropped his gun, staggered for a moment, and fell headlong to the stone pavement, there was a convulsive shudder through his body, and then he lay still.

The child was so terrified to move, but felt relieved when she saw Evans with six beautiful but dirty looking boys approaching.

She saw his uniform which was gray, but the smoking rifle, and the puff of pug faced expression as he glanced at the prostrate body, made her realize that he was no Glandelinian.

Evans kicked the prostrate Glandelinian out of his way, took the doll from the bayonet, and then approached the poor trembling little girl. Violet and her sisters were filled with pity at the sight of the piteous little figure, and as Evans held her in his embrace, and felt the wild throbbing of her little heart, the child was fully convinced of his good character when he said to Violet and her sisters:

"Quick Violet and your dear sisters, let's get out of the town before the Glandelinian skunks come to investigate the reason of the shot. They'll get us sure if we don't hurry."

They all hurried off at once and none too soon for a swarm of Glandelinians appeared. A number gathered about the dead body.

"Damn that Jack Evans and the vivian girls." Told the leader. "This is his or their work. They have just fled the town after killing our general. After them. KILL THEM ON SIGHT."

"It's a bullet wound in the right temple." Said a sergeant. "Come boys I'll lead the chase."

"Quick whispered Evans who was carrying the still frightened child, who was now weeping. "You little girls run on ahead and see that your pistols are in good condition. Here I trust this child with you for if those Glandelinians come too near I'll have to deal savagely with them."

Violet and Joice took the child and they ran as fast as they could Evans bringing up the rear. The Glandelinians hopped by the light of torches were following fast, the sergeant in the lead. He saw the fugitives in the lead; and yelled:

"There they go boys-----" But that was all the further he got for there was a sharp report from the rifle Evans carried, and the sergeant fell dead with a bullet between the eyes. His fall confused the pursuing Glandelinians, but they recovered, and while some remained behind behind to carry the dead sergeant back toward the lines, the rest hurried on after the fugitives, and began to gain swiftly on them.

Suddenly there came eight wild flashes, eight reports as one, and eight Glandelinians, one a lieutenant sprawled in their death agonies. Again, and again, and still again came the sharp flashes and the reports and eight Glandelinians fell each time. Twenty eight Glandelinians were literally shot dead, with the other fall on, mortally wounded, and the survivors darting behind the trees, started a roaring fusillade in an endeavor to bring their dangerous fugitives down, but were unsuccessful, as they themselves had fired from behind trees at their Glandelinian foes.

"Good gracious such sharpshooters, and in the dark mind you." They heard a Glandelinian officer say. "Be careful men, work yourselves from tree to tree, and don't expose yourselves by all means."

"But working ourselves from tree to tree, will not do much good captain." Said a lieutenant. "The fugitive will do the same thing and more quickly, and only shoot our men down."

"How far distant are they?" Asked the captain.

"About five hundred yards."

"And shoot with such good aim as they did?"

"Yes sir."

"And I thought that there were only seven of the vivians?"

"There are six captives. They are disguised as boys."

"But who is the other little girl with them?"

"I did not see any extra little girl with them sir."

"Well I did." Said the captain. "She was attired in a white dress, with blue trimmings, pink stockings, purple waist, and blue bonnet. Her hair was brown."

"Why that is Francis Angeline Smith." Exclaimed the lieutenant in astonishment. "She was to have been put to death by that soldier whose body we found on the stone street, in the village. The refugees have rescued her curse them."

At this the captain flew in a rage.

"THEY MUST BE CAUGHT AND SHOT." He roared. "They must be caught and shot. Fire men advance from tree to tree. We can get them better, in this fashion than any other way. Those little green toad snakes, and centipedes, gutter-snips, and gull gutterslops, called the vivian girls-----"

A shot struck him right in the chest. He wheeled around, staggered backwards, and then plunged forward on his face.

"One of them shot me." He managed to gasp. "I'm done for. Revenge me, revenge me."

The lieutenant lieutenant stooped over him.

"Are you hurt badly captain?" He asked.

"Yes shot in the lung."

The lieutenant gave an order and seven men rushed forward to grasp the captain when again when again came the flashes, and the lieutenant and soldiers, sank to the ground severely wounded.

"Damn but this is the limit." Grinned the major brandishing his sabre.

"Hey you fools over yonder. We demand a truce until we go get our wounded officer's out of the way. Give us a truce do you hear?"

"Nothing doing." Answered Evans. "If we demanded a truce you would laugh in our faces. You dirty insolent rascals that you stinking skunks are to insult the vivian girls as you do. If you yourself even expose yourself I'll shoot you too. We mean to escape and shall you damn yourselves of little children."

"But-----"

"Don't yell for truce again."

"Ha, ha, ha." He heard a childish voice pipe out. "Getting afraid of us now ain't you. Asking us for a truce. We give none to those who murder and persecute the helpless. Ha, ha, ha, too hee." Then major fairly roared at this insult. But he knew that he and his men were caught at a disadvantage and so did not know what to do. But he shouted out:

"I'm going go! going to send a party out to the fallen officers under a flag of truce."

"Do so at your peril." Answered Evans.

"And we'll fire just the same." Cried Violet. "We know what you want. To send men back to the camp to get reinforcements."

"Oh ho-ho!" Said the Glandelinian major. "They have us at their advantage. We might as well go back."

"Nothing doing on that." Said another officer. "We are instructed by Manley to get them little snips, and if we retreat before eight persons, when our number is in four hundred we will be charged with stumped cowardice."

"Well then colonel Jansinia 'organ what shall we do then?"

"Promix Promix them their freedom if they'll allow us to get our wounded officers and soldiers away." Advised a lieutenant.

"Aho there." Stated the major. "Allow us under a flag of truce to carry away our wounded officers, and we'll allow you to go unmolested."

"You don't say." Same the answer with dr dorisio. "Why we don't need that privilege. We can get away in spite of all that. We only want to fight that's all and see how many of you we can put in the base hospital or in perdition where you rightly belong. No we refuse to comply with your request. It's only a trick to get the best of us. Don't ask us again."

"Advance men to the attack then." Cried the colonel. "Give them hell if they won't listen to reason. We'll show them."

THE TERRIFIC BATTLE WITH THE FUGITIVES.

Forward rushed colonel Morgan, and his advanced companies dodging from tree to tree, and right among them screamed the bullets from the fugitives. Forward without slackening the Glandelinians rushed, some scaling trees in order to shoot down the fugitives, at some firing from behind trees, but those scaling the trees fell struck by bullets, but lieutenant Montgomery Hendon, and Captain Dick Whither had almost gained on the fugitives, who were also dodging from tree to tree, when the two Glandelinian officers fell in death death before the volleys of the fugitives, while his almost triumphant cry "Push on my brave lads, the fugitives will soon be killed killed," still rang in the ears of his Glandelinians. Montgomery men had there upon retreated, and thus the fugitives warned of the very first serious movements of their foes were enabled to concentrate themselves behind still stouter trees, always keeping the little girl rescued by Evans close to the ground, so the storm of bullets from the assailants would not get her. Morgan's advance followed a curving course among the trees, man falling all the while while from the fire of the separate fugitives fugitives who kept on firing as they dodged from tree to tree.

Morgan's first lieutenant McWhither Humphreys climbed a tree to get a better aim at Jack Evans, but a shot hit him in the eye and he fell to the ground dying on the spot. Seeing the impregnability of the series of barriers, to his large force, and the rapidity with which that force was depleted by the terrible fire of the fugitives, colonel Morgan wondered and cursed. Captain Hendrick and Major Steele were clamouring their men to patience, and directing them whither to return the fire of the fugitives. Morgan ordered a score of men to climb the nearest trees, and fire upon the fugitives. Upon the fugitives, Hendricks Steele, Tom McAllister and many others rushed yelling savagely. Steele sprang behind a tree and aimed his gun toward the flashes coming from the fugitives but without firing, he suddenly stepped back with a sharp cry, and holding up one of his hands to look at it, centering his gun wholly to the other. Where three fingers had been there were now three crimson stumps. Hendricks and McAllister darted behind a ha trr tree. As Hendricks was about to shoot, a ball tore its way to his heart, he lowered his rifle took a swift look of pain, staggered a few feet backwards fell with half his body on a log and died there almost instantly. While the ball continued in the woods the fugitives fired a simultaneous volley, bringing down eight men at one time. Gate, Dearborn, and several of his men fell also and the Glandelinians seeing this desperate resistance now became discouraged. They now made a simultaneous rush expecting to overcome the fugitives, but there was a flash, followed by flashes again and again, and then the smoke arose Evans and the little girls got a distinct impression of small gaps in the gray columns, of graycoated soldiers lying on the ground in various positions, some writhing and grimacing, some perfectly still, some pierced and bleeding, some with visible wounds. These all were looking astonished, and were trying to retain or recover the regular formation of their lines. Some of them fired furiously back at the fugitives, and this time with little effect.

Jennie was hit in the arm by a graycoated bullet, and she was skinned on the cheek by the same bullet, and Violet was slightly maimed in the right leg. Evans mechanically grasped the loaded gun handed to him by little Evangeline, rolled back his own emptied weapon to her and in another moment he was blazing away again at a gray coat. Then he himself reloaded and fired again, and after that was the broken gray line in front of him roll back among the trees, and dark men behind in a kind of disorderly condition, several of the graycoats falling behind and plunging a presently to earth and Evans and the little girl fired again. The Glandelinians charged again, but were driven back by the deadly marksmanship, that to aid this attempt, they set the trees on fire, but the smoke being driven northward failed to accomplish their purpose thereby, the fire burning toward them that the Glandelinians soldiers were somewhat impeded in the next charge by the bodies of the dead and wounded comrades they had to step over, that their officers had to do some threatening, and sword prying and striking to persuade them forward, that the following retreat was in greater disorder than the one before, and left the ground more thickly covered with dead and wounded, that they waited a long time before they began to make their last attack, that on the Glandelinian side there was much lunging in the attempt to dodge from tree to tree, that many became cowed and slunk away, that at each charge the Glandelinians occurred at the trees defended by the fugitives were similar to those of the Glandelinians, that the past attack left Evans and the little girls with little ammunition. The few remaining boxes containing the bullets were opened, and the bullets were distributed among them with instructions to make every kernel of it tell.

"If they are driven back once more they can't be rallied." Said Evans. "Remember he continued wait before the word, before we fire again. And you my little girls friends, put every shot to good use there is none for wasting now. Aim at their waste in hands, and bring down the officers. That pistol must be lowered Jennie when you come to fire, you Violet dear. With a warning look, with your finger ready to pull wait for the word I tell you. Be must be careful."

Then the Glandelinians Glandelinians advanced again to the attack they came on with a fury that it seemed nothing could turn back or stay, their whole movement being concentrated upon the fugitives. The gray swarm were only twenty yards away when Evans gave the word to fire. The column wavered at the volley, but recovered formation in a moment, and sprang forward with fixed bayonet without firing in return. Evans knowing he had fired his last round turned his weapon around to use it as a club. He was now at the southeastern corner of the woods the Glandelinians surging up to the southern side like a tidal wave, their front line being forced forward by the men behind.

A graycoated officer nearing Violet cried out; "We got the fugitives boys." And he pierced by the last bullet fired by Violet. Four other Glandelinians were shot down but there was no more ammunition for the men that followed. Evans brought down his rifle butt with all his strength on the head of the nearest graycoat. Before Jennie could throw a rock she had picked up she felt in her leg the violent thrust of a Glandelinian bayonet. She made a wild movement to clutch it but it was drawn away by its owners hand before it made any kind of a wound, voice having shot him the man falling forward on one knee, and a moment later toppled over a long log, and fell upon the ground upon the quivering body of a dying comrade. Then before the other graycoats came up, Evans grasped the little child whom he had rescued, in his arms holding her in a tight embrace and advising the little girls to follow, darted down into a deep ravine and out followed by the little girls, and the furious graycoats close behind. It was too late for the Glandelinians now to get the fugitives who had shot down two hundred and fifty of their number. "We can't catch them now." Said colonel Morgan, crashing his teeth in a rage. "And they've murdered over two hundred and fifty of you fellows. General Manley shall hear of this." "Oh what's the use of growling over it." Said a lieutenant colonel. "We made a mess of it any way for attacking those little desperadoes,"

If Manley hears of this his rage will know no bounds, but it will not help us any and he may blame us for it."

"And we thought we had them when their amunition gave out." Said a lion lieutenant. "They shot so many of our comrades down without a single loss to themselves."

In their meantime Evans and the little girls continued on their way, swiftly leaving the forbidding woods far behind.

The little girl who Evans had rescued, was now fully confident of the protection of the gray-catted soldier holding her so lovingly and clung closer to him and as they continued onward she finally lisped: "I love you soldier man. You are so brave to fight so many Tannalians."

"And I love you too you poor little girl." Said Evans pressing her closer to him. As soon as we reach the Christian lines or armies you will be safe. Here is your dear father and mother."

"In heaven with Jesus and his blessed mother." Answered the child. "And my name is not Francis Smith. It was what the Tannalians only called me. My name is Mary Jennings."

"How did you happen to be in the burning village?" Asked Evans.

"The Tannalians stole me from my aunt who they killed." She answered. "They had told the soldier who killed my dollie to cut me up."

"Well I'm glad I came in time to prevent it." Said Evans. "We must find our way to some Christian camp, as the Glandelinians are scouring the country for me, and the little girls with me. They have on boys' clothes which we hoped would trick the rascals but it did not."

"I know they are girls because they talk like them." Said the poor child eagerly. "I heard the Tannalians call them the Vivians."

"They are the good Vivians." Said Violet herself with love and pity. Beaming in her own eyes. "And he is a good man. He saved us many times and now he saved you."

"Ain't she a little dear?" Asked Violet. "I'm glad we saved her."

Thus they conversed together until across the field they saw a large farmhouse in the distance, beside two big tanks, windmills, and large barns.

"Maybe we can find shelter there for the night." Said little Evangeline. "I'm sleepy and hungry and she yawned."

They all hurried across the field, and reaching the door found a man suddenly open it. He was a farmer having heard their approach. He gave the strangers a hasty look, and then snatching down a rifle from the wall near by the door he cried:

"Get away from here you livery skunks. What do you mean by trespassing on my property you dirty Glandelinian dogs. Get before I shoot you down."

"I beg your pardon sir." Said Evans stepping forward instead of recoiling to the farmer's surprise. "But a gun never scares me never did, and only an angel of God alone can make me go. I'm colonel Jack Evans and these supposed boys are the Vivian girls. We are fugitives from the Glandelinians and so disguised. I rescued this little girl from one of them."

The farmer recognized him now in the light coming from the doorway. "A thousand pardons sir, but your uniform deceived me." Said the farmer. "I know you now, having seen your face in the papers many times. Come right in all of you. You are well welcome to stay."

"Thank you very much." Said Evans. And he and the little girls came in and took off their disguises. The true persons now displayed before him, the farmer was only too glad to give them the best resting quarters, and a hearty supper. It was late in the morning before Evans or any of the little girls awoke. It was thundering and raining again and from the warmth of the place they realized a sudden warm wave had approached. The little girl Jennings had been up before them and called Evans. As they came down the farmer had a good hot breakfast spread out for them, cooked by his wife.

"Did any of the Glandelinians ever bother you?" Asked Evans.

"No not yet." The farmer answered. "But I have seen them near here. The reason I'm not molested is because the Christian armies are here also when the Glandelinians do come. General Johnston is about a mile east of here. But close as he is he cannot be reached as a big forest fire is between here and me. It even is protecting me. I heard you coming last night, and so fast were you approaching footsteps, that I got out of bed threw on my bathrobe, and opened the door to see who was coming. Seeing your uniform I thought you was a Glandelinian captain and ordered you off the place. I would not give them skunks refuge."

if I died for my refusal."

"It's too bad we can't reach Johnston's lines which is so near." Said Evans. "The Glandelinians are scouring the whole country for us. We've been trapped by the forest fire, and then since the battle of Gloriana Francisco were pursued vigorously by the Glandelinians under general Darger."

"Well if you could cross the Union river east of here you may reach him in a roundabout way." Said the farmer. "That is if the blaze hasn't crossed it yet."

"I'm afraid the fire has crossed it." Said Evans. "It's a fire that even the worst rain storm could not check, let alone a snowstorm. We're lost in a wilderness that's all there is to it. Suppose general Vivian is worrying about us."

"He is worrying terribly about you and the little girls." Said the farmer's wife. "I have observed it in the papers, that he has brigades and regiments of soldiers scouring the country for you also. I can hope that God allows you the guided locust to be found by them soon. Arson is also worried about it, and fears you have perished within the enemy's regions. He blames general Vivian for not remaining where he was until you and the little girls could find him and his army."

"I guess God did not know that general Vivian was having men searching for us. But then don't see how they can find us with so many Glandelinians scouring the whole country for us. But I hope to God's help we will be found, or work our way to some Christian army before long."

"Maybe we will have good luck yet." Said Violet. "We may find our way to Johnston's lines yet is he is that near."

"With that forest fire between him and us?" Reclaimed Evans. "Why you made a foolish remark then that time. It is impossible."

"Well we'll stay lost then." Said Violet with an angry pout.

"Anyway I don't see why those nasty Glandelinians set the woods on fire for and other things they do. Putting up all our timber in such a wanton style, I hate Manley and even his sons. They are all alike, and so is butcher Federal the beast. They may have us in a disadvantage now but the worm will turn see if it don't."

This was the first time Evans had ever heard of any of the Vivian girls speak like this. But she was just in doing so and he felt the same about it. But he realized the impossibility of reaching general Johnston's lines in that location. After the breakfast was eaten Evans said to the farmer:

"I think I might as well leave for the searching parties of the Glandelinians may even come here in search of us, and if they see us here you will suffer for it even if we do escape."

The farmer seeing that this was really the problem supplied them with equipment, and then after thanking the farmer and his wife, heartily they sailed out. They traveled on for about half an hour, when they noticed that the air was still warmer getting warmer all of a sudden, and that the wind blowing from the south was melting the remaining snow with great speed.

"It's strange this sudden warming up." Said Evans.

"It's mysterious." Said Violet. "Though I can guess where it's from."

"I too." Said Violet.

"I believe myself that the forest fire south of us is going to pay us a visit." Said Evans. "We'll have to be on our guard now, and get into some clearing or wooded country before it overtakes us. If it overtakes us this time we will surely have some time getting out of it."

"Yes because before a high wind like there is blowing now it moves forward with the speed of a train." Said Jennie.

They hurried on and soon came upon the McColleston and abandoned hand car.

"Let's use it." Said Jennie. "We can make better progress on it."

They all ran toward it and mounted the platform, Evans grasping the handle to operate it. All morning the sky had been clouded over to a sickly gray, which had first they had supposed to be rain clouds, but now which they knew to be smoke from the distant forest fires. By the time they discovered the hand car it was growing darker, the air still warmer and the wind stronger. The fire storm was approaching their way and knowing it Evans said aloud:

"There is no time to lose now as she is coming. Mary you sit down on top of the middle of the platform like a good little girl so you won't fall off."

She did so saying "How fast is the fire coming?"

"Probably as fast as the train runs." Said Evans. "Or as fast as a storm."

He then started it.

comes. Said Evans. He then started it going and soon they were traveling at a great rate. The little child with them not understanding what the approach of a forest fire, and continuously looking around at all the trees wondering why she did not see any of them burning. A dull hoarse murmur was now filling the air and it was growing farfully dark as if some dreadful typhoon was tearing its way along the shore. The child thought it was going to rain but the others thought different. The forest fire was coming fast like a storm itself and now the wind screaming, yelling, and howling through the woods blew hot, filled with a pungent biting smoke, that made their eyes smart and water.

"I'm afraid the forest fires will catch up with us." Thought Evans.

As he worked with might and main to make the hand on a hand car go faster. If we could get into a large treeless plain all would be well. But this stretch of woods does not seem to have an end. And they are mostly those feared dreads conifers pines and evergreens. I wonder what would be best to do. Northeast of here there is a lake but how far I don't know. If we could but reach that lake all would be well. Violet and her sisters were apprehensive apprehensive of the same thing. They from their other experiences with forest fires knew that the fire travels like the wind sometimes, and at times can outdistance the fastest express train. They feared these scourges worse than anything else. Yet they had full confidence in Evans, and knew that since he had gotten them out of bad places before, he would do so again. Steadily it grew darker until it was almost like night and already in the south they saw rolling clouds of smoke of many hues and a faint glow along the horizon. The hot gale of wind was growing stronger, the sky was clamorous with the cry of fleeing birds, and wild deer and other animal were seen scampering about and through the woods for a lake margin. Even wolves howling dismally swept past the hand car without giving the least attention to those on board. The atmosphere was becoming gray with a swiftly blowing smoke haze, and the hoarse dull murmur was growing to a peculiar roaring, hissing and snapping sound, no doubt the noise from the flames.

The distant glow was steadily getting brighter lined at certain sections with so much rolling smoke of various colors, that it resembled thousands of giant volcanoes in their wildest eruption at a far distance. The smoke frequently peeped by flames, and the awesome sight became terrifying, and poor little Mary who clung close to Violet sitting next to her begged her to pray that they escape the threatening peril on coming so close upon them. Indeed the scene was truly awful. The wind was a screaming hurricane.

The trees swayed, withered, and bent low before the pressure of the wind, which tore the branches from the trees, and buffeted the fugitives almost like the actual blows of the fists. So fast was the storm of fire advancing, that Evans and the little girls were filled with ununspeakable horror. And to make matters worse a bright rousing lurid glow gradually but quickly appeared to the west and east of them, more brighter than the light in the south. A fearful thundering roar broke loose in the distance, it suddenly began to rain sparks, and blazing embers, and the long grass growing along side the tracks began to ignite from the embers. Evans feared that there was no hope for them now. The fire was only three miles off, and coming faster than the wind could drive it, it seemed.

"Oh for God's sake ain't we ever going to get out of this?" Wailed Violet. "Evans I guess we had better abandon the old hand car and make for some lake. We can never escape the forest fires this way."

"We might try anyway." Said voice frantically. "We can never get away unless we reach the lake."

Evans decided to do so, as he knew there was a large lake some where. So the hand car was abandoned, and off they started in the direct direction of the northeast. It was so dark that they could hardly see ahead, despite the glow in the three directions. They were almost prostrated by the wind, many times they stumbled sprawled and tripped over roots of trees, and several times each in turn fell sprawling. Suddenly before them something like an immense gulf yawned before them. It was black as ink. And it was the lake. The sight of which gladdened them all and close to the shore was a large boat tied to a tree.

"In with you little girls." He hissed. "We'll row across the lake and escape the fire."

They all piled into the boat Evans taking the middle seat, and in a moment more he had unfastened the rope from the boat by cutting it, and was rowing hastily away from the shore. In a few minutes they were out in the middle of the wind tossed lake. Suddenly in the darkness they could see a large mass of flames coming from the shore, rushing through them at great speed, and drew the loaded craft toward them with such terrific force that it was dashed against the what appeared to be fishing stakes. Evans saw what was going to happen, and tried to ward off the impact, but nearly dislocated his shoulder in the attempt and all of them were soon struggling in the water. The little girls had not realized what was coming and were thrown out of the boat into the middle of the current, but one of them managed to get a grip on the boat, although it was nearly torn out of her grasp. Violet who it was went under trying to force the boat over by floating it with her hands from underneath, but soon came up again having failed, and to see the others looking out for her. She crept head over head along the boat toward them, and Evans caught her and dragged her up with the aid of her sisters, who had managed to climb up on the stakes. Violet scrambled onto the stakes, and saw that the boat had been smashed in half by the blow it had received against the piles. They were nearly three hours on the stakes, witnessing the flames eating the wide stretch of trees in the distance, and the sea began to give way they thought they had better abandon all thoughts of ever getting to the other shore unless landlubbers in boats came to take them off and make prisoners, or kill them. The waves lashed by the wind was so strong to swim just now, but Evans saw that the stakes ran all the way across the water to the opposite shore, so he took Mary in his arms, and bidding the little girls to follow he started to climb along the stakes. The Vivian girls doing the same. The stake poles were very wide, and close together, and though they were very shaky they managed to work their way to the opposite shore, their clothes having been dried out, by the fierce heat felt from the distant conflagration.

Far in the distance the flames burst so fiercely, that the whole world seemed on fire. Mountains of fire rose thousands of feet into the air, a volcano of flame and smoke poured fiercely half way across the lake, sighing the air with the heat. A hurricane of sparks and embers flew across the lake, wide as it was threatening to ignite the timber on the other side. Evans and the little girls hurried along the shore, of the lake, watching out for the sparks and embers. They now were successfully outdistancing the forest fire, and the only peril they still faced was from the foe, who even in battles fought like savage animals, who never knows when they are defeated....

Little Francis who had been with them all the while since they left Wicksville lines, felt more safe now and so did Mary, and showed a more cheerful spirit as they continued on. They now saw a clearing far ahead, in the glow of the distant fire storm, and increasing their steps came to an opening in the woods. There was a solitary house of big size standing here.

GENERAL "AWLEY'S" HEADQUARTERS IS RAIDED.....

Evans walked up to the door and knocked. "Nobody answered." Again he knocked more loudly this time, and still nobody came. He then tried the door. It was unlocked. So Evans pushed it open. All was dark inside. Evans striking a match lit a lamp he found standing on a table. The little girls then went in.

"Here seems to be nobody here." Said Evans. "Maybe knowing the enemy to be in the neighborhood they have fled." Evans tried another door, and finding it ajar, opened it, and went in. It was totally dark inside, so dark that he could not see his hand before his face. He struck a match and lit the gas jets hanging from the ceiling. The walls were covered with pictures of great landolinian generals including, Federal, Manleys, and his three sons, and other great men of staff. Evans was fully convinced that he and his little friends had invaded the home of some landolinian farmer, or some officers probably.

He revealed his suspicions to Violet and her sisters, and warned the other two little girls with him to be careful..... They went through every room in the house, but found no one as yet. They returned to the bedroom and Evans producing his light, lit it, throwing its rays on the bed. It was also empty, but the walls of the bedroom was adorned in pictures of landolinian generals, besides a picture of an man, woman, and two elderly children under which were written

"LOYAL SUPPORTERS OF DEAR OLD G LANDELINIA"

"Heavens help us. We have invaded some home of a blandelinian subject. Exclaimed Evans. And as they are enemies it would be no wrong to help ourselves to their property. Some left lots carry away every thing we can carry. He quickly secured a pillowslip, and started his raid. He threw in three loaves of bread, some jam, two jars of butter, prunes, bottles of milk and cream, and cakes carefully wrapped up in paper. They even took three whole chickens, glasses of jam, $4000 found in rolls, and destroyed the picture, by ripping them with knives. Then as they went out Evans said: 'My won't they be mad when they find that their storage box has been raided by us christian dogs.' And he laughed. They hurried swiftly away, Evans carrying the spoils on his shoulder. In fact without his knowing it it was John Manley's temporal headquarters. He and the little girls had raided. He had his army of close by unseen by Evans and the children, and Manley returning later, was not only surprised to see lights burning in every room except his bed room, and saw what had been taken off by the raider, but that the guards that had been placed to watch the building were not in sight, and his madlin fury knew no bounds.

He immediately raided his headq. head the alarm, his father and brother coming on the run, followed by a body of soldiers and other generals. 'My place has been raided.' He fumed, as his father and brother came in. 'What means this father, and brother. Did I not tell you to place guards here?'

'They saw at a glance that it was true and did not know what to say. But 'Joken' Manley said:

'Your excellency I placed fourteen guards here.' 'Well it's funny where the guards went to he fairly screamed. 'If you set fourteen of them to guard this house, while we would be away, then where could they have gone. If you placed them here then they surely must have derse deserted their post. They ad you, the two of you are to blame for this, and those guard guards will be shot in di disgrace.'

Manley found it useless to organize a sapa persueing party, as it was two hours after Evans and the little girls left the place, that it was discovered. But he had a suspicion who was there; for a little girls hair ribbon ribbon was found on the bed, and this made him still more furious and he fairly chewed the ribbon in his ragr rage.

To think of being outwitted by the Vivian girls so many times and then this to happen was maddening. His face was purple with rage, and he raved around the place like a roaring tornado burning upon a small town blaming his father and brother for it all.

It was also discovered that the guard that had been placed there had been found dead, not far away, and this was also blamed on Evans and the little girls; when three gigantic Pumas had killed the guards. They had attacked the guards so suddenly that they did not have the time to defend themselves. Manley was never so angry in his life. He fumed and fretted, and ordered his generals out of the house and still blamed his father and brother a over it.

'This is the worse ever.' He roared in the most angry tone ever heard from any man. 'My best estates, stolen, valuable pictures rip ripped up, my bed torn up, shades torn from windows, my dining room and parlor left burning in every room. I won't have it I tell you damn it I won't have it, and I don't recognize the right's of the almighty to have it so. His He whose enemy I am. Those darned toadstools called the Vivian girls are a danger to the whole of Landelinia and I'll get them if I have to go through satens inferno to do so, and those the one to stop me I'd like to know.' And he shook his fist into the air as if he would like to rend the very house in fragments. His officers were half scared at his terrible anger and rage and covered at a distance. Evans and the rest continued on in the darkness that still remained, and then coming to the bank of a river stopped to eat some of the spoils.

He first nerved the little girls, and partook of some of it for himself. Little Francis was the most hungry of them all, and ate quite a lot.

'I'm wondering if we could not get to Lanstines army by directing our course southeastward after crossing this river.' 'L.' 'Said Evans. 'This id is the Union river.'

'We could try.' Said violet as they now had finished eating. 'It may bring us luck to try.' 'Athis At this section of the ill usually river which rendered its name a or bridge crossed the stream. As soon as they were over on the other side they directed their course first eastward, and then southeast. They kept on till right fall, and then stopped to eat a little for supper. When they started started on again their way was lighted considerably by the far distance of forest fires. Coming to the town of Marlow, Evans bought a paper from a poor little nes neweloy who was shouting:

'Extra all about the big raid in Manleys lines.' And so on and as he glanced at the headlines he gave a start and then almost split his side sides a laughing.

'What is it Evans that is so funny?' Asked Violet with a smile and not noticing his humor.

'It was general John Manleys headquarters we raided.' He said still laughing. 'And we did not know it. The joke is on us as well on him. He certainly must have been mad according to the account written in this evening paper.'

'Let's see it.' Said violet. 'It must be very interesting.'

'But we must be careful not to excite suspicion in this town by any show of excitement on our part.' Said violet.

'That's right.' Said Evans. 'And we don't know this town yet.'

He allowed them all to look at it. This is what they read:

"EXTRA GENERAL MANLEY'S HEADQUARTERS AT MC-HOLMSTER RUN RAIDED BY VIVIAN GIRLS AND OTHER CIA GUARDIAN...."

This afternoon while within the camp on inspection, John Manleys headquarters was raided, by colonel Jack Evans and the vivian girls. Everything in food of best value was carried off, the rooms being left in a untidy condition, shades were torn down, the bedroom turned topsy turvey.

And even thogas was trurin turning when Manley came back. The whole country is being secured with redoubled energy for them. Look out for them.

Evans is d disguised as an officer of the blandelinian am army the rank of captain, and the vivian girls are disguised as bad boys.

They have two little companions with them, one whose name is Francis Schmidt and another Mary Jennings.

Look out for them two particular for they must be retaken at all costs. 'Manley accuses the Vivian Vivian girls of:

"VIOLET ANGLIS VIVIAN;

Great spy. Have caused blandelinia was a world of trouble. Blandelinian armies literally turned upside down in the endeavors to capture her.

JOICE VIVIAN;

The little snip, who recently assassinated our late King James Cannon precise Candandon. Also great spy. The most dangerous of the vivian girls. EVANGELINE VIVIAN. THE LITTLE WILDCAT.

Also great spy wanted for many things which cannot be related here. Aided the child rebels during the rebellion.

JENNIE VIVIAN? ANOTHER WILDCAT.

Very troublesome spy, spy, wanted for very same reason.

CATHERINE VIVIAN. THIRD WILDCAT.

A book full of evidence against her. Single reward offered for her destruction. HETTIE VIVIAN.

Almost as troublesome as her sister Joice. ACCUSES WITHHELD.

DAISY VIVIAN. AN AN ANOTHER WILDCAT.

Wanted for many depredations. Great rewards were promised time and again for the cam capture of these scamps dead or alive, but no one seems able to capture them or hold them when they are captured, so now the reward will be given to the first man who even kills one of them on sight.

After they finished reading, several officers in citizen clothes came up and said

'I'm sorry but I'll have to place you under arrest sir.' The children will be placed under my care.'

'It will take more than you and your party to arrest me.' Said Evans leveling his weapons at them. 'I don't go with you dirty blandelinian skunks. Envy. Out of my way or I'll sling you into the gutter.' And he swept them aside as a reed, and made a break for a dark alley

"You are to penetrate general Wienstien's lines in disguise as a farmer. The civilian girls are to follow, having escaped across the Onion River, and it is up to you to find the tent they are sleeping in, and go in and tear their little bellies open silently with a cutlass. If successful you will be rewarded. If unsuccessful through cowardice or carelessness, you will forfeit with your life."

GENERAL JOHN HANLEY:

"Did general Wienstien?" "See the note?" "Asked Violet."

"Not yet." "Said Evans." "But he will. I have requested him to take you little girls into his headquarters where it's more safe. He knows of the occurrence but has not seen the note yet."

"Show it to him it will be better." "Said Violet." "It might lead to the men's capture. And he may still be prowling around, waiting for his chance. He is a dangerous enemy you know, especially he will try his best when he knows his life pays for his failure."

Evans led the little girls to his headquarters, and gave them a good hearty breakfast cooked by his own hands. Francis and Mary were getting more and more used to their surroundings now, and admired the soldiers who were being lined up for their mess. The soldiers smiled at the children, as they passed and many stopped to talk to Violet and her sisters and even to the two other little girls.

After breakfast Evans and the little girls headed for general Wienstien's headquarters. Evans showed the note to general Wienstien who glanced over it carefully.

"That must be seriously looked into." "Said Wienstien." "This must also be reported to general Vivian. It must be stopped."

"He then gave directions to several officers, and then turning to Evans said:

"I believe it is best to leave the little girls with me, and stay here yourself. Here no skulking scoundrel can get in, for I have guards at every room for my own protection as well as for the officers sleeping in the same building. So here no one can get at them."

"That is what I proposed to do sir." "Answered Evans heartily." "I purposed to them about it."

"I see laughed the general." "And did they accept it?"

"Accept what?"

"What you proposed to them."

"Oh yes they did." "Laughing. They accepted my proposition." "And he drew Violet and another close to him. They went inside the building the kindly general following in the rear. They were shown a room opposite to that of the general's. Evans took the room next to it. After their places were all fixed up, they all went out to see the troops on drill."

Squad right, and squads left were mostly performed. Platoon drilling was also in progress, and general drilling besides setting up exercises. Violet and her sisters never tired of watching the soldiers on drill and knowing all the drilling themselves, sometimes joined for pleasure, never failing in any not even the most difficult, and excited the admiration of little Francis, Mary and even Evans who watched.

Sometimes when a drilling a squad of men for sport, the little girls would sometimes throw them out of rank for fun, and get them back in their right places, through a clever movement which not even the general could foresee, and wondered how they did it, and sometimes when they purposely threw the men out of rank, by either not holding the pivot, or following the man in front of them, when squads left or right were made, they nevertheless without stopping or pausing soon had each man in their places, which flabbergasted not even the generals but the men themselves.

But the little girls liked best to watch the men while drilling to the music of the drum and hear the shouts and commands, and see the signals of the officers. Platoon and regimental drills were the most grandest sights of all, and which the little girls liked to take part in, throw them out of place, and by their mysterious ways put them all back in a moment's time, by some strange astonishing movement.

All morning the drilling continued in the driving rainstorm that was raging. The soldiers did not mind the storm in the least, and as it was still warm there was no discomfort on the little girls. That afternoon after mass time the gale turned into a most violent wind and thunderstorm which grew so bad that further drilling was suspended. The wind was blowing a stiff gale from the north west. Evans in the afternoon asked general Wienstien if there was any armies of the enemy a mile off from Marlowes.

"No indeed." "Said Wienstien." "General Vivian only requested me to guard this town until further orders. There is no enemy to oppose me yet, but there is no telling when one will come. I'm dreading the approach of general Germanias Vivian's army."

"That dog of a man." "Hissed Evans." "I'm still waiting for my chance to kill that fool."

"You will get your chance yet." "Said the great general. He is hated worse than any of the Landellinian generals."

Evans the remainder of the day directed the soldiers in throwing up fortifications, fortifications, and then in the evening directed the posing of sentries, and being suspicious put extra sentries on the posts. This time instructing them not to challenge in case they hear any suspicious sounds, but to fire on the spot. All the Christian sentries were always required to memorize the following:

"MY GENERAL ORDERS ARE:

1. To take charge of this post, and all government property in view. To guard as strictly, spies and prisoners of war.

2. To walk my post in a military manner, keeping always on the alert, and observing everything, that takes place within sight of hearing.

3. To report all violations of orders, I am instructed to enforce.

4. To repeat all calls from posts more distant from the guardhouse than my own.

5. To quit my post when only when properly relieved.

6. To receive, obey, and pass on to the sentinel, who relieves me, all orders from the commanding officer, of the day, and officers, and non-commissioned officers of the guard only.

7. To talk to no one except in line of duty.

8. In

8. In case of fire, or disorder to give the alarm.

9. To allow no one to commit nuisance on or near my post.

10. In any case not covered by instructions, to call the corporal of the guard.

11. To salute all officers, and all colors, and standards not cased.

12. To be especially watchful at night, and during the time for challenging to challenge no person, or animal, or object, and allow no one to pass without the proper proper authority.

I Between Retreat and Retreat, to turn out the guard for all persons designated by the commanding officer for all standards and colors not cased, and in time of war, for all armed parties approaching my post, except troops at drill and relief, and detachments of the guard.

2. At night after challenging any person or party to advance to the post, call the corporal of the guard, repeating the answer to the challenge.

In case of poor prowling times to fire without warning at any prowler approaching my post from the direction of the orange lines.

It was considered a grave offense if any soldier in the christian army through neglect or wilful laziness failed to learn those fourteen columns by heart, and in time of war the offense would be still more grave, and punishable by disgraceful discharge from the army and it was considered an offense of a heinous nature for any sentry especially during this great war now raging, to desert his post under any conditions, pre- preventable, also to fall asleep on guard duty, and he who did this would be court-martialed and put in front of a firing squad. The same punishment would also be given out to the post deserters in time of peace.

THE DASTARDLY ATTEMPT TO POISON GENERAL
WEINSTEN'S ARMY, IN ORDER TO MURDER PO R VIOLET AND HER SISTERS:.....

Evans however gave extra instructions to the guards he had selected and even watched instructed them to be even more watchful for these very prowlers, who were even now probably waiting to get a chance to get at the Vivian Girls. There however happened nothing important that night, excepting that one of the guards announced that a branch of the great forest fire was observed northeast of them, "browsing a perfect sleep of light for miles. In the morning along the east the distant sky was enshrouded in rolling dense smoke all along the horizon. Sometime after breakfast, a while Evans was watching with awe, the distant clouds of smoke, a lieutenant came dashing up to him and saluting said:

"General Evans, the little Vivian girls are awfully sick! They were throwing up for almost an hour."
"You mean they are all sick?"
"Yes sir. All the little girls."
"What I'll be jiggered." He exclaimed. "I'll be there immediately to see them."

He was there in no time, but he did not only find the little girls sick but the general and his officer as too, besides the whole army, or almost nearly the whole army had thrown up their breakfast. All the officers were angry and excited. Weinstien was down and in bed seriously ill and Evans was at once suspicious.

He went to see to the little girls who were feeling much better now. They were of course ignorant of the whole army being sick, having wondered at their illness as they never knew sick in this manner before, as they were always careful of what they ate, and so were indeed surprised, when Evans did not show much alarm about it.

"We were very sick," Violet began when Evans cut her short.
"The whole blooming army is sick." He sneered. "Even Weinstien spilt his breakfast at his very table and is seriously ill. It's too bad you little girls did not eat with me, and you would have escaped this. The food has been doctored by somebody, and I'm going to find that somebody if I have to comb the world for him, and change his shape."

At this moment the army was moving for breakfast.

General Evans said: "I examined Weinstien's breakfast food, left unopened."

"It's been doctored by some mysterious person. Forty officers narrowly escaped death from it and are in a serious condition and so is Weinstien. I've ordered the chef to be held, and also the Kitchen Police. There is something wrong somewhere."

"I don't see where the army cook has anything to do with it, but it is good to hold them until investigation is made." Said Evans.
"But this trick was done by more than all our army chefs here, and by mandelins too. It was an attempt to poison the Vivian girls, and the people were bound to do so if they had to poison the whole army to succeed in their vile purpose. What kind of poison was it?"

7-313

"Sunach." Answered the doctor. "But too weak to kill any body. Though over two ten thousand men are in a serious condition. It's a blessing from God that your little girls' friends escaped as they did."

"I should say it is a blessing that they did." Said Evans. "But you see, Sunach was put in the food."

"Yes."
"It is a deadly poison, and it's a miracle no one was killed." Said Evans. "I'll go and see general Weinstien. He is in the room across from this one."

He knocked his head into something as he passed across the corridor followed by the doctor, and it fell to the floor. He picked it up and found that it had been hanging from the chandelier by a weak string. It shaped like a package which Evans quickly opened. Inside was a dirty cloth, and a slip of paper with wording on it. Evans glanced over it reading then:

"We have failed"

"We have failed many times to get the Vivian girls but won't this time you dirty christian dogs. You all may have to get a share of this poison, but we care not as long as we get the Vivian girls."

GERMANIA'S AID.

Evans showed it to the doctor, who read it. They then told the guard that they wanted to see general Weinstien and were admitted. Weinstien was in bed but Evans and the doctor saw that he was feeling better.

"It's funny that I got so sick all of a sudden." He said.
"And the little girls threw up?" even all over the floor in my dining room and I did so too. It's my and their first time that we were sick. I always do eat right, chew my food well and eat only wholesome food, and so do they. I don't see what was the matter with it."

"There was something serious the matter with the food." Said Evans. "I thought you heard about it. The whole army got sick about the same time. There's poison in the food. I'm going to have all the food stuff examined. Even that in the kitchen of the mess tents. We have disguised some enemies among us. I was it was another attempt on the Vivian girls, and the whole army got it."

The general was surprised.
"Is that so?" He exclaimed. "By Neptune we will have to capture those dope rascals by all means. Do what you can with you Evans."

"I certainly will." Said Evans. "They almost crippled your army by this dope trick, when trying to place those poor little girls. Little Francis and and Mary were the only ones who were not sick as they ate with me. The little Vivian girls wanted to eat with you, and so let them."

After a few more words Evans saluted, and leaving the room said to a lieutenant coming up:

"See that this building is strictly guarded. Have sentinels at every window and door. Then rake this building with your soldiers. There may be some accomplices in hiding. Also place extra guards over Violet and her sisters. Put four in their room even. See that no one who is a stranger get's in and search every man that leaves get me."

"S." "Yes sir." Answered the lieutenant saluting, and he sped off to do so, and he did too. Five guards with placed in the hall, two at the door of the room where the Vivian girls were in, and four inside, besides following out the other instructions, and succeeded in finding two suspicious persons in the building and holding them. Evans ordered other officers to dispatch men to examine the food in the baggage trains, and then going to a solitary spot with the doctor examined the bottles finding that its contents had been p.

Parafene.
"He then had the members of the Kitchen Police, who were held brought up to him. He piled questions upon them, gave them a cross examination, but none of them knew about the food being poisoned, and swore before the almighty God that they had also been sick."

"Well there is more than one man who did the trick." Said Evans strictly. "And they say as well own up, because there is no escape as the guards under my instructions will allow no one to leave the camp even if they are officers. The culprits are not outside the lines, but within, and must be caught."

Five officers and two lieutenants were within one quarter of a block of the main headquarters, when a frightful concussion threw them to the ground. General Crocoringman, Colonel Sir George Smith, and Lieutenant P.H. Divens were at Anna and Francis street street, and general Hannon Lee Corbett at Viviani street, when they saw a man in purple dress disappear into an alley. General Mannigan and lieutenant general Bernard Mullog were standing still standing at the northwest corner of these streets, when the loudest explosion ever heard rocked the town. Glass from thousands of windows rattled down into the streets, and running to the main headquarters, reached the main entrance from which smoke was pouring.

On the side walk lay several officers, some suffering from serious wounds to the head part of which was blown off. The others were also in a dying condition. General Mannigan turned to Bernard Mullog and said: "Grab an automobile or anything you can, and we will get them to the town hospital."

One of the other generals who had witnessed the explosion was shaken and almost stunned. He saw a big cloud of dust, thinking then that it was smoke pouring out of the main entrance of Wienstiens headquarters, and ran to the box turning in a general general fire alarm. General Glass was crashing to the pavement from the buildings in the town, and then he saw a horse rearing, and staggering toward him. He thought the horse was running away, and grabbed him by the bit. His head was bleeding where a brick had hit him on the forehead, and the general had barely touched his head, when the poor horse sank to his knees, and stretched out dead.

Some one yelled that general Wienstien and the Viviani girls were killed. The general looked down again, toward the entrance to general Wienstiens headquarters. A man was dragging something down the steps. It was the body of a lieutenant ripped to pieces, and fiere a fierce furnace of fire had started among the wreckage. The dead lieutenants trousers legs were stripped off below the thighs, and it seemed that every bone in his body was broken, and the whole body was a mass of blood.

"Help get this other lieutenant away!" Shouted an officer to a private. He helped the officer pick him up. The whole side of his head was blown off, but he was breathing.

"Regular landelinian Glandelinian butchery." A man said as the officer and private straightened the poor lieutenant's body out, and a doctor bent over him. There was a third officer all crumpled up in a heap with most of the clothes torn from it. He too seemed to have had every bone in his body crushed. All the soldiers who were near the building at the time of the explosion, had seen something that looked like a cloud burst out of the main entrance of general Wienstiens headquarters. They could almost see the air shake. There was an ear-splitting report, and the next thing the soldiers knew they were sitting on the side walk or in the middle of the street, with a big thump that jarred their back bone all the way up to their heads. Several looked around half dazed, and saw forty or fifty others, men, women, and children then playing in the streets, also sitting or lying on the ground. Then the glass began to fall. The whole of Wienstiens headquarters rocked under the force of the explosion, as though an earthquake had gripped it. While Violet and her sisters who were playing, with little Francis, and Mary to make them happy, and forget their sorrows, stopped and wondered what had happened, as the windows of all the rooms crashed to floors and sidewalks in a deluge of shattered glass.

Then from the jagged windows they saw the tragedy unfold outside, the black smoke pouring from the main entrance, the pile of debris, and bodies lying in pools of blood, dead horses, women and children sitting or lying in the street, the crowds of people and soldiers running in all directions, the police and fire departments clanging down upon the scene, and the wreckage becoming a furnace of fire.

The corridors were filled with changed and excited soldiers. Violet and her sisters running out of the building to see what had really happened, reached the street in time to see the windows of St. Anne's church collapse.

"Look out little girls." Shouted the firemen, who were quencing the place as they ran into the street. A lot of glass began to fall from the upper floors of the headquarters itself, and in trying to get away from that, they were nearly run down by an automobile full of officers. Joyce was struck by a piece of glass that came from one of the upper stories. It was two feet square, catching her on the back of her upper blue hat, which she had put on to make Francis and Mary smile. In some manner the hat saved her. She bent forward holding the place against the building, her neck unhurt, while two soldiers went to her aid. Glass tumbled all about Violet but she was not hurt. Evans directing the work of investigation, about the poisoned food heard the explosion, and saw the smoke in a moment, and as he looked at the town walls of general Wienstiens headquarters, he clenched his fist and gritted his teeth.

"This is the work of skunks." He said. "The war work of Germanias agents, who are attempting to assassinate the Viviani girls. It should not be hidden by new plaster and paint. Except for the repairs that are necessary this scar left by the stab of the enemy should remain as it is for the duration of the war. So that the Christians can gaze upon it, and strengthen their determination to fight the enemy here, as steadfastly, and as unrelentingly, as general Vivians men are battling Manleysskunks and assassins."

Wienstien was able to leave the building without support, while Evans had immediately sent orders, that the town itself though within the Christian lines, should be strictly guarded.

"Stop, and question, and search every one that leaves the town even children, and allow no one to enter unless he can prove himself a Christian messenger or a fugitive." Was the instruction that Evans gave. "I'll place a dragnet throughout the whole camp, and region beyond and comb, and comb, until the scoundrels are found. And Germania shall pay for this, the green eyes of the demons. I have it in for him and will pay my debts."

Evans decided it was best to keep the Viviani girls within, where he was sure they would be safer, and if any body tried to dope his food, or bomb his headquarters, there will be a torando like loose among the Glandelinian Glandelinian anarchists. Violet and her sisters despite it all were cool about the incidents, and were not afraid at all.

but indignant. "I defy them all." Said Violet, clenching her little fists. "Let them try what they will. I'm not afraid of them."

Evans knew that this was the truth, but their defiance would not prevent the wicked Glandelinians from trying to accomplish their vile purpose. They were determined to bring about their destruction, and would if he did not have them protected. All his orders and instructions had been carried out to the limit, and no one no matter who he is was, was permitted to leave the camp or town. Several more arrests had been made, the prisoners having acted suspicious, when seen later around general Wienstien's headquarters. The arrests were reported to Evans, and he issued orders that the prisoners should be held.

"Then they are all rounded up and caught, the shall face the firing squads." He said coolly. "It will teach other agents of that snake Germania Viviani a lesson that will never be forgotten. By them."

Evans made up every plan possible to cause the rounding up the enemies within the Christian lines. Even in the town a strict house to house search was made, no building whatever, churches, institutions, hospitals, nurseries, and other religious places were also investigated by police and soldiers. Those not able to give satisfactory answers were held.

Evans felt sure that he would get the scoundrels within a short time knowing that the rascal rascals seeing no escape whatever, would finally have to confess, and give themselves up, and then the firing squad for them. It went pretty hard for the whole whole camp when it was learned that no one was allowed to leave the lines, to go for the town under any conditions, or any one to leave the town, but it only made the soldiers and inhabitants boil with anger, at the enemies they knew were among them. Later it was rumored that general Wienstien was acting very suspicious, and when he was attempting to leave the lines was arrested.

THE IMPOSTER.

He killed three of the guards in the struggle, and when he was finally overpowered by the time Evans arrived on the scene, Wienstien came up from another direction at hearing the commotion.

"An imposter eh?" He roared. "A man trying to slip through the lines impersonating me. Search him boys. He's a spy I bet."

Evans pulled at the persons hair and they came off revealing the feary features of another man.

"Search him good men." Said Evans. "Don't overlook anything. Strip him if necessary."

The order was obeyed. Two envelopes crackling with its contents was found on him besides other articles, which on being examined proved that he was one of Manley's agents sent to make his way into the Christian lines and assassinate the Vivian girls.

"Where are your helpers?" Asked Evans.

"I'll not answer your questions you dirty stinking Christian dog."

Answered the Glandelinian.

Evans smote him to the ground.

"I'll Christian dog you you dirty Glandelinian snake." He said coolly. "Get up here. You know what we do with such as you. Away with him men he will be courtmarshalled to night."

"It's funny the soldiers weren't fooled." Said Evans. "I expected you from being stopped."

"Stopped from what?" Asked Wienstien.

"Why I ordered that no one would be allowed to leave the camp until the second day were found." Said Evans. "But, did not include you in you in it, and told the soldiers not to touch you."

"Oh I understand." Said Wienstien. "It was I who caused this commotion. I saw my likeness pass by my headquarters, and being suspicious had him followed. He acted very suspicious, and then when he attempted to get through the lines he failed. For I telegraphed to all the sentries, telegraphed headquarters and so on, to watch out for a man looking like me and seize him. I told them not to hesitate, for I had had no intentions of going out of the lines yet, and if I did I would have a party of officers with me."

They followed his advice closely and had nabbed him just in time. "It's lucky you saw him." Said Evans. "I just now got news that general Vivian is advancing to reinforce you. When he comes warn him to have his lines watched also, as the enemies may try to escape by mingling with his men also. We must catch them."

"I'll do that." Said Wienstien. And saluting his superior he rode off. Evans then rode back to where he had left Violet and her sisters, and Francis and Mary and dismounted. He did not say anything to the little girls as he did not wish to excite them too much. Later in the day ten suspiciously acting persons, were seized, two confessed, and observations soon proved that all were caught. Late that evening scouts came in with the warning that larger Glandelinian armies were encamped about five miles from Marlow north of them and that these forces were moving to reinforce the Manleys concentrating at Francis-Atlanta. The rumors were confirmed when the inhabitants of the town fled into the Christian lines. Evans went out scouting parties to learn under whose command it was. He went out scouting himself but could find out nothing. It did not look like German's army, because the uniforms of the soldiers in his army are of a bluish gray. The Glandelinians encamped before him wore ash gray uniforms. He however knowing the location of Vivian's army wired to him a warning. This answer came to him.

"The Glandelinian army encamped before you is Huebaum Manley's and look Germania Vivian is advancing south of you to reinforce Manley. Head him off if you can." VIVIAN NIA.

This made Evans realize that Vivian had seen the foe sooner than he had. And so Germania was moving on his rear. The battle threatening at Francis-Atlanta was becoming more threatening every day. Well he'd see about this. He must see Wienstien and give him directions as to Manley's to be worked. And then he would send word to general Vivian by wire. That general Huebaum Manley separated from Johnston Jackson Manley was advancing upon general Vivian, and to ask whether he should remain where he was, or advance to reinforce Vivian, or should advance and make a junction with Wienstien or retreat. Evans himself had no intention of retreating. He wished for battle and a battle that would settle the hands of the Glandelinians for good and all.

Evans telegraphed general Vivian, but it was some time before he got any answer, then this is what came:

"Huebaum Manley separated from Huebaum Manley three days ago, made junction with general Johnston Jackson Manley's army yesterday. In moving eastward another part of his army moving northward, the remaining southern learned general Germania is moving from Terwilliger and Maria Osborne in an endeavor to get around Manley's army at Francis-Atlanta. Watch out for him. An Alton Marlow and his lack to Terwilliger. Vivian must stand ground at all costs."

ROBERT VIVIAN.

He then told general Vivian that his little daughters were safe within Wienstien's lines, closely guarded. General Vivian advised him to watch every movement that Germania makes, for he just now was the main enemy of the little girls to look out for. Indeed all night long Evans kept scouting parties out, watching for Germania, while the main army fell back on Terwilliger with the plan of the burning team of Marlow as a back ground. True as it was neither Glandelinian nor general was yet aware of the presence of any Christian army, and were alarmed when they found their advance barred by armies greater than their own or the Anna Maria run.

Evans floating in the mortification of his abasement, and as a result sent a comical picture to all the commanders, by means of Glandelinian prisoners who were released for this purpose. The inhabitants of Francis and Terwilliger were surprised at the sudden approach of the Christian armies and wondered what was up. They did not see any of the enemy who was several miles away, but had halted.

General Germania cut off from making a junction with the Manleys, was driven to apprehension and desperation, who when he learned who the commander of the armies confronting him was and was at a loss of what to do. He dreaded both Evans and Wienstien, but Evans most. It had been his intention to make a junction with Huebaum Manley, but now he couldn't as Evans, Wienstien, and Francis Vivian were between him and the three Manleys, who were overpowered three to one by each Christian army simply. He dared not attack the Christian armies on such uneven ground, and notified John Manley of the state of affairs, stating that he was caught on bad ground, who his adversaries were, and that he did not know what to do.

Manley stated that he was in the same situation, and confronted not only by Francis Vivian but the two Vivian also. In the meantime with the captured would be assassins, courtmarshalled, Evans himself went off to see to their execution.

"Get the white livered assassins to the stone wall." He ordered with a sneer. "Curse them and the day they were found within our lines, spoiling the breakfast of the whole army, and bombing Wienstien's headquarters, in an attempt to murder the poor Vivian girls. It'll be you up against the wall, and a good job too. Get hold of them men, and if they make a break give them the bayonet, and sent it through the cowardly snakes. Hurry them up. We have been holding them long enough."

That evening before they had been taken before Wienstien who could get nothing out of them but:

"Germania will be avenged. Germania will be avenged. I dare you Christian dogs, and devils to have us shot and your heavenly father we defy to the last. I dare you and him to have us shot. Down with Christianity and all that formed it. To perdition with them all. They are only a mockery."

Wienstien utterly disgusted with them, sent them under escort to division headquarters, for trial by courtmarshall, charged with entering the lines with spying intent intentions, and an attempt to assassinate the Vivian girls. They shoot for any offense of this kind of treatment to any children in Angelina, Calvernia, or Abbievania no matter who the child is, and by this is a good thing to do to, to the rascally enemies of little children who torment and torture a then in any way. During their trial and cross examination they sat as one dazed but would put nothing forward, in their defense only an occasional:

"We dare you dirty Christian dogs to have us shot. And the very fiends in hell will revn revenge out our deaths."

The ir sentence had been passed. To be shot at nine thirty o'clock on the morning of April 27th 1915. This meant that they had less than twelve hours more to live. Then came the time for the execution.

"Squads-----Attention-----Number." "Squad the lieutenant, in command of the firing squads. There were four of them. "Right-----turn-----left-----Wheel-----Quick march." And away they went. They were being covered with snow as a blizzard was raging, and with the officer leading they must have marched over fifteen minutes, ploughing through the deep slushy snow, when suddenly the officer made a left wheel, and the so soldiers with their prisoners found themselves in a sort of court yard. In the white mark a few hundred yards in front of them they could make out a brick wall. The officer brought his squads to attention, and gave the command to order arms. Then giving at face he said:

"Men you are here on a very solemn duty. You have been selected as firing squads for the execution of these prisoners, who having been found guilty of a previous crime, have been regularly and duly tried, and sentenced to be shot at 9.30 am this date. This sentence has been approved by the reviewing party and authority, and ordered carried out. It is our duty to carry on with the sentence of the court. I have rifles given to you before we started out, one of which contains a blank cartridge, the others contain containing ball cartridges. Every man is expected to do his duty and fire to kill. Take your orders from me. Squads-----Attention."

They came to attention.

"Forward."

Soon they were close enough to the wall, and the prisoners were marched up to it, with hands bound behind them and blindfolded. A white square was pinned on their breasts.

"You are to fire at these squares." Said the lieutenant.

"Ready aim."

The men took careful aim."

"FIRE."

There was a deafening crash, in clattering roar from the rifles, and the gray forms sank into huddled heaps.

"Order arms-----About turn-----Pile arms-----Stand-----clean or clear." The stacks were reformed.

"Quick-----march right wheel."

And they left the scene of execution behind them. After marching about five minutes they were dismissed with the following instructions from the officer in command of them:

"Return alone to your respective commands and remember no talking about this affair, or Germania will make it more harder for us, and be more determined to get the Vivian girls. Dismissed."

And they separated going to their respective companies. The next day all was quiet. Evans took the little girls for sight seeing through the big town of Norwilliger. Hearing a fruit store, Violet and her sisters asked him to buy them some of the nice oranges that were displayed in the big store window. W Evans was willing to oblige and always wished to see them happy. He went in the little girls following.

"I want eighteen oranges." Said Evans. "How much are they?"

"Forty five cents." Answered the store keeper.

"Pretty high price." Said Evans.

"Buy them anyway p." Pleaded Violet looking at him reproachfully.

"Sacrifices for us and god."

"I'll do anything for him and you little girls." He said. "Give me eighteen." He ordered to the store keeper. The store keeper put a bag and started to slip the old good for nothing oranges into the bag to the bitter disappointment of the poor little girls. Evans noticing it seized him by the hair pulling his head toward the oranges on the top front row.

"Look see." He said fiercely. "I'm buying the nice big, ripe juicy ones on the front row--not the culls, and windfalls that you're trying to slip into the bag. I like to see clever sleight-of-hand work in the Vaudeville you Vaudeville, but not in the fruit business."

And he pulled his hair so hard that he howled, and to say he put into the bag eighteen of the best oranges in the store, relieved the money, gave back the change, and watched him and the little girls leave the store, with sullen fear and rage and disappointment, for he had been able to cheat many of his customers, but not Jack Evans.

"I thought something was fur funny when I saw him doing a cheating stunt." Said Evans as he handed three oranges to each little girl. "But he couldn't slip it over on me."

They all wanted to take him one, but Evans would not take an orange from any of them, and said he would sooner but buy some himself than deprive them of even one orange. It was late in the afternoon when they returned back to the Christian lines. Nothing important happened during that day. If Germania never attempted to do anything and did not even advance. Was he afraid of Evans? Or was he delaying for more time? Evans dreaded that Germania was up to something suspicious, and decided to find out something himself. Everything depended on obtaining exact information as to general Her Germania's designs, known deserters stories not being relied upon. He first held a council of war with Ianson and the other Christian generals, at which he was decided that Germania's camp must be immediately visited and carefully examined. The selection of men for this delicate and dangerous mission was confided to general Frankford. No common soldier or adventurer would do neither see select service men of any rank. Skillful skill-judgement-----coolness-----and professional training were necessary, and as no officer could be ordered on such dangerous service, it was clear that if the plan was carried out some one would have to volunteer. Frankford appealed to the officers, of this division and some others, but as it was a spy service, no such looked upon as disgraceful, at least by usage, no glory to be won, and as before all eyes arose a vision of an ignominious death following detection no one would volunteer. W So Evans decided to go on the mission. His offer to undertake the dangerous and dangerous service, was strongly opposed by his friends even the Vivian girls. But as no one else would join for nothing they could change his determination. He lost no time in getting out. Assuming the dress of a landwehr general and carrying himself as such, as he was a manly man, and taking with him the most needed weapons, and the Vivian girls as boy scouts of landwehr he and they penetrated the enemy's lines, first made drawings of their camps, with descriptive notes in Latin and fully succeeded in the object of their mission.

He had arranged a large group to meet him at Union river and his work being done, he and the little girls proceeded to the place to meeting. A boat at approached the wharf and the little girls supposed to be the ones they were expecting. They walked down to meet it and not until the crew suddenly arose and point their musket at him and the little girls did he discover they did discover the mistake they had made. Evans however realizing what would happen to the Vivian girls should he give up ran refused to surrender leaping into the boat like a wild cat wildcat, upsetting it and dumping every one into the water, and swimming with the little girls to the other side before the landwehr recovered from their surprise. Evans then overpowered some landwehr men secured eight at sight of their horses and made off toward the Christian lines before any of the landwehr could be persuaded. To the joy of all he and the little girls reached the Christian lines safely and calling all the generals together showed them the drawings.

"It's Germania's intention to recross the river, and making a junction with general Hubaux Manley." He said. "He knows that general Francis Vivian's army with those of Generals Vivian and Hanson lie in the way of his army and those under the Manleys, but he intends at to cooperate with Hubaux by making a long detour, and if unsuccessful he will strike Vivian a terrible blow on the flank."

After they all examined the drawings he continued:

"It's up to us not only to warn general Vivian, but to watch every movement of general Germania's army, and strike him before he strikes Vivian. His army is quite large nearly equal to ours, and if he ever succeeds in making a junction with Hubaux Manley at it will be suicide to battle with them. We simply must prevent him."

The officers all agreed to this, and when should general Germania try to make any kind of movement, a battle of never character would surely follow. Evans himself revengeful over the Brigado affair resolved to whip Germania matter what the cost. He was over anxious to begin the battle, right away but Ianson did not think it prudent to do so as yet. After the council, he made the little girls happy by coming back to them telling them the success of his intentions and of the outcome of the council. Violet and her sisters, could not understand how he and they escaped so easily. They had feared exceedingly for his and their own safety. They knew that general Germania was a terrible enemy to face, face, and a cruel dangerous foe of children, and Christian spies. They even felt apprehensive of the coming battle threatening at Francis-Vivian. The opposing armies were under the most ferocious generals next to the Manleys who were also commanding the threatening forces, and even Federal was approaching and he was the man who would fight fiercely before giving an inch of ground..... Evans was apprehensive of the people in the town of Terwilliger for the enemy made an movement that afternoon that made it seem that the Mandelinians were going to descend into it like a fierce swarm of murdering wolves. Germanias Mandelinians were mostly Me-Hollesstinians and Condennocinians and Condennocinians, and the fiercest Kurdish Mandelinians believed to be in existence, mingled with the Gargo J Gargollans.

TERWILLIGER IS BURNING...

So it was Evans purpose to warn the inhabitants to seek refuge inside the christian lines before it was too late. So at 5:30 that afternoon refugees streamed into the christian lines, and when it grew dark a fierce sudden glare extended along the southern horizon that aroused all the christian generals who saw it and even the civilian girls wondered what happened. They all realized that the town was on fire.

"Who set the town on fire?" Demanded Evans angrily. "I advise you to get your refugees to abandon it but not to set it on fire." "The enemy set it on fire." Said one of the men.

Refugees. They entered the town an hour after we started to flee. All did not get away. Thousands of children have been cruelly massacred. At this surprising news Evans was enraged. He had been frustrated in his attempt to save them all and he felt like biting somebody. He went out close to the city of the town, saw hundreds of buildings burning like furnaces, heard appalling screams in portents that was still dark, and the firing of muskets. Evans felt disheartened as he watched the dismal scenes. He wondered if it would be wise to bombard the town and revenge the assassination of the children or make a direct headlong attack right away upon General Germania lines. And would he be able to bomb the town without causing a general battle.

Not likely so he determined to stand his mortification, and wait until it would be necessary. He stayed there for about half an hour and then suddenly hearing footsteps, and voices darted behind a tree.

"It's funny that those darn christians got warning of our near approach so sudden." He heard a voice say. "We thought we could have gotten all the little christian brats living there. Any way the town is burning." "Yes." Said another voice angrily. "Maybe those gutter snips called the civilian girls must have given the warning; I would give anything to see them little centepedes strung up with their bodies gutted. They could deserve nothing worse."

Evans in the meantime perceived that there was only two men talking and in the glare of the distant fire he saw they were first lieutenants. He decided to take them to the christian lines so he darted out from his hiding place and leveling his revolvers at them cried.

"Don't dare make a break. You are prisoners."

An exclamation came from the two graycoats.

"Why it's general Evans." Cried the first lieutenant. "Why he is a darn christian...."

"I wouldn't finish if I were you." Said Evans with a yawn. "I am wasting time. I'm sleepy and wish to return to the christian lines, and go to bed. So please don't keep me waiting. And I'm in a hurry to see the little dears you called gutter snips and centepedes a moment ago."

"O But what if we refuse to go you christian dog."

"I said no delay." Answered Evans. "Either come with me or your comrades will find you dead on this road to morrow."

The Mandelinians seeing his determined look realized he was a dangerous adversary and obeyed reluctantly. Reaching the christian lines Evans had them placed under strong guard. Early the next morning violet and her sisters passed the guard-house, and came to the internment camp where the two prisoners had been placed. They saw Violet and her sisters approaching and scowled.....

"You dirty little scoundrels how dare you come near us." Said the one of them angrily. "Keep away I tell you or we will kill you, under guard as we are...."

Violet and her sisters did not say anything but kept on, and another of the Mandelinians said.

"Oh what's the use of being so peevish now lieutenant. Leave the little girls alone. They ain't doing anything to us anyhow. So why threaten them. Anyway their guardian may come along and hearing your abuse put you before a firing squad."

"But I hate the sight of them." Protested the lieutenant. "Oh how my hands are itching to grasp them by their waists, the little green eyed aka snakes."

Violet and her sisters were hurt at these attacking remarks but succeeded in controlling themselves, as they knew it would be useless to say anything anything to the insolent scoundrel. But nevertheless to show the Mandelinians they were not afraid of them, they kept on their way ignoring the wild threats of their enemies who were in reality powerless to do anything not only on account of the pugnacious character of their guards but because they knew that to try to do anything to the little girls would be their undoing for the little girls would shoot them down without questioning. Evans soon came along and the Mandelinians quieted down..... Evans was suspicious that the Mandelinians had been saying something out of the way to the little girls and fearing that they would do something yet, had them removed to the guardhouse. "No one can trust those insolent wretches." He said. "When they talk like they did to the civilian girls and threaten, there is something wrong and its best to see that they are locked up until their entrainment to the prison camp in Abyssinikile...."

"They are the most surly and insolent prisoners that I have ever guarded." Said one of the sentinels. "All day long, every day they are always growling, swearing, cursing, blaspheming threatening and throwing things about reckless when they hit, even among themselves. And when they are silent they are always scowling and give every one that passes that blackest look."

"They are a bad gang of prisoners, and must be watched closely at that." Said another guard. "That lieutenant early this morning raved so at every christian soldier that passed, that you would have believed he had gone mad."

"They are mostly Me-Hollesstinians." Said Evans. "And they are mostly always surly and hot headed. They are grouchy to the highest limit some of the most dangerous sects of Mandelinians to meet in battle and probably the most brutal to all hell-people christian children."

Evans now went after the little girls, and warned them not to leave the lines without a strong escort as both Mandelinian armies were more nearer and there was danger of their being slain.

"We are not going to leave the lines at all." Said violet in her sweetest manner. "We were looking for you."

"And I was looking for you little girls all morning." Said Evans
 "I have good news to tell you. Hanley it is reported is retreating from general Vivian your father, has been outmaneuvered, four times without a battle and is finally forced to retreat southward in stead of advancing northward as he has been doing before. I got this news by wireless early this morning. General Hanson is following general John Hanley and vindictive is watching the movements of Federal. It seems that there is going to be exciting occurrences elsewhere. Battles have raged at Fagin, Pinocile, Casey, Grogan, and Tanlonia during all last month. Fagin Pinocile raged at different portions of the lands on the fifteen-fifteenth and Grogan on the 19th. Tanlonia on the 26th--27th and all christian victories....."

"It seems all too good to be true." Said Violet. "And it's looking as if the war won't be raging much longer."
 "I hope so." Said Evans. "But let's be going it will be soon time for mass call and I'll have to be at my headquarters before then for safety sake I want you little girls with me."

They followed him willingly and huddling with him. Then desiring to see how the raided town looked Evans went out the lines taking Violet and her sisters with him and under an escort. They had not went even a quarter of a mile, when a party of glandelinian cavaliers rode down upon the party guarding the Vivian girls. In the frightful melee in which three hundred glandelinians fell in a minute, Violet and her sisters being always well-headed got away, Evans following. Then things commenced to happen.

The glandelinians yelling and cursing fiercely rode down like a whirlwind upon Evans and the little girls, trying to cut them down with their sabres. Evans unhorsed three glandelinians almost simultaneously, sabred another, shot three others with his pistol and cut the throat of a glandelinian officer. In the furious melee Violet and her sisters dashed on ahead still free. Several glandelinians seeing the little girls shouted, and the attack on Evans was stopped the glandelinians forgetting him and racing after the little girls fugitives. Evans knowing the flatness of the glandelinian horses, realized the impossibility of the little girls getting away and so determined to save them. He urged his horse on full speed suddenly riding wildly among the furiously galloping horses of the glandelinians. The glandelinians were stricken with panic at this sudden onset even though it was only from one man. Two glandelinians endeavored to urge their horses across the field out of the way of the madly charging enemy, but both horses stumbled throwing their riders headlong, the other horsemen dashing in many directions in panic one in his confusion, toward Evans, who fired and down with horse and rider. While three other glandelinians colliding with their horses tripping one another went down in a struggling heap three other men literally doing their very best to summersault, while four others rolled down a rise of ground horses and all, and three officers sprawled head over heels down another side of the rise. All this happened at one time.

Violet and her sisters witnessed it all, and had to laugh it looked so funny. Evans immediately joined them and the escort none of whom fell in the melee with the glandelinians at the first onset, and away they dashed toward the christian lines without further adventure. Violet and her sisters did not know what to make of Evans daring dash, and neither did the glandelinians ten of whom were hurled and maimed.

"Well I'll be blown if he did not literally fly among us." Cried the captain. "He is a regular devil I tell you. He could have killed all of us that way."

"Well we will have to put up with it." Said another captain.
 "But this must be reported to general Germania Vivian. That christian dog must be destroyed, and the little brats too."

Violet and her sisters themselves laughed a little at all the way back to the camp over what they had seen and spoke much about it to Evans.

"It was the only thing to save you little girls." Said Evans. "I don't know how the devil I did it myself and so successfully. I expected a furious shower of sabres, and not the confusion that came."

"You dashed among them like a swift runaway." Said Violet.
 "All I saw was something like a horse and rider dash like lightning among our pursuers, and then the wild a panic and confusion. They must have thought it was a legion of horsemen dashing among them. The way they sprawled and rolled. We could not keep from laughing it looked so funny."

"How many glandelinians were there?" Asked Violet wiping her eyes as she had laughed herself to tears.

"About four hundred and twenty six and unhorsed them all single handed at that." Said Evans smiling with a grin all over his face. "It was a splendid feat, and something I did not believe possible. I must be a marvel to the christian army. It's the greatest ever and I am myself amazed and even embarrassed by it. It seemed almost like if I was an angel rebelling the 'lands'."

Later that afternoon a soldier who had been on guard, brought up to Evans a large square sheet of cardboard paper. To his surprise his picture was on it and a great reward offered for his destruction. This was on it and he read it carefully to Violet and her sisters:

"A reward of $11,000,000 will be given for the destruction of general Jack Evans, guardian of the Vivian girls. He is a herculean pugilist, able to lick any one that comes in his way, and early this afternoon with ten seconds time unhorsed thirty of the best Arabian horsemen drove the remainder into irreparable confusion and unhorsing them also just because they were pursuing the Vivian girls.
 He did this by riding wildly among them. This is his description:
 Very handsome, but pug-faced, also form like an ox, blue eyes, brown, hair and rings in his ears. The pursued were/Violet Mary Vivian;
 Joyce Katherine Vivian;
 Jennie Francis Vivian;
 Catherine Cecilia Vivian;
 Nettie Annie Vivian;
 Daisy Gertrude Vivian;
 Evangeline Celestine Vivian."

Evans was always troublesome to the glandelinian army and now is the time to put a stop to his nonsense. He has caused the loss of many battles and his interference must be avenged. And the Vivian girls are to be killed as soon as possible. They are amiable more than he is though they are my sisters. An extra reward will also be given for their destruction or capture whatever it be termed. I have been mortified by them long enough. These are what they did the little scamps as they are.

Interfered with child slavery.
 Killed our beloved King Proclis.
 Brought the christian armies on W Jennie Green down by spying on Picknell.
 Caused commotion and commotion during the capture of Julio Gallo.
 Destroyed tents worth millions of dollars, on many occasions.
 Killed many many officers.
 Stubbornly disobedient to masters when prisoners.
 Held responsible for the disasters to our armies at the first battle of Sunbr Sunbeam creek or Jennie Vivian.
 There are many others things that could not be written here.

GENERAL GERMANIA VIVIAN COMMANDER OF GLANDELINIAN ARMY."

"It would look more becoming if he would print more on the square." Said Evans. "But just the same this does look like as if he means business, so we will have to be on the lookout for his glandelinians/ and if general Huetbaum Manley would only start something I would be able to begin begin a battle and crush Germania once and for good. But the trouble is we can't do any thing until Germania make a junction with him. And it seems dangerous to allow him to do so, for a union of armies is always dangerous. If we could only think of some scheme of sneaking in his headquarters and shooting him there."

"For our sakes don't try it," cried Violet frantically. "It's as dangerous as defying God before his face to strike you dead. You would succeed in killing him but not in getting away."

Evans did not answer to her plead but said:

"But anyway I defy him and hate him."

"Not good!" asked Violet reproachfully.

"No indeed, Germania - mean I will get him yet though I have failed several times. I have not forgotten that Brigano affair and never will."

Evans then cast the old cardboard aside and strode toward his headquarters. Violet and her sisters followed him. He met Wienstien coming out at the front entrance.

"I'm as afraid we are in bad," he said soberly. "A series of ravaging plagues is sweeping the whole of Calverinia. Cholera, scarlet fever, Bubonic, and many others including the dreaded Rabreia. Tens of thousands are dying every week. It's feared the plagues will strike the armies."

Evans was appalled at this news and at first couldn't find words for utterance.

"Read this paper," said Wienstien critically. "I'll flabbergast you."

Evans took the paper and read.

GRAVE CONDITIONS IN CALVERINIA. PLAGUES SWEEP WHOLE COUNTRY. TENS OF THOUSANDS ARE DYING.

General Johnston Jackson Manley, firmly determined that the Vivian girls must be slain, and seeing that the soldiers failed to assassinate them, but were captured and shot instead, had turned his guns loose on the great laboratories in Pouncee-Cee-Coolie, blowing the buildings into ruins and setting the germs of hundreds of contagious diseases free, after seeing to it that his armies by means of certain dogs would be immune from the plagues. Plagues have spread quickly among the Calverinians without warning, tens of thousands are dying and fugitives are fleeing from the threatened town in multitudes. There are already three hundred thousand cases, and there is grave danger that the series of plagues and plau plagues will come on among the Christian soldiers. If the plagues spread too far there is sure possibility of the enemy winning the war. It was Manley's purpose to do this so that Violet and her sisters would be victims and die. Doctors and sergeants are battling the plagues with all their medical skill but there seems no way of getting or of overcoming the awful plagues. Warning has been sent everywhere telling of the awful dangers.

For several minutes after reading the startling articles Evans was speechless for it was evident that Manley would resort to any vile purpose to gain his victories and crush the lives of the Vivian girls. A similar occurrence had been happening long before the battle of little Florinia. Frankie Anna but had failed. If the real extreme cold weather would set in the plagues would be checked at least most of them. But the forest fires raging over the space of hundreds of miles, a literal volcano of flame and smoke created such a warmth that now it being spring no cold weather was in sight and the April snow that had already fallen during the last storm was all melted away by the warmth.

"What will Violet and her sisters say?" Evans put in at last. "I'm sure they will be frightened."

He however knew that they would hear of it if he told them or not and so he went to them and showed them the paper with the startling news. They fairly blanched at the news. It was to them the easiest matter to escape the wildest glandelinians, but to escape any one of the plagues was right too impossible as it seemed. They were horrified and did not know what to say. Evans did his best to cheer them telling them that he would do his utmost to keep the plagues away from his army.

Day after day they had been horrified by news still more terrifying. Towns and villages crammed with thousands of the victims of the diseases men, women, and children, tossing in fever torture and torment were struck by the furiously advancing forest fires and no one able to help themselves perished in the conflagration the loss being 30,000 in slain by the fires.

The fires struck upon the towns and villages without warning. "Faid the news as Evans read it to the little girls after telling them about the plague. Over thirty thousand men, women, and children too ill to even get out of bed to flee, perished in their dwellings. The numbers of victims have increased and is now one million one hundred thousand, but none of our armies are touched as yet and neither the foe who seem completely nil from the plagues, the glandelinians being delighted in their scourged victims."

Evans after he heard this startling news was compelled to have every man in his army disinfected as often as possible, supplying each man with the germ killer so that they could disinfect themselves. All the soldiers were horrified and believed that their doom was near. This was one of the worse scourges the glandelinians had yet overinflicted. Evans feared for Violet and her sisters and going to a church offered ten thousand for the safety of the little girls and three thousand dollars as a donation that God would prevent them from getting any of the plagues.

They were never touched but little Francis nearly died as we will see from one of the plagues.

Knowing that the danger had grown more menacing Evans had now issued orders that no soldiers will be allowed to leave the lines, and even watched the Vivian girls and little Mary and Francis more closely.

Wienstien and Vivian and the other Christian generals were also worried. The conflagration of diseases had been spreading like wild fire and it seemed as if the whole of Calverinia would be wiped out. The horrible stories of helpless fever victims raked with pain, perishing in towns struck by forest fires was heartrending. Daily prayers had been offered for rain but none came. The fires grew only worse. Countless numbers of people not yet sick or struck by the plagues were fleeing from the towns and cities where the diseases already started to claim it's civil victims. Grave fear was felt everywhere.

Rabreiria was the most dreaded of all diseases and the most horrible. Another diseases going on then called in Calverinia Fennondencia or Rabid Leprius was also ravaging among the helpless its symptoms being horrible, and more horrible were the circumstances that follow, though curable. This disease was the most abundant.

Fourty thousand had it in Francis-Atlanta where Hanson's army was concentrating, and none survived. Thirty six thousands of cases of the disease Rabreiria were reported in general Vivian's command, and though sixteen thousand of them had died the number of cases were increasing like wildfire when the news and warning was given which Evans and Wienstien had been so startled by. Even hydrophobia, Leprosy, and other horrid diseases, diseases, such as scarlet fever, Cholera, Eilergera, Bubonic and Typhus combined together as one could not outrival the horrors of the worse plague of all Fennondencia. It begins like rabies in the first stage. Second stage is like full developed rabies, which subsides quickly without killing the patient. Then after the lull, which lasts three days the patient appearing apparently entirely well, the body of the victim becomes covered with various bright colored rash, which has a horrible strong odor, he then suffers the tortures of the damned, red foam pours from his mouth, tongue swells six times his its natural size and protrudes becoming orange to yellow color with orange and black spots numbering it, he becomes delirious and dies in horrible convulsions as apparent looked jaw ends the last stage. This frightful plague is extremely contagious, and the victim is stricken two days after being near a patient with the dread fever. It can be cured but only in the most favorable circumstances. Nine out of ten die. The treatment is simple.

Ice bags continually on head. Injections of germicidal poisons are used at times which proved effective though rendering the patient weak but the best treatment is to hurry him to a colder climate.

And then worse to tell it the greater number of cases had this dread disease and another breaking out called Rabria was now showing itself among Wienstien's army, which horrified Violet and her sisters who felt like fleeing and intended to do so, begging Evans to come with them.

Should it start in general Evans command also it would wipe outnearly every one in the army. But it never did and the little did that did start among vivianians was quickly stamped out before it got very far thought the victims died. Evans realized the grave danger and all the soldiers that dyed had to go through a rigid examination. Another day passed and it was seen that the peril was growing more grave still. In the town of Jane Lee twenty miles northeast of Vivianians army there was discovered two hundred and fifty nine new cases of the varied diseases and Pennocondencia was the greater number. Those who did safe from the plagues were fleeing in terror from the town, but found themselves barred from the christian lines as no one was allowed to go in that direction on account of the nearer nearness of Huebaum Manleys army many of whom soon fell upon the poorfuitives in ambush regardless of the danger of catching itself themselves, not saving the people but forcibly driving them all back into the town, before any large parties of christians could go to their rescue. Hundreds of physicians came to Calverinia from Anticannia, to help battle the fearful plagues now raging, even many more doctors from other christian nations, red cross nurses swarmed by thousands into Calverinia, risking their lives to care for the sick, but few survived, for those not taking the diseases, were massacred by the wicked Mandellinians.

Evans already driven furious by the ravages of the plagues caused by the Mandellinians was aroused still more at these outrages committed by the savage Mandellinian solidi soldiery. A hospital filled with the sick suffering of the varied diseases, was wrecked by Mandellinian guns, many y mostly children being killed. Evans hearing of the various outrages committed by Huebaum Manleys Mandellinians ordered Viviania to immediately make a junction with him, before the plague starts among his men, and if Manleys Mandellinians commits any further outrages, he would see to it w that it was immediately atoned for, and in a way that would horrify heaven.

General Viviania obeyed orders and by the afternoon was up with Vivianians right, while now general Hanson's army concentrated in overwhelming numbers toward Francis Atlanta. The plague however was still more threatening and Viviania reported fifty six cases of Pennocondencia among his men. Evans found two scarlet fever victims, or Habria fifteen children and Bubonic cases and fifteen typhus cases within his lines, the report of which filled poor Violet and her sisters with te terror.

"It is here at last," cried Jennie in terror. "Oh please God save us from the courage and the army."

After that Violet and her sisters always kept inside not that they were cowardly but because there was dangerous danger of them getting one of the plagues. Evans would not let them outside and saw to it that they were disinfected often and given some medical medicine as a preventive. Francis and Mary received the same care. Despite all precaution within three days thousands soon became victims in his army. Francis herself became sick. She complained of a headache, and sore throat combined. Sometimes she felt as if she was strangling, and then at other times was almost prostrate because she failed to breathe for nearly three minutes.

Evans at once had a doctor called who on examining her declared that one of the strange plagues had got her and that she must be kept away from the Vivian girls at all hazards.

In the meantime while now the ravages of the diseases was increasing elsewhere it failed to increase within Evans and Vivianians lines. The thousands of cases that had the Habria and other diseases were reported now recovering or dying. Typhus was threatening the life of little Francis who grew worse hour after hour, in what the doctor said. Violet and her sisters were in constant dread. They were almost broken hearted also because they realized that poor little Francis was in a dangerous condition.

"There seems no hope of saving her," is what the doctor had said. And it was feared to be true. Evans was in constant dread about the Vivian girls catching some disease or other. Thousands of soldiers not recovering were on the verge of death, and danger now seemed threateningly near to the little girls. Evans was fairly wild over it all. And so was Viviania and the two Vivian generals. They kept the army doctors working to the utmost in an attempt to check the plagues but in vain. And now it was May. Three more days had passed and while poor little Francis lay dying, four hundred other cases were reported in Evans Army, and nearly eight thousand in Vivianians. Many stricken were officers.

General Hanson and general Vivian with their big armies confronting the foe at Francis Atlanta had escaped the plagues after all and did everything possible to move fiercely against the three Manleys, who had caused it all but the wicked rascals would not stand their ground, and mortified general Vivian by making movements that flabbergasted the christians.

Fearing that he would soon try and make a junction with Huebaum Manley, as it was reported many battles were raging furiously elsewhere, general Hanson and Vivian sent soldiers to general Evans asking him to strike Huebaum's hard blow, but through some reason Evans did not get the message and so general Vivian or Hanson could not get any communications with him. Evans himself tried to communicate with general Vivian in and finally succeeded in getting him, and getting his order. But on account of the plagues raging within his lines Evans found it impossible and stated the conditions to general Vivian. General Vivian was still sorely grieved by this news and almost wept. Evans apprehended that Huebaum and Germania would attack the christian lines while in this help condition, and so had extra sentries out day and night. Yet if these two Mandellinian generals did start any attack just now, that there would not be any chance of repelling them successfully, and a huge disaster would occur. And probably the Vivian girls would be lost. He never ceased in praying for the abatement of the disease, and neither did Violet and her sisters who were unmistakably terrified.

But so far as yet none of the Vivian girls took sick. Evans care and precautions seemed to be working with evident success. And he did not feel so apprehended as before. But don't believe because because he saw success, that he started to let up in his caution. Not a bit. And as attack came, and his calling the doctor doctors soon began to bring little Francis out of the danger also. Slowly but surely she began to recover, while outside the plagues among the mad soldiers was still increasing fiercely, spreading like wild fire.

And all the while general Huebaum and General Germania, though gloating over the situation among the christian lines kept their distance from his hostile enemies general Vivian and his brother. And why y why? And why didn't the plagues inflict the Mandellinian armies, like it did the christians? It is true the plagues did strike among the christian lines but the victims only numbered by the thousands, died by tens, while among the noncombatants the victims numbered by the hundreds of thousands, and the deaths by the scores of thousands. The whole tenth toll among the whole population in Calverinia, and among all the christian armies combined, was about 250,000 many who had burned to death, when help came to rescue from their burning dwellings, when the first fire dance descended upon the towns and villages. Evans felt more like smiling when little Francis was led pulled through, but nevertheless with her recovery the plague among the soldiers was at its height, and Evans feared that his army would be totally destroyed.

Indeed war is hell, and no mistake at that. Late that afternoon Evans was disturbed by the howling like dogs in the basement of his headquarters, which sounded fearfully indeed. A this moment a lieutenant came hurriedly up to him and said saluting;

"Four excellency general Viviania who is now sick also keeps five bloodhounds in the basement and some how t or other they have contracted the dreaded Habria. I would advise you to have them shot sir. Their howls are horrible and so unearthly."

"Maybe the trouble is that they are hungry and have not been fed," said Evans. "I hope you brave soldiers indeed are not getting the mad dog scare."

The lieutenant saluted and went out. If Evans had believed what the lieutenant had told him the occurrence that happened would have been averted, and the little girls would have been altogether safe to the end.

That evening Evangeline hearing a strange noise in her bed room, went to open the door, and met a figure, which once had been a dog, but now a scaly hideous wreck, with head hanging low and red and yellow mucus dropping about its breast. Its eyes were like fire and it appeared to be recovering from convulsion. With a ravenous piercing howl, it sprang at her but missed.

Missing its first spring the hound cowered sullenly, then like a flash at was at her throat, and had borne her to the floor fanging her tender neck, with keen teeth, while fanging while snarling smelling the blood the other beasts while too helpless to move even a foot in their condition set up an infernal din. Violet and her sisters hearing the clamor, and Evangelines screams, rushed to the spot in spite of the danger of catching the plague, but all their proddings and beatings, with sticks and even chairs could not make the infuriated dog let go. Evans hearing the agonized screams of Violet and her sisters, the sound of a desperate struggle going on, and the bell like chorus of the maddened dogs ran into the room with his sabre, and finally prodded the brute off the bleeding child, who desperately struggling with the dog rolled and kicked on the floor. Evangeline was quickly carried out of

of the room. A lieutenant who had come upon the scene at the same time, who while Evans held the infuriated beast at bay, binned the door behind him on the raving pack. Evans then was put into bed, her mangled throat being smothered with ammonia, and stroking salutions of Carbolic Acid all mixed, and then bandaged with almost a box of vasiline.

Evans then, his mind clouded with a great fear, which drove him into a frenzy of apprehension, drew his gun, and boldly entering the room fired load after load at the loose dogs. At last they sank whinnying and howling. At this moment the doctor appeared and examined the dogs.

"These dogs caught rabies, from some soldiers all suffering from the same plague plague." He said. "And I fear it is all of with the little Virginia girls despite all your trouble. The dogs are past doing further harm but the deadly virus or morbid rabies is poisoning the little girls veins, and no skill of medical science can check its rapid course."

These words filled Evans with silent alarm.

"Oh God, don't let this be!" He cried.

At this moment Evans' Virginia came up.

"What happened to the little girl?" He gasped.

"She was bitten by one of your bloodhounds." Said the doctor pointing to the dead dog. "The dog mangled her throat horribly and though she may pull through despite her injuries, she is in grave danger of the dreaded disease rabies." "It's the deadliest plague of all."

"I would see her kill her right now than let her suffer such a hideous death afterwards." Said Evans. "Oh God how could it be. What will happen next?"

"Don't lose your heart yet." Encouraged the doctor. "And yet how can we come the dogs to be in her room. They were too sick to come up here of their own accord. Anyway Evangeline must not be disturbed as she is suffering terribly."

"But can't I even see her a moment?" Asked Weinstien.

"No your excellency." Said the doctor. "If you disturb her now you will kill her."

Violet and her sisters were crying bitterly in spite of the efforts of Evans to comfort them. One disaster seemed to follow another, as it was now the dog. In the meantime to add to their misery, the flood of fire or distant fires, consuming wide stretches of forests with the speed of a fast express train was reported heading toward Terrilliger, and now a fearful gale was blowing so fiercely that no man outside could hardly keep his feet.

The night was indeed a time of misery. Evangeline was fairly writhing in misery, and agony, and calling constantly for a cup of water, which the red cross nurses refused to give, as the doctor advised that it must not be given, saying that cold lemonade or milk would be better. But where to get this was the question and Evans saw to it anyway that she got the water.

Indeed it was a sad sight to little Evangeline in a hall her misery. She constantly called for Evans, her father or her sisters, and indeed swooned several times, and the bandage around her throat was crimson with blood. In the meantime the advancing forest fires had become more menacing and terrible. A frightful sea of flames burned onward and onward, whirling high into the air in whirlpools of fire, with an ominous roar burning away everything. The flood of flames was burning straight toward the town despite the efforts of the fire fighters. Evans had sent out to check it and many of the poor victims who could be saved, when overcome while fighting, it were brought into the lines. Long stretches of trees all night long could be seen catching fire, it being a harrowing sight indeed. Violet and her sisters did not pay any attention to it, at all their sole thoughts being on Angeline. What would be the verdict of the doctor in the next morning. Would it be that she would really contract the deadly malady or was it only an attack of an infuriated dog inflicting a hurt at the presence of a strange person. No one could see sleep at all that night, lying wide awake and listening to the moans of poor little Evangeline in alarm, and praying incessantly that God would at least spare her, even if the dog had the frightful plague.

"Lord afflict me if need be put spare poor little Evangeline." Evans prayed over and over again.

General Evans, Weinstien, and the little girls were the first one of out of bed the next morning. And a few minutes later they met the doctor. "I cannot account for it he." He said. "Weinstien how came the dogs to be in their room. I have labored all night in my laboratory with my best psychiana and found that the plague had taken hold of the dogs all right. My chief belief is that the dogs were brought up to their room by somebody, not to be trusted, and the one who was not to be too helpless from the effects of the disease, to show fight against an invader, became enraged at the sight of her as she was a stranger to them. Bloodhounds bloodhounds when sick will go for any body who aroused by their sudden appearance anyway. It was my opinion at first from the infernal din, I heard that they had rabies. Come and I'll show you how they look."

The doctor led them to the laboratory where the dead dogs had been brought. There lay the dogs with the whitened skin, one eye being larger than the other, their bodies were covered with cancerous sores of all hues and thickropy slimy yellow and ran red foam and sticky stuff protruded from the bullet wounds, while from their mouths redropy saliva exposed itself. Their hearts gave a leap of horror. A Evangeline and her sisters even were in danger, as the disease was highly contagious at least while the victims were yet alive. Evans hastened out of the place to spread the alarm to the soldiers outside surrounding the building and to warn them not to come inside.

"Roy's." He gasped. "Little Evangeline was bitten by one of the six dogs suffering from one of the most dreaded of plagues. Keep away if you don't want to catch it."

A howl of fear rose from the throng, and they scattered. Evans returning went into Evangeline's room and found Violet and her sisters sobbing by her bedside. At his approach the little girls stirred.

"Come now cheer up." He said. "Evangeline may be in no danger, even if one of those dogs suffering from the horrid plague did bite her."

Little Evangeline indeed without even having the disease itself, was in a serious condition. The dogs indeed had been suffering from the dreaded plague, and if the other dogs had not been rendered helpless by the disease, they probably would have torn her to pieces, before help could have arrived. Two days had passed since little Evangeline had been bitten, and yet the frightful forest fires despite the desperate fight of soldiers and the Christian armies, more and more, while many more various diseases had broken out, the affliction being worse than before. Evangeline still suffered from her injuries, but the doctors chemicals had given out, and nothing could be done at all. The glandulars had certainly done their wicked work too well, destroying substances of every description, besides causing great forest fires and plagues. Sorrow and misery indeed was everywhere, and terror also from the ravages of the frightful plagues, and thousands of more dead added to the lists. If the forest fires would only slacken, or go in another direction probably something could be done.

But the forest fires only became more threatening. Terrilliger was threatened and even burning burning, and the worse affliction that threatened was from the plagues. Many of the poor refugees who had been sheltered among the Christian lines, tossed in mortal agony from the diseases, and if the forest fires drew too near, the army would be compelled to retreat before it, and probably leave the many sick and dying behind.

The next day when the forest fires could be seen from there very plainly, an eruption of smoke covering the skies above the horizon, Violet who was alone with Evans said faintly:

"Evans I don't know what is the reason, but don't feel a bit well. My head is aching something awful, and at times I get a violent shill and I have a strange pain in my chest also."

If there was anything that shocked Evans it was this.

"You don't feel well?" He gasped in alarm.

"No, I vomited early this morning too."

"Why what is the matter?"

"I don't know she." She said. "But my illness fills me with horror, though I know not why."

Evans who was sitting by an open window with her said:

"If Weinstien and the others know you are sick they will get scared. For remember you came near dying the other time."

Violet did not answer but laid her aching head against his breast. At this moment the doctor who attended little Evangeline, came in, and noticing Violet's white face, and labored breathing, strode up and said:

"What is the matter, Violet. You look distressed distressed."

"She ain't well." Said Evans. "she compains complains of a headache and a dull pain in her chest. 'Maybe it is a cold, no, cold.' 'No it is not so.' Said the doctor. As Evans ordered the nurse to carry her to her bedroom. 'I hope it ain't anything serious.' Said Evans following the nurse who carried her, and laid her as gently as an egg on her bed. 'I'm kind of scared though.' 'I wish my sisters could come to me.' She said pleadingly. 'Evans would you please find them.' 'I don't think it would be wise.' Said the doctor, who was examining her. 'She took sick all of a sudden.' Said Evans. 'I hope to God it is not serious.'

The doctor examined her pulse, and the interior of her throat, and said: 'She will have to be kept quiet for a while. She is going to have a dangerous disease, and no one can be by her unless without proper reasons as it is contagious. Evans as you are her guardian you better remain and watch. But you will have to be disinfectant every hour.'

'What is the name of the disease?' Asked Evans. 'I'm not sure until to night.' Said the doctor. 'You may give her a dose of this every hour.' He added. 'I'll have to go now, to my other patients, but if she gets worse, you send or come for me quickly.'

'I will.' Said Evans as he followed the doctor to the door. 'Do you think it is necessary to put her to bed?' 'It's best for her by an open window where she can get a lot of fresh air.' Exclaimed the doctor. 'But don't have her out in a close room.' It's dangerous. I know the disease but I refuse to tell.

Evans did as he was advised, putting her in a bed where there was a wide open window. Having been disinfectant her sisters were allowed to see her. And only three of them came and they were weeping.

'Jennie and Evangeline have the dreaded disease too.' Said voice. 'Violet dear we fear you have caught it from the those dead dogs too.'

'Were you all in the room when the dog attacked Angelina?' Asked Evans as he raised the sobbing children, and drew them to him with compassion. 'Yes.' Answered Catherine. 'And they saw that that kind of a disease is incurable. Oh why did she be so foolish as to go near those dogs, when she knew it was contagious. If they die I want to go too. We want the disease so we will die.'

'Come now don't weep so.' He said soothingly. 'Maybe we will all come out all right. It's a bad plague, but he is a liar who said it was incurable.'

'No I don't believe it is a lie even from them.' Said voice sobbing. 'Thousands of the soldiers had it, and died in two days, and the same was said about them. There is surely no cure.'

Evans felt the same about it as they did, but did not care to admit it.

'You must not disturb her he said softly. 'The doctor had said that she must have perfect quiet.'

It was a few minutes after the little girls had come, when Violet suddenly cried out:

'I'm choking. I'm choking. I'

Evans noticed that her countenance was becoming livid, while her breathing was hurried, each respiration being attended by a growling and a howling sound.

'Quick watch her while I go for the doctor.' Gasped Evans. With this Evans skipped off. The moment Evans was gone a violent fit of coughing seized her, then all of a sudden suffocation, and she made vehement struggles to recover her breath. Poor Violet presented all the symptoms of suffocation, a sense of impending danger seemed to seize her, and she grabbed the column of her bed as if for protection, while recovering her breath and at last she gave a shrill characteristic melancholic howl and whoop which filled the room with an uncanny sound.

'Violet's mad.' Screamed poor Daisy as Evans came in with the doctor. 'She's got hydrophobia. She howled like a mad dog.'

As the doctor approached she again began to cough, and choke, her voice became hoarse, and red frothy appeared on her lips, while she became restless, friv fretful and feverish. However her coughing was not loud and barking as it was before, being very much suppressed, her voice seeming to be almost gone, while her face became very pale, as her lungs pained for want of air, her head being thrown back as she seemed to be coughing her tongue out. Her suffering for want of air became so. As the doctor reached her bed, Violet was seized with convulsions, apnea, and writhed and screamed in agony, while the suffering little girl kept further from her bed, drawing contact with that terrible morbid position, or virus that was tearing at her heart, and scouring the marrow of her bones. In a few minutes the convulsions ceased, and Violet was now in a delirium.

'It's Rabrirela.' Said the doctor hoarsely. 'Two of her other sisters are also suffering from it. How quick did this develop on her?'

'I don't know.' Said Evans who was trying to draw the three little weeping children from the bed. 'I'd hate to tell several Vivian of this.'

'It would be better not to tell right away until we know the end result.' Said the doctor. 'Evangelina is in a worse condition than her self, but don't worry as I'll do my best to check the progress of the disease.'

'They say Rabrirela is incurable.' Said Evans in a voice of despair. 'Thousands of the soldiers died of it already.'

'The disease is making fast progress being Rabrirela, or Pe Phenonedancia-Gallia-Pallia, one of the deadliest diseases known but if treated in time it may kill a soldier. It is said that there is no cure for such diseases, but I have had many cases that left me well and strong. I'm sure I can save the three of them before it reaches the third of high stage. If it reaches the third or what is called the eruptive stage there is no hope then. And there is liable to be a hemorrhage of the nose, with purging and severe vomiting, and if this starts in there will be hope. Her forehead is already hot, and her chest is growing as cold as mat marble. So it is up to you to place an ice bag on her head, and see that her chest is well heated by hot water bottles. That will prevent the disease from progressing too fast.'

'All right I'll do that.' Said Evans with emotion. 'But could you not summon more nurses. They are needed more badly now.'

'But how can they get here?' Said the doctor. 'Look at that wild flood of fire far off as it is. It's only worse and the only way the nurses can get here now is to pass through the enemy's lines, and they will perish in the hands of the AludAludians if they risk it. It can't be done.'

Evans realized that no one could brave either the enemy or the roaring flood of fire, and that some of the private would have to do as well. He stood by the window watching the smoke from the roaring conflagration, with melting holy eyes. He remembered the previous miseries of the poor little girls and their threatened deaths every time. Was he now going to see the best beloved friends of all he ever had, die a horrible death after all the escapades they had before? Was the disease really incurable, or was it that the doctor wished to kill the three little girls? If so would he dare? Or was it that the conflagration rendered him an helpless as the others, destroying his headquarters, his laboratories, and his best beloved ones? Was the disease really Rabrirela, or Hydrophobia? Or was it something else, perhaps worse? Or was it a dangerous delirium over sorrow caused by the pitiful plight of little Evangeline? Or was she pining her life away because she was so far from her father?

These were the thoughts that passed through his mind.

Then Twenty four hours had passed since Violet became ill and now she and her two sisters were redoubly worse. They suffered pain throughout their whole bodies, that made them writhe and moan, and chilliness and languor having affected the other little girls. Evans became more worried than ever. The heat in the skin of the three diseased Vivian children had decreased, and though Violet had been the third to catch it and Jennie the first, Violet was the worse of the three, and her face had assumed a scarlet rash, which had rapidly defused itself over her whole body.

The redness was vivid and like the color of a boiled lobster. Evans knowing where the doctor was, went and told him of the rapid change, that the disease had reached the eruptive stage.

'It's pretty alarming now.' He said after having looked into her throat. 'Her tonsils and throat inside have assumed a blackish red color, and her tongue which is purplish in color is spotted with numerous yellow points which marks its papillae which are presenting an appearance which is compared to the yellow seeds of a strawberry. Her situation is critical. It has reached the third stage.'

At this Evans had broken down. He staggered out of the room with his hands to his eyes. Jennie and her two sisters had been in there again, and they heard the doctors remarks also. In a moment more Evans and the doctor also were taking out three unconscious little girls. They had fainted.

"So it's Rabrirein after all!" Thought Evans his heart aching to leap into his mouth. "And now her condition is critical." These words stung him like an adder. He had hoped that the disease if it really was going to be a disease would be a slight one. But no. It's Rabrirein in its most deadliest form, and three of the beloved Vivian girls were victims of it. These dear little girls who had borne much more misery than any one for the sake of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. And this is the result. The thought was maddening. How long he was in this trance I couldn't tell but when he suddenly came to he found that it was drawing toward morning. Quickly he strode from their bedroom. The doctor was standing between their beds.

"What then?" He began when the doctor put his hand on his forehead. "Hush." He said hoarsely. "They are worse. The inflammation in their throats had terminated into small abscesses, which was also in the plate of their necks which I had just finished removing. The inflammation has also extended to their cheeks, lips and eyelids, and Gangrene had threatened to set in. I fear they won't live for another twenty-four hours. It's the arising of the worse part of the third stage now."

"Oh God, don't say that." He exclaimed Evans. "It'll kill me!" He staggered toward the beds. Poor Violet Jennie and Evangeline were tossing in supreme agony. When the doctor opened Jennie's mouth, he saw that her tongue, and gums had been coated with a sickly yellow lemon color and were swelling.

"It don't take long for this frightful disease to kill." Said the doctor. "Death generally issues or comes two days after the disease starts. To them may live only till tomorrow morning."

Evans had seen in Angelina's throat and mouth also round whitish and a ash colored spots, mingled with the yellow color. "That coloring in the throat and mouth is the gravest part." Said the doctor. "It generally spreads gradually over the victims body, changing into various bright colors. If it fails to spread over their whole bodies, they will have a chance to win the battle for life."

It was two midnight that the three Vivian girls suffered excruciating pain in their eyes, back and lower loins, and particularly in the lungs, arms, neck, and legs, attended with a series of most violent chills, alternated with flushes of heat. Their pulse had quickened, their skin had become hotter, and redder in color and their faces and eyelids threatened to swell, while their skin turning to a crimson color began to exhale a sickening odor, supreme suffering having set in. But all yellow coloring in their mouths had disappeared. A few more minutes passed, and the three sick Vivian girls were in a delirium howling exactly like dogs, while they became writhed in violent convulsions. Their tongues which were swelling badly were loaded with a dirty purple color, and their mouths had become filled with a sickly yellowish white mucus thick like glue, mingled with a little green and red. Evans at once rushed for the doctor.

"Come quickly." He panted shaking with terror. "Violet and her two sisters are howling like dogs."

The doctor at once rushed for the sick room, while Evans rushed to look the door containing the other little girls. Then Evans rushed into the sick room expecting to see the victims of the disease attack him and the doctor in their wild delirium, but there they now lay still panting, and once conscious, and with their eyes open with a look of recognition. A slight smile passed over their faces.

"It's all over now." Said the doctor hoarsely. "The crisis has passed. They will live. The disease has passed. They will live too."

With the words thank God Evans threw himself on his knees beside Violet's bed and bowed his head in the blankets. The disease had passed. That they will live. Now he offered prayers of thanksgiving.

A week has passed, and the plague was abating every where. Day after day Evans had made investigations as how the diseased dogs had gotten into the bedroom of the little girls, all of whom had a touch of the disease. Evans suspected some trick from another agent of Germanian, but no one could be found guilty of the deed. Germanian and von Hushams army had been quiet all this time and now neither army was in sight.

They had not dared attack the armies for fear of the armies under Vivian and the two Vivians and as the pestilences had grown worse Germanian and Germanian seeing it at start among general Hannons army had become more exultant. Violet and her sisters to the amazement were recovering faster than any one had even been known to recover before. A Francis and Mary also sick were now up and around and things began to look more pleasant again. The forest fires were moving in another direction by now much to their relief and the peril seemed about past. The bodies of those dead from the plague were a burden to keep the plague down as far as it now was. The air was considerably smoky and warm and indeed it looked as if instead of a summer coming it was going to be a hell. On account of the smoke of the distant conflagration the sun had not shown for six weeks.

7-323

The air was dark and gloomy. It was dreaded that the fire storm would soon move their way, and Evans continually kept the fire fighters out by the hundreds of thousands. Evans was by the little girls frequently, more frequently than he ever was before. He was fully determined to determine the cause about the dogs in their room. Just an hour before the tragedy happened, he had seen to it that the dogs which he discovered after the lieutenant warned him had really the dreaded disease that they were securely chained to the large pillars holding up the roof of the cellar. And all the dogs were too sick to move, and growled when he touched them with a stick and looked pleadingly at him.

And then ten minutes later he had to run to the assistance of Violet and her sisters, who brave little heroines that they were were fighting desperately regardless of the terrible danger to save poor little Evangeline, from the dogs' fangs. And every one of the dogs were in the room, the chains completely missing from their collars. He had went down to the basement, and found the chains still fastened around the pillars. It was impossible to declare that they broke loose or broke their chains, for all of them except one were too far gone to even get up, and surely the other dog did not release them and bring them up into the room.

He had examined and reexamined the floor around the pillars several times and seeing only footprints he paid no attention deca declaring they were his. But then he could not feel so sure about it, and not trusting them he lit the light, and first examining the footprints carefully he placed his right foot on one of them.

"Not mine by any means." He said to himself. "The footprints are too large. He tested them all, and only found six that fitted his correctly. To make more sure about it he did his best to erase his own, and tested the other footprints again, and again, but every time with the same result."

"There was some strange person in here." He said to himself. And he must be caught if he did not already escape. I'll give the same order as before. No one will be allowed to leave the camp until he is taken."

But later to his disappointment he learned that a suspicious looking man had been seen trying to slip out of the lines and pass the sentries. Though fired at several times he escaped, shooting down two gyna guards, and wounding a colonel who tried to organize a pursuing party. It was of no use then of passing the law of having the camp so strictly guarded, or to forbid any one to leave, and so it was not given, though instructions were given not to allow any one no matter who he is, within the lines without without calling for assistance, and have him recognized. Evans felt mortified over his failure to capture the scoundrel, who had attempted such a bloodcurdling crime, but he had to make the best of it as it were. He did not say anything to Violet and her sisters however, as he did not want to frighten them.

The cruel persecutions of the cruel Vivian girls by the Glandelinian generals and their many agents during the whole war, is one of the most heart rending tragedies, before heaven and earth, one of those series of horrifying tragedies, which would even make a plain American (besides the Angelinians) with red blood in his veins, swear that he will put an end to the horrible system of the Glandelinian military Autocracy forever no matter if he had to go through the uttermost depths of hell for it. The maiden tribute to Ancient Athens to the Cretan Minotaur was not a more dreadful sacrifice of girlhood, than the treatment of the Vivian Girls by the Glandelinians throughout the whole war that was so bloodcurdling in its maddening fury and daminating horrors.

But what threatened them now with greater danger was that the startling news reached Evans that all the Calvinians reduced to the last stages of desperation had been either dissuaded or disarmed and captured by the Glandelinians, and the whole country was in possession of many mighty armies of Glandelinians. The reports being confirmed as true, and that even many bodies of Calvinians had even surrendered, general Hanson and Vivian had been compelled to watch Manley at Francis Atlanta more closely. For Manley just now seemed to be out of the question for he was confident of shutting general Vivian in with the help of the forest fire and the Glandelinian army now come to his help under the other two Manleys and Federal, and Germania, besides the other commanders. Evans, Wianetien and Viviania faced great peril indeed and it seemed like suicide to contend with such a mighty foe of God. He openly called general Vivian a fool and a coward, for not fighting him right away, and defied God to cause any victories to be won by the Christians which showed what a wicked general John Manley was.

But as Germanias armies were the only ones nearest to him as yet, Evans decided to try his luck, and strike him down before the other Glandelinian armies come and place him in a trap. Germania was twenty mile southeast of Terwilliger, and so Evans started the advance order ordering Wianetien and Viviania to follow quickly and without delay as delay would be disastrous as to Angelina completely, and that if Francis-Atlanta come in possession of the enemy the whole struggle is lost.

S THE BATTLE OF ZIEGLER ZOE RAE.

In the meantime during the swift advance Violet and her sisters saw terribly in incidents threatening. Once during the advance on Gundraw Vivian was in a good engagement with a part of Germanias army at Ziegler Zoe Rae. It was a frightful battle raging all day in general and sang a sanguinary fury, and the foe having the greater part of the game despite the heavy losses made a tremendous onslaught, which checked Evans advance temporarily becoming considerably active himself that evening at Gunbeam Creek. He soon however made three successful pushes but in the meantime general Cannonias Glandelinians made a rear guard movement and though Evans was successful in beating back his flankers his left grand division was heavily assaulted, by overwhelming numbers, and during the fearful storm of battle in which three generals were killed on both sides the whole Christian line on his left gave way and Evans for the first time found himself licked and held at bay by Germania. During the night Wianetien being successful at another point of Gunbeam Creek came up and swelled Evans army with heavy reinforcements.

THE THREATENING STORM....

During the camping that night Evans placed a double line of sentries on guard under orders to shoot to kill when they hear any slight suspicious noise and that a further challenging would be prohibited for the duration of the war. Evans knew that he was face to face with Germania, Vivians army the opposing armies being within plain sight of each other, even within talking distance, and this placed Violet and her sisters in still greater peril than before. Germanias agents would make desperate attempts to get within the Christian lines to kill the Vivian girls, and so to avert it Evans had to give this grim order: "Shoot to kill when ever you hear slight noises. All challenging will be prohibited." Said Evans to the guards time and again. "The Vivian girls are in the gravest danger, while we are so close to Germanias lines and we must be cautious."

Toward nine o'clock when everything was pitch dark Evans went into his headquarters which he had selected out of a farm building, and where the little girls were confined to look over the losses reported to him by the commanders, who had been in the engagement. Violet and her sisters were gathered in an adjoining room playing and talking together. A Francis was sitting on Violet's bed studying some figures which she was determined to make out. She had completed it and looking up said to Violet:

"I have it. Ten and twenty are--"

She happened to glance toward the window at this moment and interrupted her answer to the figure with a scream of terror.

Violet and her sisters arose immediately having seen a face at the window.

"It was a Glandelinian." Cried Violet excitedly. "He saved himself by darting away in time. I was going to shoot."

Evans had heard little Francis scream and was in the room in quick order.

He saw Violet and her sisters around little Francis and tried to cheer her up.

"What is wrong?" Asked Evans pleasantly. "I thought I heard little Francis scream."

"A Glandelinian was looking in out window." Said Violet. "We saw a strange surly face in the window a few moments ago."

"He's the man who stole me." Wailed Francis. "I know he is after me. Please don't let him take me."

Evans did not say a word but went out closing the door after him. He at once sent for Captain Reynolds who came at the summons.

"Place a guard and a at every door and exit of this house and under every window also, and have the camp combed for a suspicious person." He ordered.

"There is an enemy lurking around here having been seen at one of the windows."

"Yes sir, will." Answered the captain with a salute, and he followed out his instructions. But over this occurrence Evans was enraged. Time and again without any cause Violet and her sisters had been persecuted by the Glandelinians. Evans had written down all the accounts of everything that the innocent Vivian girls had suffered, and as he once more glanced over them he fairly raved.

When Evans recounted them all, all the long working hatred of his very soul, toward the wicked Glandelinian officers, and even troops began to gather in a deep desperate and deadly form. Had not the Glandelinians treated the Vivian girls like the very devils to the souls of the damned, despite their braving them steadily, powerfully, resistlessly throughout it all. And oh God--didn't he find little Francis a bleeding corpse almost in that shed, and deserted by the Glandelinian Master Augustina St. Clare and his men when a conflagration was approaching despite all efforts to check it? Was not there a spirit in those rascals which ailed as it was, burned on him like the fires of perdition. And did not the Vivian girls suffer the tortures of the damned after the Brigano affair, and other horrible times?

"I HATE THEM I HATE THEM." Said Evans. that night as he sat up in his bed "I hate them. Ain't those little girls mine, to protect body and soul. Can't I do what I like and make them all happy, when it's my duty to do so? Who's to hinder I wonder?"

And Evans clinched his fist, and shook it, grinding his teeth as if he had something in his hands that he could rend in pieces. In the morning a long animated and thorough hunt for the sneaking spy was made which finally turned out successfully, and with grave ironic exultations the Angelinians dragged the rascal toward Evans tent.

"AY. AY." Said the captain. "You'll catch it now you snout girl. I'll bound Evans's is raving mad clean through. No sneaking out now. I tell you you will get it and no mistake. See how h you'll look sneaking into our lines with an intention to assassinate the Vivian girls and carry off Francis Schmidt. See what you will get."

"Well snake that you are." Said Evans walk ing up and seizing the Glandelinian grimly by the collar of his great gray coat, and speaking through his teeth in a fur furious pugnacious paroxysm of frightful determined rage; "DO YOU know that I have made up my mind, to build a slow fire around you, and kill you in torture?"

The prisoner did not answer but looked sullen.

"I have you dirty garter snake." Said Evans with a most grim and terrible calmness ever witnessed in an enraged man before. "Done---just---that---very---thing you snake, unless you'll tell me what you intended to do, within our lines, and why you was at that window?"

The prisoner was silent.

"DO YOU HEAR?" Said Evans with a roar like of an incensed lion and stamping his foot. "SPEAK."

"I refuse to give any information." Said the prisoner with a slow firm deliberate utterance.

"Do you dare to tell me you old black souled fake Christian Ye don't know?" Said Evans his face turning crimson.

The prisoner was silent.

"SPEAK YOU DEVIL." Cried Evans in a thunderous voice striking him furil furiously. "Do you know anything?"

"I know you Christian dog but the cause of Glandelinia has sealed my lips and I can't tell nothing no matter what the cost."

Evans drew in a long breath, and suppressing his rage took the prisoner by the arm and approaching his face almost to his snout in a terrible voice;

"Hark you---you Glandelinian fool, you think because my soldiers around you are grinning, that I don't mean what I say but I have made up my mind and counted the costs. These vivian girls have suffered a world of woe on account of you Glandelinian fiends, and now hereafter every Glandelinian that tries anything on the little girls I'll count every drop of blood there is in him, and take them one by one until they stop persecuting them, and foaming with rage. Evans smote his victim to the ground. Scenes of cruelty which is shocking to our ears committed to the vivian girls is to be avenged. Evans had always tried to conquer his temper but now he found it almost impossible. From the window of their room all of the little girls had witnessed Evans' fury toward their enemy, and felt it powerless to interfere.

"He's most gone sir," said the lieutenant whose men had been lashing the scoundrel furiously. "Pay away, pay away until he gives up. Give it to him. Give it to him." Shouted Evans. "Take I'll take every drop of blood he has unless he confesses."

The scoundrel being almost scourged to death, realized now the approaching fury of the Christians toward the enemies of God and the Vivian girls. He had to yell because he could not stand the tortures any longer. "Only---desist---and---and---and---and---I'll---confess." He gasped between blows.

Evans gave the command to cease striking and unfasten the man from the pillar.

"I---was---sent---by---Manley---and---his---excellency---Germania---Vivian---to---recapture---Francis---Angeline---Schmidt---and---and---and---and---and---and---the---Vivian---girls." He managed to gasp and sank in a heap unconscious.

"Off with him to the guardhouse," said Evans with a sneer. "The firing squad for him."

On the same day Evans had learned the facts were founded on the surrender of a large Glandelinian province, but neither Hanson or Vivian had retreated. The letters sent to him with general Vivians had not been original. That general Vivian himself telegraphed, that he never had such orders from Hanson or neither did Hanson have any intentions to retreat and that he or his brother had not retreated before the enemy at all and was concentrating against the enemy in full force and that a great battle was approaching at Francis Atlanta.....

Evans suspected a ruse had been attempted, in order to draw him, Winston Wienstien and Vivian out of the region of Francis Atlanta so that Germania could make a junction with any of the Manleys, and reinforce the whole Glandelinian army. This tended to still intensify his anger. He was anxious to strike Germania a blow and though early that morning there had been more activity at Sun Bean creek it had gradually subsided, being more like a squabble with a few harsh words than a general battle like the day before, and no heavy losses were reported. Evans realized that Violet and her sisters never would be safe as long as Germania and Huebman Manley were close to him and so decided to reported the situation to general Hanson and have him give his own advice. Evans wired report after report all day and in the evening got this answer:

"Take---the situation---in---hand---as---it---comes---and---don't---attack---unless---compelled---as---to---do---you---do---would---be---wise---Germania---unknown---to---you---has---received---heavy---reinforcements---and---outnumber---you---three---to---one---look---out---for---tricks---and---schemes---the---are---planning---more."

GENERAL VIVIAN COMMANDER IN NORTH Near Francis Atlanta."

Evans decided to do as he was advised and not attack unless compelled to by suspicious movements of the enemy. Evans continually sent out scouts who were ever on the watchfulness, and every movement was reported to Evans or his staff. Evans was always on the alert himself, and all men trying to enter his headquarters were questioned and searched, by the guards. Even the strictness was so much in the extreme, that new guards were questioned and searched, for there was always danger of a Glandelinian posing as a Christian sentry. Each sentry was ordered to repeat his general orders, which all the Christian soldiers knew by heart, and should one of the sentinels not know it, then he would be held for investigation. Evans was not going to allow any sneaking Glandelinians to find his way to the room of the Vivian girls if he could help help it and so strong armed men were placed at the door of their room to guard them. He knew that general Germania was bound to play the Vivian girls if he could get a chance. But he would see to it that Germania would not get the chance. The enemy were nevertheless advancing under cover of the thick wooded country in the vicinity of Terwilliger, and during Evans' temporary absence from his strongly guarded headquarters, the Glandelinians suddenly made a desperate assault without warning, and after fearful fighting for four hours in which men fell on both sides like grain before the tornado the surviving Christians were thrown back in the wildest disorder. Fresh divisions of Christians tried furiously to a check the mad onrush of the foe who were yelling like millions of demons but amid the dread of dreadful carnage the enemy came on successfully, driving a large part of the Christian line clean across the Sunbeam creek with the most frightful slaughter.

Finally large bodies of troops arrived with artillery which poured in a fire that fairly withered the enemy lines every time they charged and those lines were soon forced after an ocean of blood was spilled, fresh cannons and troops came up to the assistance of those driven back, and those soon fired on the Glandelinians the Christian fire tearing the huge Glandelinian columns under and mauling them.

The second day of the battle of 2419 Zoe Rae was something terrible. The suddenness of the enemy's attack only enraged the Christian commanders who witnessed it, and throwing their columns to the straining lines they reported to Evans about the situation.

The attack had now increased in fury, and a general battle was raging, and general Wienstien and Vivian received reports that severe and heavy firing was heard along the banks of the Sunbeam creek. General Sandforde's Glandelinians pressed on successfully even beyond the abandoned headquarters, in the face of a withering fire that tore his lines to pieces and laid him low.

A tremendous burst of chains of raw cannon was opened wildly and insalubriously upon the monstrous surging lines in gray with an ear-splitting crash, followed in salvoes amid the deafening thunder of the exploding shells and cannon canister adding to the carnage, the Glandelinians being cut down in hundreds of thousands recoiled in confusion, the Christians following closely and shooting myriads of of the retreating Glandelinians down at every volley.

Evans arrived to the scene within twenty minutes, intime to see Sandforde's line all whole line gapped and torn and recoil in confusion.

The fallen general was taken prisoner by the Angolians. "Forward" Ordered Evans amid the yells. "Drive them off before they can capture the Vivian girls, who are in the abandoned headquarters."

The whole purple line engaged pressed forward, attacking the Glandelinians, who were rallying to make a desperate stand. But it seemed as if the Vivian girls were in deadly peril because the enemy in possession of the ground on which the headquarters stood could not be driven off soon enough, as they were fighting with the fury of demons. The fighting was desperate, a sanguinary. Evans threw forward division after division against the foe in a desperate effort to regain the lost ground. General Heavens fell mortally wounded on the Christian side and each succeeding column was sent back mangled and bleeding, with their dead and wounded comrades lying in windrows where they fell. The enemy was driven back everywhere but here, and here they were holding their own with the utmost stubbornness. Evans was appalled over the situation and he sent a hasty messenger to bring Wienstien and Vivian. Those guarding his headquarters were surely all killed by this time, and there was peril that Violet and her sisters and the two other little girls with her would be assassinated. But Violet and her sisters and the other little girls were to be too clever. The building was an old abandoned castle, the tallest tower stretching high above a deep deep creek. Hundreds of Glandelinians were already inside the building really in quest of Violet and her sister sisters.

"The creek on the east side of the tower is our only means of escape now," said Violet amid the uproar of the struggle going on outside.

"Hurry up before they find us. Up the stairs of the tower tower we will go."

The only exit for the little girls in that tower was defended by iron bars an inch thick and so crossing one another that each open space was about but two inches square. There were six or seven iron gratings.

27II..II As Violet and her sisters came light up in the tower, the outer end of this open turn was far from the ground. Violet and her sisters turned from those openings in despair, but Joyce then stooping into the first place after putting out the fire, examined the interior of the chimney while while in the meantime little Jennie suddenly complained of a severe toothache. It was not very far from the bottom to the top, but the way was guarded by several iron bars and spikes securely fixed in what was once hard cement but which now was softened considerably by moulding. They had the looks of being too difficult to unfasten than the bars in the windows seemed. So Violet and her sisters resolved to attack the obstructions in the chimney. They were soon at work in the old like rooms, the stone of the floor being so soft, softened that the first peevish pieces they succeeded in detaching of crumbled like dust, against the soft cement of the chimney. That were to they to do for an instrument with which to scrape free the iron bars from the softened cement in which they were set. Jennie's lucky star sent her an inspiration. She had a bad tooth to the side, which had been growing more intense and she tried to pull it out and use the root as a scraper. By patiently and painfully forcing aside her gums, with a chip of firewood, and by strenuous efforts of thumb and forefinger she succeeded in pulling out the tooth after several minutes excruciating pain and labor. Then with the tooth between her teeth she herself hollowed out a fagot and a place in which afterwards to set the root, which she then fastened securely in this fashion by means of a string tied to the top. She thus had a scraper so adjusted that she could apply her full strength in using it.

Violet and her other sisters had in the meantime unraveled the rope / violet had brought up with her, which she and her sisters tied at intervals small wooden bars to serve as hand holds, and footrests. Jennie simultaneously tied a heavy fagot sixteen inches long to the end of the rope, and by dint of much patient practice they finally managed to throw this end up the chimney, and over one of the iron bars therein, Jennie then swung the rope about to that it was so entangled with the rope as to remain fast with the bar when she put her weight on it. Armed with the scraper she then mounted by the rope to the iron bar, and loosed the ropes and the that had the fagots thus giving herself a double rope to cling to, and began work with the scraper on the cement that held one of the other bars, better than that over which the rope was thrown.

Hadid had thought the little girls to see in the dimmest lights, and their fingers to find their way in total dark darkness. To her joy, she soon found that the hard enamel of her teeth had effect on the softness of the cement. With what difficulty and pain they worked, each taking turns supported by the fragile rope ladder, compelled to brace themselves against the sides of the chimney, and often to find relief from their cramped positions by hanging to the iron bar is hardly to be imagined. When each little girl desisted she had to descend by the double rope then let go of one end, while the other would start up.

In less than twenty eight minutes after setting to work they had gone had opened a way to the chimney. So slender were the little girls, and so supple that they found they need not remove all the bars for they could wriggle between some of them and the chimney wall. Those they did unfasten unfasten they threw aside and estimating that they had nearly two hundred feet of rope, and that they had been told by Evans some time ago that the towers were nearly two hundred feet above the ground they decided to make their daring escape.

They seized the rope to the highest of the bars they had left fastened squeezed through between that bar and the chimney wall. Jennie attaching the ropes end to her waste waist and then each by turn laboriously worked their way up the rest of the chimney, with arms and legs rubbing the skins of elbows and knees in doing so. At last they emerged from the top of the chimney just as the glandelinians searching for them appeared on the top starry stairway of the tower and hearing the hues and cries they dropped to the platforms of the tower, Violet and her sisters having in the meantime drawn the full length of the rope after him them and shooting down every glandelinian who appeared through the chimney of in the fire place, and who tried to grasp the rope from them.

By the sheer force of will and by confining every thought and moment to their work they kept themselves from turning giddy at the tremendous height. Violet fastened the rope to the chimney, and threw the loose end over the battlement of a corner tower.

1-326
27II211.

The little girls believed that the rope would reach down almost to the ditch which separated the building from the north wing, this ditch being twenty feet wide and twice that deep, but was a gully bent dry as, along the inside of the outer wall. And along the outside of the outer wall ran a wooden gallery which was now paced by glandelinian sentinels, and was reached from below by two flights of steps. It was their plan to drop from the ropes end to the ditch, elude the sentinels, reach the top of the outer wall, and drop from there to the ground outside, trusting to their lightness and their luck to make this last fall an easy one. Violet first clambered over the edge of the rope took a good hold of the slender rope, or rather one of the wooden rounds knotted to it, and let down her weight over the edge grasping at the same time the next lower round with her other hand. Each little girl followed carefully in the same manner, but they had an instant of giddy dizziness and weakness as if the covery that the rope swung far out in the air the wall being overhung by a roof. They hardened their muscles and somewhat overcame this momentary feeling. But their arms trembled as they cautiously, cautiously disengaged one hand and sought the next round below. In this manner swaying in the air and feeling sometimes as if the tower was leaning over upon them, and at other times as if it were receding, so as if to leave them quite alone between earth and sky they gradually made the descent.

It began to seem as if the rope were endless, as if they were doomed forever to descend toward an earth that fell back from them as they approached. Not knowing it they had been three hundred and sixty feet above even the lowest roof of the building. But at last to her horror Violet's feet felt about for the end of the rope a rope but found none none below. She was at the ropes lower end to which a stout piece of wood was attached. Yet the little girls were still far from the ditch indeed they saw with dismay that they were a good distance above the level of the outer wall about nearly one hundred and eighty feet, which teemed with soldiers in gray, who started firing at them, and the ropes a perfect barrage of musketry, in an endeavor to kill them.

My how they prayed. To drop from such a height would be suicide. And to climb back to the top of the tower was impossible, their strength strength being almost gone. With hundreds of glandelinians firing furiously and irretrievably at them the little girls terrified now by their situation found it a time for desperate expedient expedients.

They had noticed that when ever the ropes swung close to the tower wall it swung back to a corresponding distance outward. They now swung in with all their might, with bullets whistling all about them and in rebounding each little girl struck her feet against the tower wall in such manner as to propel them further outward on the return swing, and this motion also luckily made it very difficult for the glandelinians to aim well and none of the shots many as they were even came near them now.

The little girls next guided themselves as to swing clear of the rounded surface of the tower, and yet so far as to kick the tower in passing and thus to gain additional space and force for their pendulum like movement through the air. Continuing this and describing a greater arch at each swing, they found themselves at last that their outward swing brought them almost directly above the outer wall.

At the next swing however a bullet hit the rope severing it apart, and through the air they were hurled far beyond the outer wall. For an instant they were aware of this and gave themselves up as dead. They knew that no human bones could withstand such a collision with so solid earth as they were about to experience.

They instinctively made themselves ready for the shock. It came with a tremendous splash, an immersion a gurgling, and a further descent through deep water, and they landed against something soft and arose again. They had descended into the wide Eulante river calm to the bottom and arose to the surface refreshed by the most greatest diving performance in their lives.

The three hundred and twenty feet of water sufficiently broke their fall, and they arose to the surface in a state of amazement. Had the water been even only twenty feet deep they would have perished. As there was no demonstration from the walls over which they had swung they had inferred that the sound of the battle receding northward had drowned the noise of their contact, with the water, for their splashes had made a crashing roar. They swam clear across the river in half an hour's time, clambered up the bank slunk along the shore and darted into the woods unseen by the enemy. Francis was not with them having been with Francis and little Mary Jennings was not with them having been in Winston's headquarters at the time of the attack and so were safe.

Peering through the window of an empty house, Gerald Starring who had been pursued for days by the Abkissians saw forms approaching through the shrubbery from a small gate in the garden wall not far from the big and beautiful Eminie river. These were doubtless the last of a party whose foremost members were already in the corridor. What were these men, a Social Club club, a gang of murderers or a band of Conspirators.

In any one of these cases Starring felt that he would be caught in a trap. Manifestly the men were approaching the room in which he hid. They were already too near the door for him to escape unseen by the corridor. So he slipped into the wide empty fireplace with which the room was provided, and whose rear was quite in shadow. A moment later three generals entered the room. One he recognized as Evans, but the others he did not know. Each took from beneath his uniform cloak a bundle wrapped in cloth and laid it on a table, then sat down and waited. Other officers arrived almost immediately and the number kept increasing at short intervals until fifteen were gathered. Their conversation so far had been of brief remarks of the weather. They sat in a irregular semicircle facing the table. Evans arose and opened the bundles. The gray mark of the approaching storm clouds was gathering so a light was made which disclosed the contents of those bundles, as three swords and several pistols.

"Comrades," said general Evans. "The hour is at hand, or almost at hand when a mighty conflict will break out at Francis Atlatq Francis Atlatq. That all of us may precipitate in the intentions though but one of us may strike the blow I am to describe fully the plan agreed upon by the committee of the three Geminian societies as we have consulted. As each one of us is potentially the chosen arm of the Gemini in this venerable deed, it behooves each one to attend to every detail as if he were in fact already the selected instrument."

The officers sat in perfect silence their eyes fixed upon the speaker every attitude being of speechless attention.

"In this silken bag," continued Evans producing from beneath his uniform cloak that which he mentioned. "Are a very numerous number of very small envelopes. One of them is red, six are black, the others yellow or green. As soon as the plan of action shall have been made known, each general shall draw from the bag, a single envelope in the order in which his name appears on our list. When all have drawn and not till then, shall each man disclose his envelope to view at the table. The possession of the red envelope shall be God's choice for the performance of this holy mission. The general getting the red envelope shall choose one of these swords or pistols which differ in weight and size, though all have been blessed and devoted to our righteous purpose. Those who hold black envelopes shall guide and guard the chosen one both to protect him and to assure the Angelinian cause against the consequence of any possible weakness on his part."

The holder of the white envelopes shall not act in the present task but in the probably event of its failure, the whole cause shall assist them all if necessary as avengers against the member, who have failed as spies to seek him out, should he hide of hound upon his track, should he flee, as executioners to compass his death when he is brought before us."

There added "Is it agreed?"

"Agreed," said every general resolutely with clenched fist set teeth and gleaming eyes.

"The procedure shall be in this wise," went on general Evans.

"In an hour a carriage will be waiting outside the gate of this garden. The chosen man armed with the sword shall be conducted by six, each provided with two of these pistols. Two of the six shall enter the carriage, with him, two others shall take the place of the coachman, who will be dismissed. The carriage shall set forth at once. Then all seven shall in complete disguise as Glandelinian generals penetrate the enemy's lines under Germania vivian, the gentlemen of the black envelopes shall accompany him of the red envelope to where ever he goes their hands upon their pistols beneath their cloaks. Why this is to be done

I will tell you. Yesterday as you know we were attacked by the enemy who though beaten in the battle captured my headquarters before they were driven back. Well though the vivian girls had made a daring and successful escape they told me that the enemy were in possession of little Gertrude Angelina who had been retaken in the woods across the Eminie river and brought back to the house which is still in their possession, and now used as a Germanian headquarters. Well those again assigned to the venerable deed shall proceed to the house, and when the sentinels challenge the chosen one shall give the name of the treacherous general Wraynard and say that he must see general Germania at once. When the man enters his two comrades shall follow, the chosen one himself will keep his sword concealed until he is alone with Germania. He then shall boldly reveal his true identification to the snake demand Gertrude Angelina, to be given up, and if he refuses even once, he will thrust his sword into the Glandelinian general's body, as many times as may be necessary to assure its reaching a vital spot. So shall fall the unchristian chief, and thus God's holiest innocent servants the vivian girls obtain revenge and triumph at our own hands."

There were murmurs of applause, repressed exclamations, and other signs of intense enthusiasm.

"Then comrades, he whose arm shall have struck this glorious blow shall recover Gertrude anyway at any costs, and if successful hurry out of the enemy's lines, and return with his followers and the child back to the Christian lines. Gertrude Angelina must be recovered at at any costs and at all hazards, and if it turns out that this mission is a failure through carelessness or cowardice I will hold him for treason and he shall die. Each of you remember that the red envelope or a black one may fall to him. Are you still agreed?"

The expression of assent were as prompt and as determined as before and so Evans said;

"Let us proceed as once to the drawing."

"Fare up general," spoke another. "It is so dark that when we come to show what envelopes we have drawn, we shall hardly be able to make out the colors."

"Bring the candles then from the mantle to the table and light them," said Evans.

Starring heard under went a sudden jump. Two officers came straight for the fire place. Accustomed now to the darkness of the room both discarded his form vaguely and at the same moment.

"A spy," cried one.

Starring was immediately seized, handcuffed, and turned over to several privates who were summoned.

Then Evans said;

"Let us draw for the honor that God holds ready for one of us."

He held by the bag in his left hand after mixing the envelopes thoughtfully, and then allowing another man to mix them he thrust his hand inside, when he drew one he kept it closed and passed silently with the bag from man to man knowing without reference to the list in what order their names stood. Each man kept his hand closed on withdrawing it. When the bag reached the last officer there was only one envelope left. He did as the others had done. Then not a word being said Evans laid aside the bag and all pressed close to the table which they quite surrounded. Every right hand was laid out palm down on the bare surface and Evans was the first to disclose.

"God God a red one he cried. "That is something unexpected at least. Who has the black ones?"

Every eye turned with intense eagerness from the envelope immediately before it to the envelopes right and left. Six had them, and generals Wienstien and Viviania were among them.

"Come brothers," Evans was saying when Wienstien had at last looked up. "Choose a sword I hear the carriage at the gate."

Before he had recovered from his bewilderment Wais Wienstien was passing through the rain in complete disguise toward the gate, clasping one of the two swords tightly beneath his coat. At his right arm was Evans who carried one of the other two swords as well as a pistol in each other pocket besides two others at his sides. At the left arm was Viviania armed the same way. Two other men mounted the coach coachman's place.

Three hours later after great difficulty in getting within the lines, Evans was again in his old headquarters, but in the presence of general Germania vivian. He was a general of striking appearance, but with a fierce wicked expression, so noble looking, haughty, and stiff. The Glandelinian noticed the fierce look in the face of the intruder who stood before him.

with folded arms and recol recolled a step or two, and stood for a moment petrified, his jaws moving spasmodically without producing any speech. Then Germania recovered himself and with a premonition recognized Evans despite his disguise, and made for the door. "I forgot tell you that the door is locked." Said Evans sneeringly. "It is true, you might call for help/ you damn snake but if you did I should take the evident pleasure to kill you like the dog you are. Do not look so incredulous at me. I know that ordinarily you are a sovereign prince of Landelinia, and of the demons, with a large array of human toads and snakes behind you, and that I am continually a hunted man, but more powerful in your dominion. But at this moment we are on fairer terms with just what powers nature gave us except that I have two swords and four braces of pistols, and you have not even a weapon of any kind about you, having been careless enough to leave your weapons down stairs. So now Cousin Germania as I will call you though you are no relation of mine, and I would sooner have a rattle snake for a cousin than you, you & it is the weaker man that is my subject, the stronger man that is your prince."

"Germania looked at the door, the sword in Evans hand, his pistols in his belt, and at Evans magnificent mane. He looked bewildered. It seemed incredible that a great ruling Landelinian general higher in rank than Federal should be so helplessly placed in his own headquarters but a second glance assured him that this was no dream that the locked door, the sword in the hands of Evans, the pistols, his braces of pistols visible in his waist band, and the pugnaic expression on his face were very actual facts.

"Gertrude Angeline will never go free, and neither would by dastardly sisters if they were in my power." His highness Germania said at last. "Evans gave a short laugh of derision. "Can't I get it through your thick numbskull that I am the one to do the choking." He said. "You sovereign prince of Landelinia/ we are told have absolute power, but you seem to be very stupid. In my country we are quicker to grasp a situation. If you refuse to return Gertrude Angeline over to me, your staff officers will find something stretched on the floor. Hand her over. Where is she?" "You would not dare do it you christian o'ug gutter cur." Answered Germania. "Give up that little girl." Cried Evans. "I will not." "You will die then you dog." "I defy you and almighty god himself." Answered Germania. "And kill me if you dare. That won't help me to get them and you won't succeed that way even." "And why not?" "Because my army will prevent it." "I'll destroy it if they refuse to give her up." "Do." Said Germania with a sneer. "Attack my lines and my men will destroy even the vivian girls with their cannons. Come now how are you going to save them? that way! Tell me eh?"

Evans realized the fact. But he determined to avert it. "Well then." Said Evans coldly and drawing his sabre. "She shall stay a pros prisoner then, but her continued confinement will cost you h your life." "You are a coward to strike me unarmed." Said Germania. "Evans laughed. "You have forgotten the Brigano affair so soon? You attempted to kill the children with your blasted mines, and deserve assassination. You snake." He roared his face flushing crimson. "U." Since then you son of a bitch I have made up my mind to kill you, come what may and give you no means to defend your self either. But you can save yourself from my terrible revenge by giving up Gertrude Angeline. This is the last time I demand it of you." Germania hesitated. "This instant or you die." "My assassination will be avenged by the powerful free Masons." Said Germania.

"To hell with you and the free Masons." Said Evans. At this moment the door was burst open and a man came in with the little girl intending to kill her right before Germania. Evans ran his sabre through the assailant clean through his heart. Evans drew it out, struck again and again, and then knocking down Germania before he could interfere left the building with the little girl safely in his possession. Evans and his party were just passing successfully through a line of guards when a hue and cry arose to the ears of the sentinels. "One of our generals is murdered, assassinated." Stop those men stop those men. They are the sentinels. The sentinels were too late.

JOURNEY BACK AN INFERNO.

A rush of pursuers dashed up, mounted their horses, and set off after the fugitives. It was impossible to over take them, and general Cannonia ordered a double barrage upon the fugitives. The four journey of the fugitives became a night mare. First twenty times fierce Cannonia and his men rode furiously in a vain attempt to capture the fugitive fugitives. Then the double barrage broke, and it seemed as if there was an impenetrable curtain of shells between the fugitives and home. Huge min ewerfers made chaos at their very feet, shrapnell burst around them like a rain of stars. High explosives tore the air until the fugitives could hardly breathe from the overpowering stench of picric acid. Fortunately mistaking the barrage for a warning attack, a the Army's guns let go a perfect drum drum salvoes, that flared shook the air, and all the guns that could be made in this world seemed in action, along the christian line. This brought a slackening up of the Landelinian storm of shell fire and Evans and the others with him escaped unharmed. Evans and the fol, followers had been successful in recapturing Gertrude but and Evans had put an end to one of the main Landelinian generals at last killing wraggard without dispute.

Violet and her sisters then spying on Germania were full witnesses of the tragedy and were horrified beyond describing over the threatening outcome. They saw full well that the surviving Landelinian generals and especially Germania would revenge it. No attention was paid to them however as they were not seen. Cannonia at once telegraphed the news of the tragedy to all the Manleys and begged them to try their level best to capture violet and her sisters. The news of the tragedy startled and angered the three Manleys to the highest pitch and so was Germania furious, and Germania who had been their best and trusted leader also reported of the tragedy, and told who done it. General John Manley sent this message to Johnston Jackson Manley/;

"Your generalship Johnston Manley
"Dear father;

It is with deep regret that we hear from Germania and Cannonia that general wraggard had been assassinated. It is up to you to revenge it. Destroy the vivian girls at once if you catch them and make them suffer the tortures of the damned first. To get the vivian girls strike Viviania a blow at once. We must force our way through Francis Atlanta. GENERAL JOHN MANLEY.

General Cannon and vivian also heard of the tragedy and were astonished. They realized that Evans had meant to keep his word and now it was accomplished, and there was a great assurance that Germania would also get his soon. The whole on Gaverlni Gav Calvinian country was full jubilation over the news. In the meantime the dark storm clouds were gathering over Terwilliger. Evans and his followers had reached the christian lines with Gertrude Angeline by midnight, and prepared to move his army forward right away. A storm of battle was threatening. Evans learned of the danger of an assault on viviania at Terwilliger Evans ordered Viviania to assault the Landelinians in front of his last headquarters. "Go at them in overwhelming force." He instructed them. The vivian girls have gone there to spy on the enemy and are probably captured.

They must be retaken at all costs."

Poor Violet and her sisters though yet free did not know what to do. For them just now with the commotion going on it seemed impossible for them to escape the enemy who were a raving mad over the situation and the assassination of one of the wicked enemies of the Glandelinians. However they thought themselves would be murdered by the Glandelinians in revenge and so determined to effect their escape from the building with the captured planes and from the lines at any costs before they were discovered by the Glandelinians. They were utterly disappointed over the fact that Evans did not punish their wicked brother also like he did Braggard and almost wept also that their brother was so wicked. They had seen the capture of poor Gertrude who had been in the same woods they ran to. Though they had run a plump into a trap in making for those woods, they alone had escaped but she had been captured, for the woods had swarmed with the Glandelinians and though they had bravely made the most desperate attempts to get her way despite the fury of the Glandelinians she had been quickly captured and despite her struggle struggles brought her back into the captured headquarters and before Germania who had her placed in one of the rooms to make sure that she did not escape. But Violet and her sisters had told Evans of this and his mission had been successful.

But now despite the serious situation Violet and her sisters were determined to escape before they were discovered. They discovered for if they were they would be killed on the spot.

But how were they to accomplish it. That was a question hard to answer. The Glandelinians all around and the guards though handsome looking men had an expression in their eyes that showed that any trifling was exceedingly dangerous, just now and that to pass them without discovery was impossible despite their disguise. The Glandelinians were ferocious. And they knew it.

"Those Glandelinians despite their fighting in battles are a lot of cowards," whispered Violet to Jennie. "Anyway they show it by persecuting the children and cruelly murdering them."

"And yet bet it is against the Masonic rules for us to speak to them or try and bribe them but we got to do something," said Jennie. "No matter what you say to the sentries they will keep their mouths shut tight. We will have to try and overpower them some way."

"Yes the chickens have their tongues," said Evangeline. "But we may talk all we please you know but we must be careful that they do not hear us."

Violet looked up to Jennie and then going over to one of the guards asked:

"Will you answer a civil question?"

"We are forbidden to talk to any one under any conditions during guard duty," said one of the guards not recognizing her as she was disguised as a Glandelinian boy scout.

"That is what I thought a moment ago," said Violet indignantly. "And now one of you just broke the command. I'm going to report it. I asked you a question to try you and you fail to do for it."

The guards face turned crimson and he shrunk back looking at his two companions.

"Would you mind lending us your rifles," asked Violet. "We need them."

"At first the guards thought that the little supposed Glandelinian boy scouts were still poking fun at them but upon turning to face the supposed boys they were amazed to find themselves covered with a gun. And one of them started to advance saying:

"Give me that gun quick kid. You know Glandelinian children like you are too young to play with guns. You are only supposed to warn us when the Christians come with signals. It is dangerous to you and others."

"I know it is dangerous," said Violet. "And if you make a step toward me I'll prove it." She added her eyes flashing. "Give me your rifle and cartridge belt quickly too."

"But--"

"If you think I'm fooling and don't know what I'm doing I'll soon show you," said Violet. "I'm one of the Vivian girls whom you seek and if you hesitate another moment I'll kill you. Give me your rifle and cartridge belt or you will be a dead--"

You two other guards will not move toward the door," she suddenly added as she saw them trying to make for the door. "I can shoot fast and without missing too. Give me your rifles or I'll shoot. One--two--three--"

Realizing now that the little girl was one of the Vivian girls and a fact which they knew not a moment before, and knowing how dangerous those little girls are, the guards quickly obeyed, Jennie and Violet receiving the rifles and the belts.

7-321

"Bind and gag them," said Violet. "If they resist I'll shoot them no matter what the consequences." She came in here to get a plan and though we have the plan we have not as yet got out of the place. And this we propose to do before the Glandelinians get us."

Jennie did, with the uniform coat and shirts of the guards on each side. Then Violet cautiously opened the door seeing two guards on each side in the hall.

"I'll hit one and you hit the other," said Violet to Jennie. Whack. Whack.

Down went the two guards, and in they were dragged by the little girls, and also bound and gagged.

Violet peeked out.

"Gosh here comes Cannonia," she gasped. "Here's an opportunity to show him we are not afraid of him."

"Let him have it," said Jennie. "Pride cometh before a fall you know."

Cannonia saw the guards missing and the door open. A rifle butt descended upon his head as he entered and he went dazed at their feet.

Now for the break," said Violet. "The coast is clear." They quickly went out closing the door and locking it with the key which the little girls had with them having retained the keys belonging to the building when they escaped from it by means of the tower. They reached the main entrance and looked out. Two guards were standing there. Everywhere else the coast seemed clear.

CHAPTER TWO IN THREE PARTS.

THE OUTBREAK OF THE GREAT STORY OF BATTLE
The frightful carnage at FRANCIS-ATLANTA OR ANNA-MARIA
MAY 19TH TO 18TH.
THIRD YEAR OF THE WAR. ORGREATEST STRUGGLE EVER RAGING AT WESTERN SECTION OF CALVERINIA.

"We got to pass them somehow." Said Violet "If we attack them they may set up a commotion that would bring their comrades to the rescue. The rain outside is pouring like a snowstorm and that may help our escape though it will give us a good n. draching."

"Couldn't we lure them in one by one and put them out and to sleep like we did to the others?" Asked Joice.

"Not likely." A Said Violet. "We must escape by a window." It seems our only exit."

Jennie went to a window cautiously raised it and looked out. Two Glandelinians were on guard below. Escape was cut off in that direction. They tried every window they knew of with the same result. To escape by the windows was impossible. So they decided to go out by the door way, and at any costs. Violet opened the door cautiously and picking up a paper flung it at the first guard, striking him smack in the face.

He uttered a sharp exclamation, and darted in but in the way of voice who brought her rifle butt down on the plate Glandelinian guards head. Down he went on the floor with a crash and lay still and asleep for several hours. The other guard hearing the commotion came in apparently on his guard but a blow from an unexpected quarter put him to sleep also. Out darted Violet and her sisters dashing through the gate and out into the dark woods on their left. Their work had been done so clever that by the time the Glandelinians Glandelinians who were knocked out recovered, Violet and her sisters were far from pursuit and were closer to the Christian lines than they thought.

Suddenly Violet seeing nothing in the darkness collide with an unseen object. At first once she felt her self grasped by the throat only to be set free again as the one who grabbed her discovered he grabbed a little girls necks.

"Who for God's sake are you?" Exclaimed a voice. "Cop oral of the guard number ten a child fugitive hurry." "Cop oral of the guard number ten."

And he repeated the words several more times until Violet and her sisters found themselves surrounded by dark objects.

"They are little girls." They heard a voice say.

"Yes and wandering in our lines in this intense darkness. Said another voice. "The poor little children. Bring a light and flash it on them so we can see who they are."

The order was obeyed on the instant.

"The Vivian girls." Cried the sergeant. "They have escaped the foe without even pursuit and have the plans. Thank God they were successful."

They were immediately brought to Evans and oh how he did rejoice in seeing them and he did not know they had been in Germanias lines either.

"How did you get into his lines and away again?" He asked. "By overpowering the guards." Said Violet. "We saw you kill Braggard and make a fierce attack on Germania. We escaped without pursuit but ran into the Christian lines before we knew we were there."

And her story was confirmed the next day when Evans riding to a tavern near by noticed this poster:

$ 10,000,000 REWARD FOR THE DESTRUCTION OF VIVIAN GIRLS.

Those children known as the Vivian girls yester or yesterday assassin ated general Braggard, and seized my plane and escaped by climbing a two to three hundred foot tower by rope to the ground and after overpowering six guards, and knocking Cannonia down with a rifle, and binding and gagging some others. General Cannonia one of their victims is bound to revenge it and will resent the blow dealt by one of them. A reward of $10,000,000 will be given for their destruction."

The inn keeper shrank back when they saw the dressed Christian (Everett Everett R True turn and face them.

"Who tacked that up there?" He demanded.

"No one answered.

"Now look here." Said Evans pointing to the man who managed the inn.

"S Don't you know who tacked that poster up there?"

"Why no one can recall that I have seen any one do it."

"You are like some more Glandelinian civilians that I know--- when you get in a tight place you have a very poor memory but a mighty good forgiveness." Roared Evans and he struck the Glandelinian inn keeper such a blow that he reeled several feet, and fell sprawling again at table knocking it over and everything on top of himself. Then Evans tore the poster from the wall with a jerk and tearing it into bits threw the fragments at them saying:

"Who ever put this there tell him, I tore it will you. And I'd like to meet him and all his accomplices here. You Glandelinians think you can bring destruction in on the Vivian girls, but I advise you to see how long you can hold a bunch of wasps in your naked hands, while they sting."

And with this he walked out. Evans returned later with a party of soldiers, but the Inn keepers and their fellow companions had flown.

Evans however raided the place, taking everything that was useful and then set fire to the place. Finding that most of the occupants of the town near by were Glandelinians civilians he sent them a warning that they shall pay dearly for it if they molest the Vivian girls in any way.

The warning only filled the subjects of Glandelinia with fear. They knew the fury of this Abbieannian lion as he was called, and fearing that he would advance against the town, they took what he belongings they had and fled setting fire to the town. Evans felt despondent over the loss of his headquarters, and despite the fact that Gertrude Angeline, a nd Violet and her sisters were safe he decided to get it back and show general Cannonia what a fury he could really make out himself. He immediately organized an attacking party and sent a sweeping assault against the Glandelinians in that location. The Glandelinians fought with the mad ness of hell's raging demons, but could not stay that sweeping assault.

After resisting for four hours that evening with great stubbornness the Glandelinians retreated toward the abandoned town the Angelinians following. Fierce resistance was also maintained in the town. Muskets blazed continually from all the houses in the town, men were dropping in the streets in thousands, but their comrades only hurried on to the attack. After fierce fighting all night the town was captured and the Glandelinians retreated in confusion. But this action precipitated the great battle of Francis-Atlanta which this was the starting point

The battle of Anna-Maria of our Francis-Atlanta which was heard within picket lines started along the Christian center under Jennings, with the defeat of the Angelinians there with a loss of two hundred thousand dead. The battle began at Cutria and Francis Atlanta, other Christian forces being overwhelmed and driven toward general Vivian lines, the converging lines for four hours and a half along the front at Francis-Atlanta being obscured in the smoke of battle, while the score of bullet torn Christian banners, jeep jeered, and song to, battled for and pray prayed for resound fell amid the hellish carnage while seventeen monstrous waves of fray swung upward through the fiery storm of carnage, halted and melted away.

The glandelinian general Leuvason Palmer, who had always been a great military genius and who had dared to run an unheard of risk, paid his life for the temporary success of his shrr shredded lines, having deliv liberately weakened his center, to race his men around to crush general Walter Francis Smith's flank and only meeting a horroing fire of musketry and cannon, which tore hundreds of as extensive pray waves into flying fragments, with the loss of hundreds of their best officers, and general Palmer went down mangled and bleeding.

What a terrible toll indeed for the slight temporary success indeed. Twenty glandelinian battle flags torn and ripped were found soaked in gore.

FEDERALS FRIGHTFUL ONSLAUGHT, AGAINST VIVIANANNA'S LEFT FRINGE WING AT FRANCIS T ATLANTA.....AND THE HELLISH STORM OF BATTLE BETWEEN FRANCISIANA, AND MARE MARIS SOE RAE RUN.

Fierce as it was the assault of Federals army began as a furious and headlong surprise attack on general Vivians lines, and driving a part of it back suddenly struck a terrible blow on general Viviananna's left wing, a great turning movement having been made which while the Christian columns had been in confusion, caused general Vivian to change some of his positions in the center, and advise Viviananna to hold firm at all costs until reinforcements can be sent to his crushed left wing. Federals columns making a southern movement toward the Christian flank, crashed in it with fru frightful losses, causing terrible and con conf conglomerate confusion, and meeting general Melons forces which had held firm with general Penderons strong Abbieannian line soon met stronger resistance, these Christians repelling the assault with all their fury, while confusion and panic raged all around. Then Jennings Turner and trances Snyder on the Christian side were killed early in the terrible fight which had become so furious so quick the glandelinians driving to their columns into panic and confusion, and crushing their lines to pieces threatened the survivors with annihilation.

General Helms and Germania Vivians glandelinians as also came up taking an hand in the stubborn fight, cutting postelices army which tried in vain to hold its ground to pieces, the whole line of which still stood its ground giving battle with all the fury ever seen in warfare, and the big force of glandelinians under general Joseph John Wane almost annihilated gradually retired the retreat soon becoming a panic with the glandelinians pursuing closely. General Penderons Angelinian troops had after sanguinary fighting been routed, and Grews Angelinians also being forced to capitulate while after other more serious fighting the glandelinians compelled the surrender of general Plus, with his few survivors, and sim simultaneously rolled up upon divisions of Abbieannians in horrible disorder. Hel Helso n made preparations to cut off

R Frank Cannons communications with general Hanson who hearing the terrific firing and cannonading was hurrying on his troops, but these glandelinians coming in constant with Abyssinkillians were soon checked with heavy loss. Had he succeeded Hanson would not have known of the serious disaster threatening general Viviananna's left, which general Vivian himself cut off from, and who still remained inactive, which would have been fatal to both generals. The slaughter on both sides was terrible, the whole Christian left was driven clean from their works, and a more frightful panic than ever seen in the war at sea or ever who he was on.

While the whole Christian line was retreating in confusion despite the frantic efforts of their officers to stem the inrolling tide of panic stricken soldiers general Federal was moving forward extremely heavy forces, intending to make one of his well planned general attacks. He had intended to strike a general blow which he would deliver in a way to separate Viviananna and Manasoa from the two Vivians like general Manley did at Helantomburg. He had of course as ready and already predicted struck suddenly against the rear of general Viviananna's left wing having driven general Grenthearts forces back in a pandemonium of the greatest confusion. Great heart having been the main commander of the extreme left. At the time and amid the dreadful carnage and over a field extending over ten miles, where hundreds of thousands of glandelinians fell. Germaine person had made a driving counter charge against Flout lines glandelinians.

In an endeavor to cover the rear retreat of the confused masses while another wing of general Farrol Manleys Abbieannians had reached the base banks of Mari as creek and though repelling the frightful onslaught here with surprisingly great success, it failed to rally the confused columns about them. The glandelinians flushed with the evident success and victory that was facing them pressed on like an avalanche with adamantine yell and as the Christian officers watched the frightful confusion of their troops it seemed to stop the very beating of their hearts, and shells now exploded everywhere as thick as a fall of snow as it seemed. One of the liveliest waves of humanitr humanity had been headed toward the last holding life of Abbieannians the firing being annalline, fearful, more fearful than ever seen in an furious battle roaring like a hundred trillion guns in one simultaneous discharge the scared Christian officers talking to each other in hushed whispers and trying to direct the firing line.

This single wave of glandelinians seemed to be reasonable as one big vast multitude of soldiers in gray advancing to annihilation who opposed them darting every where behind all kinds of objects of protection as they advanced pushing a sea of smoke of musketry before them coming on with the ability of monkeys and a general thrill of horror passed through the watching officers as the foe set up their famous devil yell and increased it to a horroing sound.

Along the whole Christian line still remaining firm, the sea same awful firing continued fol, followed by the apparent withering of large parts of the human waves, but nevertheless the survivors continued to press on redoubting their great devil yell, attacking the Abbieannian line with the most indescribable fury, and continuing their bloodcurdling yells surged up against the Christian line, in that roar ing scathing inferno of fire extending fort forty miles, and though the glandelinians went down in twenty whole whole wedges, the Christian line was forced to waver and give way. The works, the christians fell back, and the Abbieannians before general Federals surges of human maddened fiends and never before in all the war was such a scene of panic, flight and confusion witnessed. The whole left wing was separated into huge fragments and scattered widely, and was now in a terrible panic retreating in a stampede, fleeing in a total rout despite the efforts of their officers and generals to rally them.

The Angelinians now swept by the watching officers like chaff, thick thinking nothing else of anything but of their terror, and flight and of escape from those frenzied fiends far behind them. All the ground once held by the Christians was now crammed with the fur furiously advancing graycoats in pursuit of the Angelinians retreating across the Mare Soe Rae Run. The victorious advancing Glandelinians were advancing rapidly rapidly spreading out and hundreds of thousands of Angelinians who were still soughting to escape were charged in the rear by a column of graycoats and the rout turned into a stampede the scene becoming appalling.

What with the hotly pursuing enemy driving through by them like a pair of officers in their rear, and an advancing army of death and destruction to their left the massive columns were thrown into such confusion that thousands trod upon one another, trampled each other underfoot, and filled the air with shrieks, curses, horrible outcries of mingled pain rage and terror mingled with the roaring surge of bayonet against bayonet. Clumsy clubbed musket butt against musket butt, and the awe inspiring clattering roar of thousands of musket shots fired at point blank.

General Germaine had in the meantime thrown his center and right against Viviananna's Stanoks main wave of Argolians while his left under general Francis Immmann repelled general Abyssin kille Johnston's Omarians in their endeavor to check the foe, and save the Christian left wing from being rolled up entirely, but though repelling the onslaught with great slaughter, they were soon shelled by the glandelinian batteries, which poured a drum fire of ten thousand shells in fifteen minutes and suffering excruciating losses.

were forced to yield their ground, leaving a sea of dead and wounded behind them. A glandelinian force of 19,000,000 supported by 800,000 cavarly and eight thousand cannon began the attack on the christian flank which had helped to precipitate the great confusion.

While the whole left wing was retreating in confusion and while general Federal was having a numerical advantage over the many Angelinian divisions he had immediately thrown into such confusion and giving them a good drubbing at that, heavy reinforcements from an unexpected quarters suddenly arrived. Rumors came that it was a part of Hanson's command, and now grew all alarmed. That is federal grew alarmed. However he still felt confident of victory for general Vincent Costello supporting the Abbiennians with his artillery amid such carnage and confusion, had been killed and also that a strong Abbiennian force of twenty million At Marie Zoe was gun was being hard pressed in fact the whole battle was raging here, while in spite of the heaviest support of artillery y Batemans Johnsons a whole Abbiennian army was cut to pieces the survivors being forced to surrender.

Francis Avian with a this forces had engaged general Hanson's whole Glandelinian army, the heavy glandelinian advantage of artillery, cavarly and infantry seemed to be about to win the hour everywhere.

but now more reinforcements under general Hero Apollon came up with Angelinian aid, and for four hours with the most indescribable fury contested the bloody field, with infantry and thousands of cannons over an extent of ten miles and at this point in spite of terrific slaughter, all along the line began to slowly regain the lost ground. Francis Vintenne and Hanson on the side of the glandelinians fell mortally wounded. On g Greathearts left near Francis-Ann a the glandelinian waves under general Mc-Holleston Cannon and Mc-Holleston Handley, were still advancing successfully, and reinforcements arriving at this point also, which from style of uniform proved to be some of Hanson's vilians army, and though greatly outnumbered by the glandelinians gave battle with the singular bravery and skill of millions of angels, against twenty million demons, but never theless it was going hard with them, because one of their main columns had failed to come up in time and now their losses were appalling.

Officers by scores sent messengers begging Hanson to hurry. Now there seemed to be a stupendous pandemonium of a roar in the direction of Greathearts broken and routed center, as if all the guns of all the nations of the whole world were in action in that one concentrated spot. This made it even evident that poor Greatheart had his hands full, and had at the beginning of Federal's attack been forced to fight without artillery support and if it had not been for the arrival of reinforcements with more artillery there would have been telling what would have happened, but now with the help of these reinforcements he was able to repel the foe's attack with indiscriminate fury, the enemy being held at bay now all along the line at this point....

General Hanson who was concentrating his main forces, saw this confusion, heard the frightful ear-splitting roar of the newly arrived christian artillery, and to defend the rest of Greathearts forces from being cut up and routed, he ordered general Fredrickson Hanson, with all related to advance to the support, and now while a goodly portion of the panic stricken columns were being rallied, there was a frightful storm of carnage raging for over twenty miles in extent. The other reinforcing columns had now been joined by the large Abyssinkilian and Abbiennian forces under general Hancock the battle raging with increasing fury toward Francis-Atlanta the enemy meeting fiercer resistance than before, the slaughter seeming to be a daminating horror between heaven and earth. And one gray wave after another swept forward, only to roll back with small remnants left.

The glandelinians under general Jeroman made the fiercest attack amid a titanic artillery duel of twenty thousand six hundred cannon, cranes attacking them in main center and left of the Abyssinkilian front carrying the positions to the right of Francis-Atlanta but failing to progress any further into that roaring seething inferno the Abyssinkilians contesting the ground so stubbornly and mowing the large multitude of the foe down in waves as if they were flies, and the surviving Glandelinians became appalled. The glandelinian surge extending for forty eight miles in length at this point, were reduced to mere fragments, and were compelled to flee. At other points of the line, Francis Atlanta came with thirty million men and twenty brigades of the best sharpshooters, and seeing the confusion ensuing among the routed christian troops, and seeing the foe's fierce advance, formed his men into a long line ten deep on a slightly sloping ground, each man far above the other, and waited until the glandelinian surge which was also ten deep and 10,000,000 strong should come within close range. Then his lines let loose a storming fire of ear-splitting fury, which smote the glandelinian surge like a cyclone would do in sweeping a cornfield, mowing down whole brigades, and tearing the line into hundreds of huge caps. Though cut to pieces and staggered, the line of the foe did not give way as yet, with their fragments of battle flags still waving continued the attack with such fury. That they were even cutting the christian surge to pieces. General Mc-Holleston and Thomas Hadley, two great Abbiennian generals tried frantic oiled frantically to check the maddened screaming surge but amid the frightful carnage fell mortally wounded their men going down faster than you could see words in a page or than numbers in the pages of an arithmetic book in a school. General Augustine Dun on the right of Francis divisions also fell amid this seemingly world wide inferno, the glandelinian surge sweeping on like a sweeping Abbiennian typhoon, heavily supported by immense square squadrons of cavarly, falling upon the stubborn christian line with appalling fury and with merciless ferocity capturing two hundred thousands christians as prisoners, cutting and shooting small the cannonners at their posts killing the horses in their maddened rage.

1-332

Indeed they went so far, that these christians also gave way in confusion, but however general Hanson's main line of batteries broke into action, and a storming counter attack of nine million christian cavarly, finally cut up the surge of glandelinians and drove them back, with the loss of their generals Henry, Prue, James Bruce and Arthur Norton who were killed in trying to stem that overwhelming tide of christian horsemen. My what a sea of dead and wounded glandelinians were exposed to view. Over nine million lay strewn on the ground for miles in width and all along the line of that frightful battle surge. At the same time this was happening a large glandelinian cavarly surge about two million in number were caught in a destructive drum-drum fire of christian artillery along the Francis-Atlanta railroad stretch, a regular barrage of cannon which annihilated this whole column of cavarly.

Even now all of Hanson's batteries were putting in a strong barrage of artillery fire, which was kept up the entire duration of the glandelinian attack making a tremendous din heard for five hundred miles, and whose concussion was heard for three thousand miles. Fearful onslaughts were made on Meldon St. James forces, large bodies of cavarly, infantry, dragons, and bay battalions making a surge thirty miles in extent, attacking with such unbelievable bravery on the face of a storming hurricane of a hundred thousand shells per hour mingled with a storm of grape and canister, that they forced a part of the line only to be crushed to pieces and annihilated by the hose like display of two thousand machine guns, while another surge was finally routed by the infantry and cavarly of the Abyssinkilians and Angelinian, through which the glandelinians despite their inferior numbers could not penetrate and being shot down in hundreds of thousands, the survivors fled in precipitate flight, the Angelinians pursuing and capturing multitudes of prisoners and putting that division of glandelinians out of the service entirely for the remainder of the war.

At other points the christian lines under Hanson the great glandelinian surge encountered a barrage fire of four hours duration on their leaders, Parisia, Reuel and Aldolph Johnston three brothers being badly wounded, and though this column was torn to pieces it rallied to the attack, and redoubled the assault against the christian line with the same marvelous heroism with which the other mangled glandelinian surges had displayed. This part of the christian line was desperately and continuously resisting with all their might and main the sledge hammer onslaught of the whole already mangled glandelinian surge, and for the stubbornness of which the christian troops were noted it was the only means that enabled them to stand the terrible punishment inflicted by the man maddened foe, though they outnumbered the assailants three to one.

Large squadrons of glandelinian cavarly and infantry finally not being able to withstand the terrorizing avalanche of damnation that mowed them down in tens of thousands gave way fleeing in confusion, the whole gray surge now giving way in confusion their losses being unspeakably terrific and fearful divisions attacking for three hours at Francis Atlanta, and though capturing the city against ten times their number finally suffered a crushing defeat his whole surviving glandelinian columns being scattered to the four winds. The city was terribly damaged by shell and shellfire.

Alfred and Henrique St. Clare strengthened the lines that were already badly played out, crushing fourteen main ones of the enemy and driving the survivors back in a horrible panic. Terrible was the loss of the best Glandelinian officers, many of them being generals.

A FORLORN HOPE INDURED.

Federal saw now that to break Vivian's massive lines, consisting of general Hanson's extreme right wing, was in vain, but however he determined on a forlorn hope indeed, trusting to the strength of his large remaining columns, though he knew that he was terribly overwhelmed by the Christians. He put Popowich at the next head of the next charging surge, sending it forward against Hanson's center between Francis Atlanta and Francis Anna while he sent Cannonias Germania, Vivian, and Tamerline with two other mighty surges.

The onslaught was terrific threatening to be successful on the center despite the big storm, the Glandelinians engaging the Christians in a hand to hand fight, but finally met all along theirs a heavy and bloody resistance, Popowich's divisions going into fragments the survivors being driven into confusion. Cannonias big surge simultaneously made a furious onslaught of greater violence, despite the artillery fire tearing up his center, for a time pressing back the Christian forces along his front, but in that mighty and extensive inferno of horrible slaughter, half of his surge was wiped out, he himself fell wounded, and appalled at their excruciating losses, the survivors finally gave up the struggle, and fled in the utmost confusion leaving their dead and wounded everywhere in their light.

Tamerline and Germania's surges were stronger than the others attack the Christian forces on their own front, and though the left of Germania's Germania's divisions were reduced to remnants, with the wounding of general Germania Smith and the annihilation of ten brigades of troops under Picknell and Francis Federal Johnston, who were also wounded, the large Marian divisions under general Rudolph Filian reinforced them and so amid the horrible carnage Tamerline and Germania made a grand advance which however by the curtain of artillery fire along the whole Christian line was soon badly cut up, the Glandelinians being thrown into confusion and panic. The time had come for retreat, and general Tamerline and Germania were forced to give the order. At first the retreat was accomplished with a great semblance of order and discipline but soon as the victorious Abheannians pressed on them, these two divisions of Glandelinians abandoned their arms and fled in a stampede toward Federal's lines.

A FRIGHTFUL SCENE OF BLOODGULF AND SLAUGHTER.

The victorious Christians poured down after the retreating Glandelinians, two of the cities already mentioned was on fire, and general Callahan was taken up from the sea of blood and bodies more dead than a live, being a very dangerously wounded Christian general indeed.

So furious was the battle that everywhere was scenes of heartrending scenes of desolation. Millions of trees had been shattered as if by a furious typhoon, flower beds with fresh way flowers were strewn three deep with the bodies of gray and purple and gray together, and covered here and there with intestines. Never before in the war was there such a scene exposed to view, the whole battlefield resembling the destruction of the world, whole towns being in ashes.

Indeed the night along along Hanson's whole line which was revealed during the short lull was a holy terror, and lucky indeed it was that poor Violet and her sisters who were in Michael's rapidly advancing army had not been there yet to see it. Hundreds of thousands of dead lay everywhere. All the wounded were writhing, moaning and screaming in terrible agony the scenes being like an earthly living hell as the greatest number was believed to have fallen here.

as the greatest number had fallen here. And it was reported that general Federal was among the badly wounded. All along the line of battle on both sides not a tree had its branches left, thousands were down completely, millions were split, crushed, or charred by fire reddened with blood, while the remaining branches of trees had mangled bodies or flesh hanging from them. For miles the ground was red with blood and seemed indeed paved in many places with intestines and torn and lacerated flesh.

Hundreds of thousands of badly torn horses with even the intestines wallowing out of many of them or protruding lay among the dead or wounded amid the multitudes of broken cannon, gun carriages, muskets, caissons and seas of shattered trees, foliage.

It was a perfect sea of devastation, and not even the devastation caused by Mt. Pelee's eruption, and the destruction of the cities on the islands could compare with this battle horror. Even the it was a perfect sea of dead dying and wounded, amid confused and tangled wreckage of trees. Indeed it was awful. During the lull in the frightful onset, general Hanson riding upon the scene met Greathart who was rallying large portions of his command and rushing them forward toward the direction of the fearful battle.

"I'm sure this is going to be the greatest battle that has ever been fought," he declared. "Have you your excellency seen the conditions along my routed lines?"

"No," answered Hanson suddenly. "And I don't want to. It would only sicken me."

"The wounded on our side are too many," said Greathart sadly. "There will be no room for them in any of the towns or cities near here. This onslaught beats any I have ever seen."

"Yes but we have got to get to the field again," said Hanson. "Federal's onslaught is recommencing and we have got to hurry and get your routed divisions into order, and restore your shattered lines. Hear how the musketry is roaring. We certainly got to hurry."

ALMOST PRETERNATURAL FURY OF THE BATTLE ALONG GENERAL VIVIAN'S LINES. ESPECIALLY HIS CENTER. MY WHAT A FEARFUL CRASH AND UPROAR OF HELL'S RAGES.

The general engagement along general Vivian's lines began the same moment Federal made his onslaught on the left, large columns of the Glandelinians rushing to the attack every division of general Vivian's line on general Hanson's right also making frantic preparations to meet the herculean onslaught. Along general Vivian's line one immense wave after wave of Glandelinians rushed forward against the Christian line amid the loud irregular roar of millions of musketry and cannon which had swelled to a universal uproar, and so tremendous was the falling of the graycoats, that several of the nearest waves finally gave way, and retreated in amazing confusion. Several other main surges of the Glandelinians meeting cannon fire that killed scores of masses recoiled but were overwhelmed and trodden down, the roar of the Christian cannon sounding like the exploding of a million tons of high explosives. Most of the other shivered waves of graycoats heap hesitated, especially as the havoc increased among their ragged columns in a most frightful manner, but Stanley had issued orders that the Christian positions were to be carried at all costs.

and the cost was paid dearly indeed, without any success in the whole battle. For thirty eight miles the uproar of the stings of Christian cannon and long series of lines of musketry, stormed with frightful fury, widening the spaces indeed, between the Christian line, and that of the enemy, though mass upon masses of any size had been steadily reaching the Christian works, but melting away. As far as could be seen within fifty paces of the Christian works the wooded fields had been crammed with the attacking fiends in gray, but in a few minutes not one of them had been seen, all being stretched on the ground, dead or wounded.

A fearful carnage indeed.

All along the Christian line there was a noise as if three scores of Mt. Calverines were in their most violent eruption from the blasting roar of two hundred thousand cannon of all kinds mingled with the roar and rattle of so many muskets which sheeted the Christian lines in fire and smoke and withered thirteen of the big foe columns so frightfully & that the survivors were glad to retire. By the torrent of high explosive, the Glandelinian columns seemed stopped in their headlong advance, but nevertheless the word was forward, and the men were pricked forward with the bayonet. At the time he was attacking his farthest, general Manley saw great columns of purple coats with a stream of cleaner bayonets weaving over the roads under a great cloud of dust, the advance of Francis O. Owens ninth corps moving upon his rear. Manley was indeed alarmed at this sight, and having large squadrons of cavalry near he spread them out as infantry, with two thousand guns waiting in the rear seemingly as futile as a ragged set of spread fingers to hold back rivers current. The flankers were coming on furiously indeed, and no time was to be lost.

MANLEY'S ATTACKING COLUMNS THOUGH OUTFLANKED, FIGHT STUBBORNLY IN THE MIST OF A DAMNATING ROARING INFERNO, BUT TO NO AVAIL. TERRIBLE IS THE SLAUGHTER.

In about an hour general Manley's divisions about forty, consisting of the main flank of the assaulting line were facing in the rear a frightful long undulating wall of rifle blasts. General Chambersburg seeing the assaulting columns were outflanked, sent forward of his brigades, of one hundred thousand men each, and ordered them to go to the rescue and stick to it at all costs. Long lines of the foe led by general Henry Cornscoe was advancing swiftly to the rescue of the division attacked in the flank, but Manley's assault having been repulsed was receding, and Chambersburg saw the greatest columns of purple coats in that ever advanced in a counter charge moving in perfect waves miles long and shrouded in many points in sheets of smoke from their own musketry fire. Cornscoe who was bound to check the progress of the Angelinians, who were counter charging, ordered his lines into action, and simultaneously as they came within range, a fire of almost preternatural fury broke out along both opposing lines, the odious and horrid roar of the firing continuing without intermission for four hours in general intensity, the Angelinian waves rushing upon the Glandelinian front, and though wave after wave went to pieces, and recoiled they rallied, and renewed the assault. At the same time Cornscoe's lines opened their blaze of fire, the artillery along Chambersburg broke into action, letting loose their hell of destruction, tearing to pieces the surges in purple at this point, but the assault of the Angelinians could not be checked, and the whole scene became a roaring inferno. General Costello's divisions of three hundred thousand Glandelinians, were cut to pieces, Cornscoe's central divisions, were crushed to fragments and routed, the works along his main right were piled with fragments of dead and dying, were carried, his left was caught on the flank, his main line was frightfully shattered, and already the Anh Angelinians had captured two hundred thousand prisoners, mostly of whom were wounded, and dressed in bandages, making a harrowing sight indeed to the Christians.

As the very inferno of hell's avalanches of damnation seemed to have turned the world into a fierce conflagration, the remainder of Cornscoe's divisions dreadfully shredded, began to fall back swiftly. That to be beaten beaten in this bloody manner by the Angelinians there is no doubt that the remains of Cornscoe's men were boiling mad, and Cornscoe and his officers cursed God and all in heaven and the Christians in volumes of blasphemies for every soldier who fell.

General Francis Chambersburg, was relieving and reading messe messages, and sending them, saw the great multitude of Angelinians pushing on with the fury and noise of a typhoon, and seeing his own lines sagging before the appalling attack ordered up Morton J. Kramers Gargolians, but the Angelinians were attacking with such pugnacious fury that general Morton was unable to hold, and send for aid. It was at this time that the roar of so many cannons and musketry was redoubled, seeming to rend the heavens from the din and defy God himself, and general Francis Chambersburg who was turning his head to right and left, in a eagle like glances watched his weaving and straining lines of smitten Glandelinians, blaspheming and cursing all the while without ceasing, and defying God to cause him any further misfortunes and daring him to come down and fight his army with all his angles, when suddenly he fell from his horse, a shell fragment going through his head. He had been one of the best Glandelinian generals a favorite of Manley at that, and now the wicked blasphemer was dead and before the judgment seat of the Almighty to receive his sentence. General Ritchie Patrick Johnston took Chambersburg place keeping up the grim resistance under the black billowing smoke of the battle inferno the last of Chambersburg's reserves had gone in to the support of the gasping surges of graycoats, which were now zig-zacking in formation from the pressure of the Christian assault, the din being heard for five hundred miles at even this point.

The Angelinians making the air ring with their own frightful yells, dashed upon the line of graycoats defying a knoll driving them out with frightful slaughter, and pressed upon them with great vehemence and taking many brigades of prisoners. General Johnston's Glandelinians took defense behind a stone wall but were annihilated after repelling with evident success, ten desperate assaults in quick succession. At all points of the front lines when the Angelinians came in closed quarters the Glandelinians not being as handy with the bayonet or pike, as the Christians broken into confusion, and though Morton's officers would stem the confusion and panic the Angelinians would pour over the positions at other points, and in his desperate attempts to keep his lines firm, general Morton fell mortally wounded. Morton's line now gave way with the utmost precipitation, the Angelinians following with the same precipitation, horrible scenes of the battle itself being revealed, which defied all description, and though the fallen may have shrieked from a agony, or called for succor, they were unheard, for the crash and uproar of the battle drowned every other sound. Hundreds of thousands had already been killed, and multitudes of wounded Angelinians were brought from the field, the scenes being hideous to all who observed it.

No one could take a single step anywhere in the region of battle without treading on the dead and even the dying and wounded, whole guns and hundreds of broken gun carriages lying half sunk in the ploughed mud and earth, and many horses and gunners were pinned under heavy calibers, disabled by shell explosions. A thousand wounded Angelinians lay close to the stone wall where many Glandelinians met annihilation, every single one having broken limbs, backs crushed and arms gone. The great number of dead Angelinians were found to have broken necks, frightfully mangled bodies, skulls crushed in, bodies torn open, bodies disemboweled, some vast holes on their bodies, and some only shattered trunks remaining. Thousands of other dead Angelinians, we who had fallen were killed with bullets, either from Glandelinians musketry or machine guns, and these lay thickly buried on top of one another in perfect windrows. The sight was fearful indeed, but what sight could be more fearful than to see the largest proportion of Fritze Patricks and Chambersburg's miles lying dead and mangled on the ground for miles his loss in slain being 1,900,000. Fifteen divisions and twenty brigades had all their field officers down, twenty companies of Manley's divisions were dead on the field, and in general Bruce's command, where fifteen color bearers flying a single rag for what was once a flag were killed, the general himself lost his life, in trying to flourish it. General Bruce's strong lines during the engagement under irresistible pressure, had been caught in bad ground, and this unaccountable, and inferno of killing, and also had been forced back by the parring Railroad crossing, Reynolds' Glandelinians facing Angelinian purple columns were almost annihilated their own dead lying like a field of grain cut by a scythe.

Angelinian columns however in the rear; Hatters Gargolians were cut to pieces by their counter assault, Windermine, on the Christian side was dangerously wounded, convention and case y Costello on that side also were killed, and the whole damning battle field along this line and ever even carries on which were involved in the frightful carnage, were smashed in the dead and wounded of both sides, Windermine's whole army alone having been held at bay were nevertheless impossible to be driven back despite the fall of their leader.

The whole line of woods and fields had been hidden in wreaths of smoke from the most dreadful in indre indescribable firing, which had ensued from both sides so long.

HANLEY DRIVES HIS SECOND DESPERATE ASSAULT, WHICH BECOMES GENERAL.....

Henry Fitzpatrickson on the christian side during the short lull saw thirty six divisions of general Gerald's divisions approaching in long waves to crush in his right, and having five hundred machine guns close at hand he opened these, simultaneously sending general Walter Evans to face general Gerald's Mandeliniens, whose first wave appeared to be thirty deep, and now so fierce was the battle that it seemed as if the whole world inside and outside and even the very heavens together were on a wild rapam rampage.

From the force of the frightful onslaught general Evans' divisions were cut to pieces, but as the first wave was also shredded to fragments by the fire they had met, the surviving Abi Abheannians strove to maintain their lines. The ten divisions of Evans' men under general Schlander Williamson being shelled to pieces by the distant Mandeliniens' batteries covering the furious Mandeliniens' onslaught and wavered, going down in hundreds of masses per volley. The Mandeliniens' wave waves delivered their blows with such vehemence that Evans could not hold his line of battle having broadened to ten times his front line having entirely disappeared for the distance of twenty six miles.

Fitzpatrickson's own left being hard pressed at all points as if by an avalanche, was completely broken up and though he was doing all he could to prevent the Mandeliniens from penetrating any further, and managed by desperate efforts to rally some of his demoralized columns, a regular torrent of bullets spreading the carnage still wider brought him down dead, and the Mandeliniens' batteries pouring a veritable storm of shells, and high explosives, ripped and tore up the massive christian columns so fightfully, and caused such indescribable scathing havoc, that the few survivors broke into confusion and panic.

The whole series of assaulting Mandeliniens were now in a frightful tumultuous uproar of yelling, many hundreds of companies of christians having been destroyed, and being hard pressed general Fitzpatrickson surviving Mandeliniens also being exposed to a terrible fire were yelping yielding ground, a scores in of a organizations retreating in order, some in panic, leaving a sea of dead and wounded exposed to view, mingled with broken cannon and gun carriages.

Everywhere there now there was a frightful mixture of purple and graycoats in a pandemonium of bayonet, pikes, or pistol duels hand to hand.

THE INFERNO SPREADS.

"Give up your rifle ye christian lad. The jig is up boys and you may as well surrender as we have got you now." Was the cry of many Mandeliniens who were taking in a big toll of prisoners. General 1 Fwell Hanson separated from his shattered command escaped by giving a fierce defense under a hail of iron shot stones. Large divisions of Angelinians, Abheannians, and general Vincentians, were advised advancing hastily to Fitzpatrickson's aid, general Licknell's divisions also coming directed by Evans who ordered the Vivian girls under pains of punishment to stay away from the horrible battle storm, the new christian forces now counter attacking with such incredible fury that both sides were literally losing one hundred and eighty thousand in a minute. A part of Licknell's advancing forces caught in the deadly conflagration of Mandeliniens' musketry halted and returned as fierce a storm of fire, the left fell back but the rest halted and showed terrible fury in their attack upon the Mandeliniens the christians now being nine million million nine hundred thousand strong, holding the Mandeliniens at bay along their front but the divisions of Abi Abheannians and Angelinians under general Lony Phillipino and Johnston Brown had instantly counter charged with the most incredible fury that any one could imagine and would have certainly carried all before them and routed and destroyed the Mandeliniens as valiant assailants right then and there had they not suddenly got a veritable wall of roaring musketry and rifle blasts from the other Mandeliniens' waves which had halted in their advance. General Jordan Jackson's line of Abheannians fighting like cornered tigers, in that fierce and bloody inferno met complete annihilation, and general Kramer's divisions also facing the most murderous fire were being cut down in multitudes and threatened with destruction. But nevertheless enormous columns of reinforcements were being sent by Licknell under Evans' instructions, and the Mandeliniens' waves outnumbered and crushed to fragments finally staggered under the impact their main leader Licknell's Franklin being dangerously wounded.

1-375

The Angelinians now being successful a second time were pressing on with the fury of demons, and the whole of Licknell's Frank line's extreme line was torn to pieces, and swept back, general convention Kramer being killed, Meldon, convention being mortally wounded and also general Burns. Simultaneously the Angelinians pierced a portion of general Licknell's divisions' lines at the right while the firing was filling the very air with a deafening uproar, seventeen divisions of Licknell's army were annihilated, his left was enveloped in a smoke whirlpool, and his whole shredded front line faced an extensive inferno of smoke and fire from Licknell's advancing christians, thousands surrendering every fifteen minutes to save themselves from the terrible destruction! The yell of the Angelinians even after the firing lulled for several minutes was heard far and wide. It had been a second bloody crushing repulse for Hanley's army.

THE THIRD ASSAULT.

When the Mandeliniens made the third assault it was so swift and terrific, that the christians in the front lines did not have the slightest time for drill formations or to lie down and fire. The quickest thing to do was to use their bayonets bayonets, pistols, and pike pikes, playing multitudes of bayonets, against multitudes of bayonets, ringing in deafening ring of steel on steel.

The Mandeliniens pressed on giving forth their devil yell. Gusts upon gusts of hissing shells from the Mandeliniens' batteries blowing up in a continuous ear-splitting uproar, splintering the christian lines with fragments of steel and rock, ricocheting between the christian lines, and dealing inconceivable havoc among them.

The purple line however was steadily being reinforced as heavy reserves continually swept up and soon the crash and uproar was frightfully redoubled as the immense columns under general Walter Vincent attacked with terrible ferocity, their scene indeed becoming like a hell of fury, and as other columns were seen rushing to the support of the Angelinians, the Mandeliniens alarmed increased their attack with appalling fury. Vincent's center was in danger of annihilation, the whole battle line was wreathed in smoke, and Vincent's left being rapidly reduced stopped advancing, but though for an hour the christians held so stubbornly it seemed as if they would soon have to give way as already along one point the Mandeliniens were attacking with such incredible fury, that they had pierced the line, and drove the christians back with the most frightful loss. Despite this seemingly great success at this point, it was nevertheless that he was going to be and was the loser, for Vincent was sending frantic appeals for aid. Sixteen hundred cannons of heavy calibre had been dragged up in the meantime, which now opened fire at short range, seeking to shake down the very trees on the line of battle, and tear the Mandeliniens' columns to pieces.

Terrific indeed was the concussion of these guns..... Gathering gun s had also arrived, the assailants now receiving a frightful storm of shells, and doubled shot charges of canister, which was literally clearing the way for the exultant Angolians a terrific slaughter indeed for as columns melted away, they came on and came on but no nearer as they dissolved away one by one before they got within a few hundred feet of the christian works. Indeed indeed the carnage was fearful but still the infuriated landelinians persisted in their bloody attack, general Fowler falling, falling wounded his full name being Estrabro ker wouker, this soldier being taken prisoner by the Angolians.

A FRIGHTFUL FIRE ALONG THE ABHIEANNIAN LINE..... A FIRE WHICH CLEARS THE REGION OF THE ASSAILANTS.

At this moment general Hendon, SA Stank O'Rourke's Abhieannian division arrived, the million cannon like roar of the christian fire redoubling to fearfully, that the noise was appalling, and simultaneously the louder roar of the christian artillery was drowned out some completely at times by a simultaneous discharge of 11,000,000 muskets, but when the 30,000,000 christians fired volley after volley the din was a certainly ear-splitting and deafening at this point and general Vincent's men had by the impact of a furious counter charge been bent backwards, but O'Rourke's Abhieannians lost three hundred thousand in this counter charge and the landelinians coming back at them with the fury of an avalanche of yelling fiend fiends they were driven into confusion and recoiled before that appalling landelinian attack. Shells from the landelinian batteries were bringing down the christian gunners like flies and one of these shells killed O'Rourke as he was directing the desperate efforts of his men. His men were dismayed when they saw him fall, their ranks were being riddled, and were saying: However so fierce was the christian fire which roared so fierce enough to tear the world to pieces, the wide space in front of the christian position was at times completely swept clean of every landelinian soldier, and the Angolians redoubled their exertions soon held the foe at bay, at many points of the line. At other points the landelinians were white hot with fury and rushed against the christian line with the madness of fierce desperation and general George Francis hurling three mill on men and against the christian line along his point point, was killed and all his men were annihilated.

Along the center of the main extreme christian center the carnage had increased with the redoubled fury the large divisions in gray seeming to dissolve into fragments as fast as they came on, and though the survivors forced the christian line at one point far to the right was heard suddenly an indescribable roar of musketry, and in that location a landelinian surge twenty miles long and seventy deep melted gradually away into small fragments. Jammingburg led these troops in seeing this sight, ordered the survivors to fall back and general Foley having fallen a wounded the landelinians were finally driven into an panic that could never be halted among these columns.

Vincent was also killed by the Angolians sharpshooters who also mortally wounded general Vandley Antoine who had led a fierce charge against the thundering christian batteries. General Kerrigan, Ke Kerrigan Macolister, and War Warren falling also fell dead, but just now even the loss of their officers did not confuse the wicked landelinians who reinforced by general Brandon were resuming their attack with the fury they could muster into themselves, but again whole plains and lums, in front of the christian battalions christian line, was swept clean of all the landelinians, Vincent's main line now under General, Stank Ke Kerrigan was swept and torn to pieces by the christian fire, and large portions of it was again in the wild confusion. Indeed as the landelinian leaders realized the Abhieannians had a position of great advantage, being protected all along the line by walls of rock, trees and earthworks, which the landelinians had to climb exposing themselves at murderous close range, always going down like grain before the scythe at every discharge. Whole columns of the landelinians by sixes and had dissolved but recklessly confident of the fact that come with seeing the ribbon on the rope in hell's tug of war drawing over to their side gradually, they steadily came on with the ferocity of the wildest demons and the struggle seemed now in full swing. The landelinians continually met a hissing tempest of grape and canister aided by the fire of the heaviest Angolians cannon belching broadsides of shells and shrapnel, but inspired by their new leader the brave hit but wicked landelinians redoubled their exertions threatening to overhelm Vincent's Kernell's Abhieannians but as general Stank Kerrigan fell mortally wounded, and spaces for ten miles were cleared of all landelinians in front of the christian lines the landelinians again fell back in confusion. It seemed now that they were beaten but not yet.

CHAPTER NUMBER FOUR

Other columns of landelinians under Hannis Ushorne Wals Washburne and Andeline Johnston had been thrown into formation and these knew where the line of least resistance was to be met with, and they followed this pressing on suddenly between sacramentoes advancing Abhieannians and Chambersburg Abyssinkillians to make another charge in flank.

"Zi! those dreadful black battled devils! Never know when they are licked!" Groaned general Vincent horrified at the horrible slaughter. The christian center was pouring a terrific fire upon the assailants striving again with all their utmost fury, to drive back this attack led by general Francis's sagot. Thousands of shells, shrapnel by tens of thousands and grapeshot was now hurled upon the flankers themselves, which though they committed much havoc as to lay out whole fields of landelinians it failed to check them. A firing along the christian line so loud that it seemed as if the very heavens were hurrying increased and continued to increase as more and more went into action, and now scores of Angolians boyscouts seeing the peril began to signal to sacramentoes and Chambersburg and Chambersburg for help as now the awful screeching surge of boyscouts were beginning to rain the rear of the left of the christian line, which had seemed to be dominated by the christian guns.

CHAMBERSBURG'S ARRIVAL AND THE ROUT OF THE LANDELINIAN.

At last Chambersburg himself saw the frantic signals for help and ordered his Abyssinkillians on the double quick and these furious furious Calverinians rushing suddenly on with the ferocity of millions of uniformed savages, crashed like a whirling tornado upon the landelinian forces, moving on the christian left flank, who being mowed down by the score of thousands per minute, on both their own front and rear in this fearful inferno gave way in panic and confusion, the pursuing christians delivering a withering fire that tore the gray waves to many fragments, the survivors fleeing like sheep. Simultaneously sacramentoes Abhieannians coming up made a roaring eye cyclonic charge amid the dreadful carnage upon the other flanking landelinian columns, routing them also and capturing four hundred thousand prisoners, generals Jennings, Padula, Tamerline, Henderson, Maltorf, Tangeline, and also many among them.

In the whole line of rout, thousands of fleeing "landelinians" fell riddled by bullets, the remaining christian columns fairly mowing the fields, with the dead and wounded praying. In rushed the Abbeismian line carrying all before them, shivering whole divisions that tried to make a stand, and annihilating several brigades of three hundred men, including ten squadrons of Cergolian newly, ten thousand Omerian dragoons, and two companies of "de-vollatinian" lancers. Thousands of ranks had been mowed down during the rout by the scathing fire of the christians the landelinians being almost without a single leader retreating in general confusion. Chambersburg men even clearing their own front, during the main charge reducing a landelinian division of three hundred thousand men to one thousand, and driving the landelinian attack back to its lair, where it they held against three bayonet charge attacks, and two by cavalry squadrons.

Indeed the landelinians payed heavily for working themselves between the armies of sacramento and Chambersburg, but truthfully they were or had been ignorant of their presence, and had the known of their presence they could have held them both successfully as they had outnumbered these christian columns three to one. It was a disastrous repulse indeed, the flanking columns having been almost annihilated in this engagement.

THE FIFTH ASSAULT ON THE CHRISTIAN CENTER.

Indeed there was no chance whatever of the "landelinians" winning the christian positions in this rocky wooded region, so well defended as they were, but Manley with the one same overconfidence that many fools always have insisted that the assault should be recently used and continued, and had sent forward over seventeen million landelinians to attack again, these being under general Caldwell, and so a fifth fierce onslaught was on.

Along the left of the christian center a large division of landelinians being cut to pieces by the christian fire became panic stricken but the other landelinian columns made a furious onrush charging through the shell stormed woods, into blazing brush, and among the boulders. Among those in confusion, many trod one over one another in their haste to get away trampling one another under foot while volleys of horrid outcries filled the air, mingled with cries of pain and terror cannon fire also breaking out seemingly over yonder to them, filling the air with an awe inspiring awe, mingled with muffled roarings of musket volleys also breaking out. Open spaces were bullet swept so that these unprotected spaces were difficult to face. All along the line a hundreds of thousands of saplings were cut in two by the hail of minnies, millions of trees were peppered by bullets, and incriminated by bursting shrapnell, while at close quarters terrible mists of canister marked and mangled large masses of landelinians. General "urns" landelinians were the first to reach the christian line, consisting of one thousand divisions in great gray, making a line forty miles in extent, but a gap twenty miles long was torn in this line, a thousand gaps being given in other parts of the same line and the line impetuous advance of the survivors was checked.

General Burns falling wounded and his surviving columns being reduced to mere fragments, retreated in amazing confusion. General "Pages" landelinians simultaneously had advanced his own forty miles line against a part of the christian front, one big surge making a rush here, another a rush there, and the Angelinians being under the cover of rocks and trees, poured a terrific fire that withered these surges, the few thousands of survivors retreating, slipping in the blood of their fallen comrades. But the surviving columns advanced with the fury and cunning of demons, the ten thousand three hundred fifteen Angelinian guns letting loose their own titanic concert of hell and out of a vast iridescent cloud of smoke smoke with the terrific storm of murderous shells which tore surge after surge of the landelinians into scattered fragments.

But still more massive landelinian surges swarmed into view and though the whole christian line stormed with fire, the landelinians came on, surge after surge was ploughed through and through and went up to pieces but nevertheless the survivors came on. Hundreds of cannons after hundreds of cannons blew up on the christian side, and one cannon after another from being overheated, but nevertheless as the gray surges went to fragments to the last column, and receded in confusion, the christian "christian ye" broke forth in exultation along the whole. Along these other wing of the christian center the landelinians advanced in a most atrocious wave the full length of the opposing christian line, but regular regular multitudes of landelinians actually rushed to their deaths. One quarter of the surge which was forty and twenty miles long withered away, the other quarter went into scattered fragments, and the third quarter faced annihilation, but the remainder reached the christian line, and hand to hand over the positions scores of thousands leaped, the christian gunners being surrounded fought like demons, with hand pikes rammerstaves, and even stones. Now it was the turn of the christian officers to signal for help. General Johnston's Handrooks was on the watch and as he could spare general Carson Cooks twenty six divisions he ordered them to the rescue. They had not far to go and just like sacramento and Chambersburg turned the scale in the fourth assault, Cooks turned it in the fifth, but in a more animated fashion.

The landelinians at this point went into action, with one million seven hundred thousand men, but now had only nine hundred thousand men remaining. They retreated but still the landelinians did not fall back at every point as yet, for over ten million Omerians had gained a lodgement on the center of the christian line, where for four hours a drama of unspeakable horror proceeded among rocks and trees, and only when slaughter in terrible numbers, did the landelinians yield slowly as reinforcements drawn from the left had accumulated their strength against the assaults and now all along the line the foe retreated in confusion.

Smoke of battle enveloped the sea of warring wounded, and the voices voiceless dead, and the blackening blood-clots in woods hills and fields. Manley had already 19,515,700 down making the total losses altogether as 24,834,000 as at other points, the death list among the whole being 9,834,000. The christian loss was 8,950,000.

MANLEY'S SIXTH ASSAULT.

A lull of five minutes ensued and in the mean while three hundred landelinian guns concentrated on the christian line and along this whole line of artillery there broke out a tremendous frightful roar, which shook the whole battle field like an earthquake, and a terrific tempest of shells high explosives, and streams of solid shot poured among the christian lines followed by heartrending destruction among the foliage and terrible terrible carnage among the christians.

Hundreds of horses were dreadfully torn, and as most of the Angelinian guns were not long range cannons the Angelinians were not able to answer. But nevertheless the guns were dragged out of the enemy's range and as the rain of shot and shell from the landelinian batteries became fearful and the concussion of the artillery, and explosives of so many shells shook the ground like an earthquake, general Vivians own line of batteries far to the rear gave a very decided answer, and soon there was a pandemonium of thousands of exploding shells over a space of sixty miles in length and the landelinians striving frantically bit but in vain to withdraw their guns out of range of this inferno of shell barrages, fell in frightful numbers, and nothing was anything now but smoke and a sea of explosions.

One ammunition after another he blew up, cannons also blew up but by the thousands, and inflammable stuff of all description caught fire. Long lines of ammunition store houses blew up making worse explosions than that at Ghairity gun, and uprooting hundreds of thousands of trees by the concussion. Thousands of landelinian guns were disabled or silenced, and now seeing that his guns were unable to answer to general Vivians barrage, Manley ordered the infantry of general Spruders army to charge the christian center with all their force, and sent scout ing parties if possible to locate the deadly chains of christian guns.

Five hundred thousand christian guns had been concentrating upon Manley's batteries, and the bombardment of the McWhirly McWhirther fortifications never made such a clamor as this as now nearly one million cannon were roaring and thundering in a terrible storm of salvos. 5 Zoe Rae Allengerburgers lines had concentrated their intentions to another point, reinforcing and bringing up fresh gathling guns and received the first section of the Glandelinian assault led by general Antoine Vandia-Allengerburgers who whole line was seemingly engulfed in smoke and flame for twenty minutes the noise of the battle roared with intolerable fury, the Glandelinian surges went into mangled fragments, the survivors tried to press on only to be decimated.

Other Glandelinian surges advanced with amazing fury, their main line was torn to fragments, two twenty mile raps appeared but still the foolish survivors though facing the annihilating fire did not halt but charged on yelling with earpiercing demoniac shrieks of rage. General Francis Rhymers division of Omarians and Gargolians encountered a fierce annihilating fire and fled in confusion, the survivors returning a storm of fire from under cover. Amid the dreadful carnage however Zoe Rae Allengerburger was killed his line broke into confusion, and the enemy became victorious along this point. At other sections of the Christian center the fury of the enemy's attack was increased. General 1 Flaivors batteries cut their massive surges to pieces the firing along the whole Christian line assumed a most blasting and annihilating form so that for the distance of three hundred yards from the Christian line the space was kept clear of the Glandelinians who fell as fast as they got within range. But the Glandelinians attacking Allengerburgers lines had reached the works in one simultaneous rush while his Christians were demoralized and driven into confusion by his death, and with maddened yells of frenzy and fury threw themselves among the confused Christians the dead and wounded piling in windrows rapidly.

With the fury of demons the Angelinians who kept cool strove to beat their frenzy stricken assailants back keeping up a storming musket fire at point blank shooting down many companies.

To thousands upon thousands of the Glandelinians under general Hortense who reached and poured over the Christian works and parapets were shot down a pandemonium of shot shooting, and bayonet and sword blows ensuing everywhere, the Glandelinians under general Brandon facing a bristling wall of bayonets dripping with gore, and while most of the Christian line amid all the confusion all around them stood as immovable as a rock general Hortense and Brandon fell mortally wounded, the numbers of the foe being frightfully reduced.

The fight at this section was a regular wholesale massacre hand to hand. The Angelinian cannoners though fired fiercely attacked by overwhelming numbers stuck stubbornly to their guns, cutting down masses of their assailants, but the furious survivors only mingled with them in a desperate hand to hand struggle. The part of Allengerburgers line which was in confusion seemed in the danger of a rout before the whirlwind, for in their confused state they only made a feeble barrier before the waves of gray, the Glandelinians threatening to carry all before them.

THE SIXTH ASSAULT REPULSED.

Nevertheless the apparently victorious Glandelinians with ineffable dismay beheld overhead overwhelming reinforcements that were rushing swiftly to the aid of general Allengerburgers men, and though any many of the captured guns were swung around upon the Christian reinforcements, they did not have a minutes time to use them, the heavy columns of Angelinians rushing forward with the frenzied fury of storm waves, there was a pandemonium of confusion, as if a great typhoon bursted forth, cannon roaring in terrific spasmodic detonations, detonations echoed back by the fierce and sharper detonations of Spokems heavy cannons blazing terrifically forth with the most intolerable roar and ear-splitting crash, trees went to earth with crash and uproar, bayonets by hundreds of thousands at once clashed in frightful tumult the air was clouded with the smoke of musketry and shell explosions, and the Angelinians swarmed forward like an onrushing tidal wave carried all before them, and no longer did the Glandelinians think of victory, but to escape that horrible inferno was their ardent wish. The Angelinians with high universal yells, pressed on with fixed bayonets the Glandelinians again retreating in panic and confusion which gradually became a stampede. Thousands of the Glandelinians continually hearing the ear-splitting roar of cannons and musketry behind them fled in a mad panic, that all the attempts of the officers could not check, the panic stricken Glandelinians trampling recklessly over the fallen in their desperate attempts to escape the frightful showers of shells, which was added by a tempest of high explosives, which crashed among them splintering and crushing thousands of trees, splintering bur bushes and bathing the fleeing Glandelinians with a storm of destruction.

A series of mighty roars even from new batteries increased the panic the repulse of the sixth assault at every point of the line ending in a stampede rout, the panic stricken Glandelinians vomiting themselves forward toward their own lines, amid bloodcurdling yells of fear and terror and shrieks of pain. Many officers dreading that this retreat would turn into a disaster, tried to rally them but they fell one by one. Even at the longest range high explosives fell fast torrent upon torrent among the panic stricken Glandelinian columns, many thousands of which under general Shuman rushed into a deep gully for cover from the Angelinian annihilating fire, but large forces of Christians descending upon them took them all prisoners. General Cruder rushed his forces forward to check the panic but was killed amid the dreadful carnage cries resounding from all sides.

"Hap" "Help for Antoine. His divisions are being routed."

THE SEVENTH ASSAULT . WHO WOULD BELIEVE IT?

"Fall back slowly and keep lines together." Said general Charles Brown main commander of Christian center who had come to the rescue as he saw fresh Glandelinian columns coming to stop his victorious advance as he had come within sight of the Glandelinian front. "We must repel this second column at all cost and give up the pursuit." General Charles Brown had seen the danger of another assault just in time for heavy reinforcements had sprang out in wedge formation under general Castoria, and that sprucer platoon would probably crush his front and overlap his whole line and they all would be lost. His men were already abandoning the pursuit and Charles Brown rode up to a group of officers who were complaining about his orders, and said:

"We must retire or general Castoria and spruder will overlap us. We don't want to be annihilated by those black devils."

"But Antones divisions will get away and reinforce Antones or Castoria I meansaid general Cain."

"I know, but if we continue the pursuit the Glandelinians under Castoria will overlap us. Hark at general Vivian's storming batteries. They will hold them down until we reform. Not a moment is to be lost."

In fifteen minutes general Charles Brown's divisions were swiftly reitit retiring, several officers threatening to resign because Brown was withdrawing his forces from the pursuit. His divisions hastened onward the advance of Cs Castoria and spruder being terrific, the Angelinian batteries playing on them with telling effect but just now they could not be stopped. The left of the gray surge was torn, tottered, and bleeding, but amid the ear-splitting detonations of shells, all around them, above them, and behind the survivors came on giving vent to yell after yell, the air famous "Devil yell".

Charles Brown was encompassed with doubt and horror, for he knew that that another catastrophe was threatening the Glandelinians, and soon there was another awful hour indeed. New batteries of Christian artillery were opening fire pouring terrific volleys of shrapnell, that mowed the Glandelinians down in whole companies, shattering many columns mangling the main divisions and devastating the roads. One of the divisions of the Angelinians counter charging mingled with Westbrook Headas columns, and after a deadly scrimmage in which the dead and wounded lay so thick that they almost concealed the ground, Headas was compelled to surrender.

Large divisions under of Angelinians under winning were reinforcing general Charles Brown and a Shives batteries of machine guns poured a tremendous hose stream of canister into the very faces of the Glandelinians, many columns of them shrank shrieking back from this new fire the smoke of battle hiding both opposing forces. Hennings batteries were heaping up the dead and wounded in gray, winning, Allenburgers men torn up by shell fire were recoiling, their leader having fallen, two of his brigades being surrounded and captured, and it seemed as if this assault was on the verge of collapse. But not yet. At other points the desperate Angelinians were fighting with the energy of despair to press back their furious assailants, but thousands of Christians were were dropping per minutes, the enemy hushing avenues in the solid purple lines but general Spruider and Mc-Holleser and Stanck caught in bad ground and surrounded by the Christians were forced to surrender with their commands.

Meanwhile Spruider's front lines being under a scathing fire were already thinned terribly, Allenburgers Johnston's whole line was crushed, their own dead and wounded paving the ground, and also surrounded he was forced to to surrender his Glandelinians being so filled with horror at the terrible slaughter, being happy to give up their arms and call it quits. Charles Brown's whole line had now been formed into a long impenetrable wave of men, Bernards had already reformed five hundred thousand of his men who had opened a telling fire, the Glandelinians finally falling back under the cover of their own guns, the firing now beginning to slacken though the dull thunders of the hundreds of thousands of Christian cannon fairly shaking the country and far distant hills and battering the enemy's lines for sixty miles could still be heard. Several of general Cammilla's Crowleys divisions who had met with terrible slaughter during the pursuit were marching to the rear. Even and anon the sound of far distant furious battering fire of more cannons made general Charles Brown hasten his preparations, as he knew Castoria's armies not having met the heavy Christian fire yet were advancing fast to make the eighth assault. Along general Hanson's Castings line all was silent many of his exhausted men hurrying to the rear. The new advancing force of Glandelinians were now close to the Christian line, where all was now silent.

THE EIGHT FRIGHTFUL ASSAULT. A VERY LUCKY STORM OF CAR
NAGE. DEATH OF GENERAL SPRUDER AND CASTORIA.

The Glandelinians were rushing forward with the most tremendous fury despite the hell fire of general Vivian's five hundred thousand guns, which had continued all the while since they first broke into action, setting batteries of machine guns letting loose their own rain of hell, but nevertheless the whole line of Christian infantry was still quiet. Spruider's advance and also Castoria's was magnificent, the fire of Castings batteries being unable to check them though his gun fire committed horrible slaughter. Thompson's Haners Glandelinians fell in perfect waves, and being unable to stand the withering fire in which there was no pause, they halted and fell back swiftly and silently. A large surge of graycoats striding fiercely across the already body strewn fields which became an inferno of shells, recoiled in confusion and panic. From some of the Glandelinian batteries now able to be in action hurled frightful numbers of shells, among Castings batteries but the shells fell a little too short, and though dead and wounded Christian soldiers were piled in ridges among the guns, the showers of shells crashing among the massive lines of Christians failed to cause confusion despite the terrible destruction all along the line, but also incurred the fire of the law Baldwin's great batteries of Christian guns storming away in fury and as the cannonading swelled to a warfare of titans, the surge in gray came within range of the Christian musketry, which had been silent all this while, and the whole line opened upon the whole advancing fifty miles surge with terrifying fury, a column of 1,910,000 men melting away with the deaths of generals

Randall and Messers division of one million three hundred thousand men were also annihilated with fewer totally and mortally wounded and the surviving divisions were in terrifying confusion. Generals Melval Wattson and Griefold Johnston being killed. The whole surge was badly torn up, a gap thirty miles long appeared, and general Jagg who had been placing large Glandelinian columns under general Puckney and Warden and Churchmannia with Heddas cavalry with an immense force of Argolians under general Krania in the plains of Francis Atlanta was killed by a cannon ball and all these other generals named being severely but not mortally wounded, with their commands all cut up and in confusion. The impetuous advance of Spruider's Lyman's surge, though not driven back was checked, Spruider Lyman had been killed, and the fire of Cammilla's Churchmann's divisions disconcerting the Glandelinians. The sudden disastrous collision into which they had come with the Christian forces was doubly terrible, and finally they retired on confusion. They retreated in regular human currents panic stricken.

The officers had made the most desperate efforts to rally the Glandelinians but fell one by one. Thousands of Angelinians had started to persevere but were recalled, every one of Spruider's divisions having lost their commanders who were killed or injured during the storm of fire on both sides. Along other parts of the Christian line, wherever Castoria's surge was advancing, resembling vast multitudes in line formation many companies of Angelinians had met annihilation for their brave stand. The main line of Castoria's assailants had come on facing a fire along the Christian line that roared like a hundred billion cannon, and as the carnage became more heartrending with many waves of men dissolving the Glandelinians under general Miller Mullan recoiled, but the other columns rushed on with piercing yells, up to the very Christian parapets, Mullan far in advance of them. Mullan and Chaner Crowley were killed in front of the Christian works and Flynn Shaner took his place only to fall also mortally wounded. However Chaner Johnston took personal command driving on with indescribable fury, but all the thousands that did swarm over the Christian works, were shot down. Shaner Johnston being riddled with bullets. Herdu Herdrudes and Prue though severely wounded were able to retain command but now as their lines were completely crushed to fragments they withdrew from the Christian works with the utmost utmost heat before the counter charge of the furious Angelinians who had repulsed them. A scene of greatest confusion and flight ever witnessed in the war on the Glandelinian side before now followed the whole line in fragments, retreating in a stampede. Several columns tried to rally against the counter charge of the Christians but an avalanche of bullets and torrents of canister swept them down in frightful numbers, and other columns who did not retire in such confusion and whose lines were storming with a withering fire, received suddenly broadside of shells miles long from Baldwin's guns and they were soon scattered like chaff.

Hundreds of thousands of the Glandelinians were terror stricken by this time, thinking of nothing but flight and escape, and general Castoria being killed the Glandelinians though meeting no gun fire except Baldwin's swept forward unchecked in their panic and rout, and the wheatfields became crumpled with purple and graycoats as they poured on in human torrents.

General Almarken's divisions of Omarians were closely pursued by heavy columns of Abhiscannians and Conventinians under general Genial who in spreading out rapidly in three directions simultaneously in an attempt to head them off, had finally surrounded them each column pressing on from an opposite direction the scene becoming more appalling than ever before in a battle.

Having been hotly pursued by an overwhelming force of Christians in their rear, and hard pressed by another force in their front and left, and then in attempting to escape another way, from four found their escape barred, after trampling and trampling over one another another throwing away their muskets in their hastily flight amid blood curdling yells, and shrieks of of terror, and cries of pain rage and terror, finally gave up the struggle, throwing up their hands in token of surrender, and accepting mercy at the hands of their furious Christian enemies.

The main portion of Castoria's shattered line was now retreating more rapidly, now without the protection which their batteries could have afforded them, for general Vivian's batteries were in the same spasmodic action pouring upon upon the Glandelinian positions that same six sixty mile barrage of shells, the Christian counter charge being at its utmost the whole elements of civilization seeming to be broken up, the smoke of the recent firing of musketry and cannon being still so thick that nothing could hardly be seen at the distance of three hundred feet. A hundred thousand panic stricken men went by general Phelan Spruder who was trying to a halt his main shattered divisions, but shells and solid shot tore hundreds of caps in his lines, and soon his columns were joining in the rout. Along general von Brown's lines the firing was slowly slackening, but though Castor's lines were routed, all the attackers had not as yet given way, the enemy at some points facing the fire of two hundred machine guns having been only haulted, several of the enemy leaders had been sreading their columns but bewildered by the fire of Baldwin's guns they failed to advance. General Francis Waultz's Glandelinians were still advancing against the Christians, yelling like demons, but a sharp fire of minnies poured into their very faces compelled them to retire in confusion.

Allengruber Spruder had fallen wounded on the Glandelinian side when the general storm of fire had broken loose along the Christian line and general Henry Katellina, had taken his place only to fall wounded also.

The Glandelinians were now retiring at all points as general Hienze's postello fell dead, but as reinforcements were seen advancing to the aid of the retreating Glandelinians, and as also as Castor's shattered lines received reinforcements the pursuing Christians withdrew, the new foe pressing forward to make another assault the whole of the advancing gray line of newcomers being wreathed in smoke as they made battle formation the firing now being more intensified.

AN UPROAR OF HELL, PREVAILS DURING THE NINTH ASSAULT WHICH BECOMES A SEETHING STORM OF GARR CARNAGE!!.....

Clanterson's parks of artillery arriving also to the support of the Christians kept up a stupendous and reverberating roar, more and more cannon added to these until the very uproar of hell seemed to break loose but never theless the Glandelinians continued to advance in four long surges twenty miles long but these almost melted away while the main line cut and torn into pieces showed evidence of terror and utter confusion though the others still advanced. Simultaneously the whole of the left wing of this assaulting column under general Logan Allengruber still continuing to advance outstrided the other series of columns while Henning

Hans Handerson's immense gray surge reaching general Waultz's Christian line closed with them and when the smoke of firing lifted an appalling scene was exposed to view. Only one sight of general Hennings Handerson's divisions were left out of six million men the few survivors being seen dimly in the battle haze as they were retreating, the rest being on the ground dead or wounded or as prisoners.

Logannia's allagert's main line however though having three time two twenty miles gaps torn in it had continued to advance. Genes divisions coming upon Schoeder's Glandelinian line where they also closed, but the same result was occurring, the waves of Glandelinians dissolved like snowbanks, and every where all along the line so many columns were mangled that Genes had only one third of his men left and also he himself was wounded.

Logannia's Allengruber had also been wounded and general Frank Archibald who took his place was killed at the horrifying slaughter, and wrote to Hanley that the Christian positions could never be forced at all.

AGAIN VICTORIOUS, THE ANGELINIANS CARRY ALL BEFORE THEM, COUNTERCHARGING THE DISORDERED RANKS OF THE ENEMY.

The rest of the Glandelinian surge was now coming nearer Faustlinia arriving with all his Abyssinkillians, and eighty batteries of artillery mostly all machine guns.

The carnage had now increased with tenfold vehemence and fury the fresh Christian artillery adding to the losses of the foe, but here but as the losses of the enemy were, many of the divisions of the Christians also melted away in the face of the Glandelinian fire in the face of the murderous Glandelinian fire which seemed to increase a thousand times more fierce than that of the Christians. Everywhere for the length of eighty miles there was now a storm of seething battle, the whole front line of Archibald's Archibalds extreme right grand being suddenly shattered, torn, tottered and bleeding, but still the survivors advancing advanced and at the command of their officers held their fire. Like an avalanche of damnation the Glandelinians came on and one of the largest Glandelinian divisions under general Noble Fairbanks' postello's Abbieannian line attacking with a fury that threatened to bear down everything in their path but were smashed as a tidal wave is against the rocky shore.

The whole of Johnston's Spruders line had come up simultaneously only to also dissolve into fragments, and the main line of assault, coming up, and closing together suddenly dissolved into smoke, and all of a sudden the firing ceased. What was the meaning of it? What had happened? The Christian generals soon saw indeed as the smoke cleared away. The main Glandelinian surge torn with gaps miles long and numbered by the score was wavering at all points and hundreds of the mighty purple waves though also shattered just as severely, were rushing forward in a counter advance, and crashing down upon the Glandelinians who were retreating in confusion, with the fury of the avalanches of hell carrying all before them.

Archibald having attacked with over ten million men had been repulsed with the loss of over two quarters of his entire division, and along whole lines of pursued and pursuers could be seen the still desperate hand to hand fighting, the Angelinians cutting down the Glandelinians like grain. Again the firing showed signs of abating but now for a eighty miles everywhere was seen scenes of desolation, and seas of dead and wounded Glandelinians. This fierce attack made by general Archibald's Glandelinians showed indeed their beautiful courage.

THE TENTH ASSAULT. AND WHAT BECAME OF THE RESULT.

Many gaps had been torn in the surges of retreating Glandelinians, and general Yatch Yack, and Doc-Yack's divisions were shivered as they closed with Baldwin's infantry, but thousands of Christians in his command had been crushed and mangled among the wounded alone, and the Glandelinians under Howard constantly checked by the Christian resistance under Berry grouped under the probable shelter of trees amid the frightful uproar that shook the air.

Other forces of Glandelinians were still retreating, but a large force of Glandelinian Francis Mackenti Mackentire's countercharged Mackentire's narrow pursuing Angelinians with great violence, throwing them into a complete panic, but most of these retreating Angelinians had reached shelter where the main Christian center during the short lull was making preparations to meet the next assault of the enemy. The Christian positions being strengthened by new batteries, and the broken or disabled guns being withdrawn to the rear. When the assault was on again a frightful outburst of eleven million muskets broke brook loose all at once while the Glandelinians came rushing on in thousands upon thousands of columns. Pitiful indeed was the sight of the hundreds of thousands of Glandelinians in purple but they nevertheless were not daunted the millions of survivors swarming to the defense of their torn and battered colors, a mighty surge of Glandelinians being shattered by a most terrific fire ever met from the Christians, the furious musket broadsides rolling on in deafening ear-splitting crashes the whole line from the shattered stretches of woods showing plainly the havoc caused by the Christian fire.

The Glandelinians under general von Brown weakening in courage at the sight of their hundreds of thousands of killed and wounded comrades, which were mangled and brightly by the awful torrent of canister and grape threatened to become bewildered.

They hesitated and then fell back, with other Glandelinian divisions under Francis Mackenti Mackentire's divisions whose columns twenty miles long melted into fragments, and though the survivors pressed on amid the cries of hundreds of mangled forms, and the appalling wounded rolling and writhing upon the blood soaked ground;

736

"For God's sakes don't go into that inferno to us. It's suicide. We've tried that and look at us. It's only for the dead not the living."

But nevertheless they pressed on only to meet a fiercer storm of fire which covered the christian front or buried it in the fresh dead and wounded graycoats, and the survivors soon fell back horrified, as they had been shot down like the leopards are torn from the forest in a hurricane.

Twenty Glandelinian generals, whose names are, Souvenier, Gordon, Streeter, Package, Pilease, Choleral mercury, cocaine, Morphine, haritable, Fullsize, Pigeon, Fullsize-pigeon, prostrate, Philliblain, Posion, Ivey, Callous, Farache, Ezema, lies, and inflammation lay prostrate near the christian works, having met the fierce storm of fire face to face, all these these officers with the funny names being either killed wounded and dying....

Munzeys Glandelinians advancing upon the christian center where the firing had broke broke with the same awful roar as elsewhere, making the very air hedious with the clamor, met such terrific slaughter that the very ground they passed, was gray with their dead and wounded comrades, the wreaths of smoke shutting out the frightful scenes, from the eyes of the christians. Almost three quarters of these assailants had been mowed down by the sweeping christian fire, which swept away every mass of men exposed to it, Hawkshaw with his divisions, and those under our Cudrey Costello, and Nenebi des being overwhelmed with horrid ying da disaster.....The survivors surviving Glandelinians however reached the christian works only to disolve away, and the panic stricken Glandelinian survivors at this point became terrified and panic stricken, not being able to stand thisavalanche of fire, any longer, and threaten with annihilation, retreated in a wild confusion, everything all along the line of battle being obscured in blid blinding suffocating wreaths of smoke..... Theother Glandelinians however continued the attack in perfect billows of gray, but at every point the christians held stubbornly, and so many Glandelinian waves were cut to pieces that they were terribly confused the sudden awful roar of the murderous christian fire stunning the multitudes of the Glandelinians. General vera Bernard Munns Glandelinians were being surrounded by the christians they attacked their very lines seeming to be opened in many wide gaps, and seeming to be engulfed into a vortex of destruction, and so general Munns forces though captured managed some way to allow general munns to escape. All this while a most inconceivable roar of musketry and cannons was heard along the extreme left of the christian center the whole assaulting line being so terribly engulfed in the frightful carnage that the surviving columns were panic stricken, and soon again the whole gray surge broke and fled..

ASSAULT NO NUMBER ELEVEN.

During the eleventh assault the whole scene was obscured in wreaths of smoke from blazing musketry and cannon, the battles dreadful roar being the same as before, general Gandonias Glandelinians falling upon the stubborn christians under general watt son Wallenson, whose musketry and cannon swept everything before it. Barbie Caseys Glandelinians simultaneously crashed upon generals Neldon and Maurice Costellos, massive Abbiennian line who made the most serious resistance ever seen in the war before, and for the Glandelinians it was useless, and surrounding the christians as they did th they failed in the assault.

But at other parts of the christian line the Glandelinians werestill attacking with murderous fury, for among the Glandelinians there seemed to be a regular intoxicated rush of men headlong to a speedy result, without the slightest moment to think, charging indeed as it seemed deliberately into the jaws of death.

General warate Glandelinians, also attacked simultaneous the Angelinian cannon shelling the foe frightful y.....

736

Everywhere now the Glandelinians were facing broadsides of shells and musketry and the batteries of Costellos guns, and frightful indeed to the ears of the Glandelinians was the scream of the christian shells over their heads. 1,000 gathling guns simultaneously let loose their concert of hell, added by cannons of heavy calibre hundreds of round shot ricocheting over the ground and among the Glandelinians like hat liners from ballbats, making thousands of men headless, opening up hundreds of abdomens per minute, taking off thousands of legs or arms and killing many and yet the Glandelinians only laughed being bound to win. For the extent of scores of miles the most murderous musket broadsides ever described for battles came ripping frightfully through the surges in gray added by more terrific broadsides of shells mingled with canister from many thousands of machine guns shivering every gray surge twenty miles long like window glass falling from the tenth floor of a building into a cement pavement. General Hearats Glandelinians reached the christian works amid the uproar of hell's damnation, and general wagners Abbiennians before in fearful peril of annihilation withdrew before the Glandelinian onslaught.

The left of the main Glandelinian surge had been terribly reduced, and the survivors were compelled to give way. But the right and center kept up the fiercest attack, with the frenzy of despair, large divisions of infantry and artillery in front of the Glandelinians seemed to strike their last desperate blows against those yelling, cursing, swearing, screaming plunging maddened purple figures that repelled them in multitudes, the Glandelinian in their peril during the assault seeming to hang on the edge of a precipice with their teeth as it were. It was a perfect scene of horribly orgery and devastation, the very massive lines of christian infantry, yelling worse than the foe had ever done, continued continually undulated in ghastly lurid sheets of flame, and smoke, innumerable gaps were in the gray lines and hearted divisions relieving the full force of the christian fire gave way in confusion.

Furiously and steadily the furious fighting continued, the assailants pouring toward the desperate yelling christians, like immense torrents of men. General Nicholas wagners battery of two hundred cannon had only one gun remaining, a shell having exploded, a fragment opening his abdomen, but the brave general held his intestines in with one hand, while with the other he ran the gun forward, fired it and dropped dead with the discharge. The plateau along the christian line was fairly paved with dead and wounded Glandelinians but Hearst leading on his survivors into that frightful inferno leaped the works in front of the christian line, followed by one million, nine hundred fifty thousand men.

"Give those Angelinian dogs the cold steel." He shouted and the Angelinians amid a tumult of bayonets were thrown back by the fury of the Glandelinian onslaught the Glandelinians surging over the works with deafening cheers and yells of derision.

Hearst leaped the breastworks, laid his hand on a captured gun, of a disabled battery, while over his head floated the tattered, ragged flag of Glandelinia. Then Hearst dropped by pierced by a thousand bullets as the Angelinians reopened a withering fire, while sixty thousand men of his men like the summariners of an execution were shot down, the progress of the advancing Glandelinians being checked, while through the struggling christian line came heavy columns of christians in reserve at the charge. Now dear readers the angelinians were now the assailants attacking the Glandelinians with appalling fury. Baldwin's infantry also arrived and propagated the effects of their insidious fire for ten miles, and other christian divisions seemed to be swallowed up in clouds of smoke and though out of seventy one million Glandelinians ten million sixt six hundred thousand remained, and yet the survivors still maintained their desperate attack. Thousands of regiments of Glandelinians had been annihilated immense multitudes of Glandelinians lay everywhere and the line of graycoats under general Tanalions who began to savor looked like a to torn surge. Of his division of three hundred thousand men only forty men were left. Six million three hundred thousand five hundred of Francis Francis chaders nine million Glandelinians had been literally slain. The whole surge of Glandelinians now repeated, their eleventh assault having been a crushing bloody failure, the foe having even failed to turn either flank of the christian center as was intended. General Camillia tumors divisions which had no taste of the battle as yet was just reaching the field and so Tanley was determined to try again on a florid hope to make another effort to pierce the christian center and though his officers declared that it was just as much folly as a man trying to walk the third rail he nevertheless he declared that he was bound to win the assault if he had to do just that very thing, not intending intending to march general Camillias' marmers, landelinians away in retreats retreat instead of trying them at the game and as they were so high spirited he was not daunted by his repeated failure.

THE LINE OF HEAVY TUG OF WAR DURING THE TWELFTH ASSAULT OF THE GANDERLINIANS.

On the christian side all the broken field pieces and other cannons were being removed and fresh guns put into their places. General Viviananna's lines of artiller' was now in general action, and Manleys feared indeed if he could not silence those thundering batteries there would be no use in attempting the first main assault on the christian center, where now all was silent. Manleys main batteries out of range of general Vivian's sixty mile barrage, were rapidly being placed into position. Already all the difficulties of the ground between the christian center and the point of attack was revealed. Large sections of woods were shattered as if by a thousand hurricanes the immense stream of the mainline was choked with the dead soldiers which almost overflowed the river and which retarded the movement of the landelinian artillery and as at Gloria in which soon followed, necessitated a fight with infantry against long lines of christian batteries. Manley knew that the christian center was also defended by many chains of artillery supported by five lines of strong infantry and cavalry forces and heavy reserves in mass arranged in many columns, and protected by rocks and trees, and barbed wire fences, while his landelinians when attacking had very little shelter of any kind whatever. During those eleven times the unfortunate landelinians had been compelled to charge over three miles of open open wreckage and body strewn ground, under the terrible fire of the christian guns. Even immense detachments of grenadiers had been thrown forward to support the artillery over 16, 120 cannon being stretched over a space of seventeen miles, along the central division of the main center, 14,000 on the right, and 20,000 on the left, while six sixteen batteries of the seventh corps were arriving consisting of 10 10 10 cannons of heavy calibre making a total of 52, 120 guns to be massed against the next assault.

Some of these batteries were under general Hendon stationed to support general Trimble's lines, Wilson's machine guns were posted in the fields of Catspaw run, and on his left was general Pett's heavy calibre cannon guarded by generals Wilcox, and Michael. Wartz's battalions of machine guns and motor batteries. General Viviananna now was also cannonading general Manley's center, with all his available centimeters Krupp and other great guns trying to hold down the next assault that was sure to come. General Viviananna could see that important movements was evidently taking place opposite his main center, the enemy as he realized were concentrating and placing a great number of batteries to in position to answer general Vivian's sixty mile barrage.

A few minutes had passed when Manley's long line of batteries sent in its rolling ominous message thundering through the air, and echoing and reechoing all over the battle field and throughout the whole mountainous ranges in that region in the volume of thunder of hell, the whole line of landelinian artillery being ablaze, and indeed it was the heaviest cannonading ever heard yet in the war, the hundreds of thousands of ear-splitting explosions succeeding each other so rapidly that it was as continuous as that many minkets in one continuous drum roll and shook the country severely like an earthquake for two thousand miles. To Manley's surprise, three hundred thousand five hundred sixty guns on the christian center, shot back in thunderous reply and soon there was not a single battery on either side that was not keeping up an unceasing roar like a million M. Silveries in violent eruption and it seemed as if the most terrific cannonading of the whole war was making down tons of rocks from the far distant mountains from the concussion, and though exposed to the murderous ravage of the seventy five mile barrage of the enemy, the line of christian artillery remained steady, though a storm of semi volcanic eruptions from the high explosives were denaying many of the guns with terrific effect making the scene a regular conflagration of damnation. The landelinian troops that were to charge, were already forming Cannonball's madhouse big day, twenty in number were to attack in front where there was a bristling hedge of artillery and infantry, while Joy Lindernine and Paveson Archibald to charge in second third and fourth waves while Germaine Himble was placed behind the two supporting supporting divisions and now the hell storm of fury and damnation commenced. The gray line pressed on in majestic order like series moving walls of gray men, all the tattered landelinian colors waving over them and at the head of each regiment floated the national flag of landelinia.

THE FRIGHTFUL MASSACRE. A DISSOLUTION!

The advancing gray surge 20,000,000 a strong faced a terrible fire from the main batteries of general Viviananna's guns, the awful roar of three hundred thousand guns being directed toward them, mingled with the fiercer and sharper detonations of the exploding shells, the whole line of christian batteries blazing away in a terrific manner, making the death and intolerable ear-splitting crash of cannons fairly nerve racking.

And why was it that while generals Viviananna's and Vivian's batteries made the very ground shake before the ear-splitting crash of shells that the whole christian center was silent, not a shot being fired from there. The landelinians were now spreading out in separate waves and began to rush forward with tremendous fury. Frightful showers of round shot bounding up along, tore up the first wave of men frightfully shells scattered the survivors, while thousands of shells ricocheted among the second advancing wave of landelinians, exploding by hundreds a per second, darting flashes, before, behind, and overhead, and the wave that was torn to pieces recoiled in confusion.

Even vast volleys of high explosives tore right through every wave, crash a crushing and mauling columns by scores, and simultaneously a mighty roar broke loose to their right, with ear-splitting grandeur, waves of men dissolved by tens, landelinians faced annihilation, and withdrew in panic, terrible tempests of shells and solid shot fell fast torrent upon torrent among Camillias line shredding up his whole surge, and ear-splitting rattle of high explosives eruptions prosecuted thousand every foot by shell shock alone, which appeared among Himble's waves and his columns dissolved away in shameful numbers and he horrified them. Long lines of skirmishers on the May grass lying on their bellies, had suddenly arose within fifty yards of the advancing gray surges, withered one with a murderous hail of bullets ran on ahead, halted, poured a second volley, withering another column, and then continued firing as fast as they could retreating and halting at short intervals. A thousand columns of the landelinian landelinians were already shattered by the artillery fire of the christian christian batteries, a part of the landelinian surge catching up with the opposing skirmish line which retreated in confusion leaving many prisoners, the dead and wounded skinned and skinned themselves laying like grass. From more of general Vivian's batteries there broke forth a hellish fire, a barrage of the sixty mile length, being now directed upon the assailants, and the first surge which extended seventy miles at this point, lost whole brigades, gas to tens of miles being torn the smoke of destruction seeming to close the survivors in.

The very landelinian officers fell like grain before the sweep of the scythe. The dead and wounded lay in hundreds of windrows but the survivors pressed on though men fell in thousands at every step. Hundreds of thousands of landelinians were mangled by the furious rain of shot fire, which tore whole lines forty miles long to fragments, hewed immense gaps in the surviving columns and melted away general Camillias whole front, and landelinia still facing the same annihilating fire retreated in confusion. Every Glandelinian surge in that hell of battle was decimated, there being no pause in the awful cannonading now mingled with the grinding and hissing roar of the shell torres t torrent and cannillia suffering the loss of fifteen million withdrew horrified at the frightful massacre and declared to Manley that he would not lead another charge without artillery support.

The thirti

the thirteenth assault has the same fury

b But despite that horrible turbulent domination of destruction the Glandelinian forces reinforced and supported by Manley's artillery went again to the attack with redoubled violence and for the length of the whole field of carnage the dead and wounded lay in many long windrows the shell fire once more tearing up whole waves, annihilating brigades and tearing the main Glandelinian surge to pieces. Even when the assaults not getting even within a mile of the christian center during the twelfth assault had recoiled, the roar of christian artillery had only increased in fury, all the five hundred thousand guns being concentrated on Manley's batteries during the last, but when the thirteenth assault began most of these guns concentrated their whole fury upon the advancing Glandelinian surges. The Glandelinians now went down by the hundreds of thousands, officers of high or low rank were being fast swept away, general cannillia went down mangled and bleeding his whole surge was twenty miles long had a ten mile gap gradually torn in it other surges were decimated, and general Kindernine was killed. All the time the terrific cannonading of both the christian and Glandelinian batteries were now at their utmost fury the world seemed torn torn by myriads of eruptive volcanic eruptions and as the enemy drew in closer to the christian center which had been quiet dir during the starting of this charge also, the gathering guns greeted them with a murderous storm of canister and grape mowing down immense multitudes.

Here was a rush of hundreds of thousands that got within range of the christian center but a rain of canister mowed them all down, the storm of canister increasing as the Glandelinians continued on and the whole of Trimble's gray surge was frightfully decimated, and recoiled in panic and confusion. The whole surge was now close to the works of the christian center, from behind of which there suddenly arose, a long massive purple line, all the cannons along the works let loose a desolating fire, and simultaneously along the whole christian infantry line a long sheet of white smoke appeared pierced by millions of dull flashes, and as from the very mouths of hell there came a simultaneous exploding roar of musketry, resembling a hundred million cannon and all the gray surges withered to fragments general Crawford went down mortally wounded, and his whole line completely withered away. Thousands of volleys met hand on lines and his men went down in many multitudes and all the survivors broke up into utter confusion and retreated abandoning the assault also and Archibald being killed.

MANLEY'S MAIN DESPERATE EFFORTS.

This assault was led by Manley in person and the first of the gray reached extrabrooks christian front which let loose a simultaneous withering roar of musketry and a thousands upon thousands fell in from the positions the solid surge in gray being fairly scathed and the foe retired in confusion and panic. Manley's main line of batteries were making heroic efforts to support the assault and now indeed it seemed as if the foe would be successful the roar of the cannons increasing a thousand times louder the Glandelinian surges being torn into fragmen fragments in numbers too frightful to relate, but still the survivors pressed forward, as grand an army of Glandelinians could not think of allowing a retreat and tried to be made and the Glandelinians made themselves heroes ever in battle field glories. The whole front line of the assailants had already been reduced to fragments in surging upon the christian line, but never theless the brave survivors pressed on the long surges of Glandelinians reaching the rows of barbed wired fences over which it was the work of ten minutes to climb over or cut through, but in that short time the dead and wounded lay as high as the fences themselves the torrents of canister and minnie's threatening to sweep the surviving columns away, the screams and detonations of shells became more terrific, and the fiery storm of hell from the christian guns increased so terribly making an almost preternatural uproar amid the cries of the hundreds of thousands of wounded and dying, that the survivors retired in confusion.

Kindernine, who went down among the dead and wounded, there was a rush of trampling dead and the Glandelinian surges from the rear closed up behind the shattered and mangled divisions of Kindernine's divisions army and rallied them on. Gallant general Manley with his hat on the point of his sabre took command of the entire division which had been reduced from forty million to thirty million men and as often as the storm of hell made ten mile gaps in the still massive gray surges, the gaps closed the lines never wavered and only drew closer and closer to the christian position breaking forward now at a double time amid the terrific storm of canister and grape that whirled and whizzed through the air in death concerts.

On rushed the survivors toward the christian positions and now a hundred and ninety yards away a large flanking force of christians came forward on the run, halted suddenly, and opened a withering fire into the gray surges, which reeled and staggered, the right of this flanking columns pressing upon the central flank, bending the column of Glandelinians at this point two thousand deep, which wavered to and fro for several minutes, and then drew back from the assault in confusion, repelling repelling their flankers in a maelstrom of carnage, hundreds of thousands of muskets crossing just as many bayonet's clashing, men firing furiously to right and left, and front, into each other's faces, fighting hand to hand but in vain. The Glandelinians in front of the other assaulting columns fell behind their guns in hundreds of thousands which were piling up the windrows of Glandelinians almost in touch of them, and when the shattered torn, and mangled surges were within twenty feet of the christian position, three thousand Glandelinian guns all machine guns delivered their last fire shot to the muzzle, and one whole column of Glandelinians three hundred and sixty five thousand strong went down into mangled and bleeding, general Arabapple Johnston fell mortally wounded at the same time, and the last of the Glandelinian surges passed by, and Manley with his sword in his hand sprang over the breastworks touching one of the guns of a captured battery crying to a his man;

"Come on boys, come on for the sake of Glandelinia. We will give the christian dogs the cold steel. Come on, we haven't won yet."

But the center of the crippled main surge was already shattered and thrown back by the force and fury of a christian counter charge, the progress of the Glandelinians was arrested, and to make matters worse a fresh column of troops arrived to the rescue and threw themselves upon the Glandelinians, general civilian ordering the center to hold their ground to the last man. At another point however the Glandelinians were swarming over the works, but now the fall of their many generals became known, and back in panic from the flaming christian lines fell only a remnant of the heroic Glandelinian surviving forces which had performed the same such deeds of valour as they did in many other battle and which made the world wonder and marvel. From all along the line and two flanks seeing that the day was won the Glandelinians pressed on with ardour of victory and the whole Abbiannian line pressed forward, the glandelinians faced about and retreated in panic the way they came still under the same murderous fire, fleeing in confusion across the body strewn fields, while Urpheys men (He himself having fallen) covered the retreat with grim skilful interference. Indeed the battle along these two wings had ended disastrously for Vanley, for though general F Raymond Richardson Federals combined forces had made a desperate assault and thrown the christian forces on the left wing into confusion by a vigorous turning movement, a serious disaster for the christians was prevented by Hanson's army which barred Federal advance and then threw these glandelinians back into confusion, it already being reported that general Federal was dangerously wounded for general Hanson's lines on the left and center had poured a four hours bareheaded fire, which tore the glandelinian columns to pieces despite their rallying again and again to the onslaught, and just on this point when Federal was making his last assault which had almost been successful he fell dangerously wounded, the explosion and explosion of a shrapnell shell having blown his horse to pieces, Federal sustained sustained two broken ribs, a broken hip, and a shattered leg and though he ever survived after this he was never in condition again for further service in the glandelinian army until the time of the battle of Virginia which followed in that coming November.

Between Federal and Hanson and Hanson, the engagement was the fiercest ever fought between them during their long services in the war. Two general Onslaughts each from three to four hours duration was made against Hanson's lines alone each of these assaults lasting several minutes having many withdrawals at certain points of the line and many rallies but finally with a general crushing defeat, with a loss at this point of 26,555,200 in killed and wounded.

Vanley's combat to force general Vivian's and general Vivian's center commanded by general Viviananna was still more violent, having delivered fourteen of the most desperate attacks ever witnessed outside of Virginia or Aronburg's run, only to see his columns crumple to pieces and routed every time. In the fourteenth assault the glandelinian loss was 36,000,000, of which 9,900,500 were killed and the rest wounded and prisoners. Vanley's total loss in that day four hours carnage along the center alone was over forty seven million in killed and wounded while the total loss of the whole line at that point was considered or reported as 107,555,000.

THE ACTION ALONG THE CHRISTIAN RIGHT.

Simultaneously to the attacks on the other two wings general Johnnie B. Shumanna who commanded the glandelinian right also made driving onslaughts of appalling fury but early in the action the first assault though partially crushing the christian line was shattered and hurled back. General Sumner side Johnston and congress Henryson also made a severe attack but encountered a grueling artillery fire of the greatest intensity the angelinians along this front holding their ground stubbornly, and though several of the glandelinian columns had succeeded in smashing up Ludolph's lines, and break through it and throw it into confusion, the surviving assailants came into immediate contact with Ludolph's second line and finally held at bay.

General Reeve had fallen wounded on the christian side, just as his guns opened fire, but though a second time the whole christian line was badly smashed up, the glandelinians were finally repulsed.

But general Com pressed glandelinians had finally arrived resuming the attack with the most appalling fury and when general Angell's were forced to retreat, general Johnston's were repulsed by general Richard Cortin was crushed to fragments, by Hennings graycoats and the whole main line was broken up and thrown into confusion, but just in time general Vordens divisions came rushing to their support and the glandelinians unable to penetrate any further were again hurled back. When the next assault was made the fury of the battle increased frightfully the assaulting glandelinians being aided by Ashken columns who were attacking in very heavy masses and as the firing had increased and while the glandelinians had been pressing on furiously general From on the christian side was killed, his whole divisions was annihilated general Rudolph was mortally wounded his line shot to pieces again and general Cairns Fairbell who had come up and deployed his army in action, was in the battle for only ten minutes and saw his biggest commands cut to pieces and driven to the rear in the wildest panic ever seen among the christians before. The carnage had now become terrific to the enemy attacking with frightful ferocity and general Meredeth's christian surge was cut up and driven from the works, Tronia with his whole shattered command was again captured and slaughtered because they would not surrender, and the glandelinians were attacking with such fury that victory at the right of the christian line was safely assured for the enemy. Veldons works were also carried by the extraordinary fury of the glandelinian onrush, the trace of these works afterwards was not able to be found so thick was the dead and wounded of both sides. McPherson's large divisions of Abbiannians however were arriving to the rescue with four thousand cannon and now such a massacre of glandelinians ensued that the survivors were forced to flee in confusion. At other points of the line the glandelinians as were attacking with great success general Randall's christian forces being even hard pressed, but fortunately large columns of general Libemann's Abbiannians swarmed to the rescue and the glandelinians withdrew leaving four hundred thousand dead upon the field. Indeed the glandelinian onslaught had been more like the heavy storm waves that pound an unbreakable ship stranded on the rocky shore of an island. Everywhere Vanley's assaults finally were unsuccessful.

THE BATTLES SECOND DAY OF DURATI ON.

That night after the fearful carnage it was found that Germania army was a part of general Vanley's right wing, which had not been in much of the action that day, and that now he was taking personal command of general Vanley's main center in place of Federal who fell and was concentrating toward Groser Arden in general forces, and generals Vivian, Johnston, Nero, and Sonnia Veldonia Picknell after their long tedious march through flooded forest fields had at last arrived in time to take a good part of the action that afternoon when the battle started on that morning. When and where the battle ceased at eleven o'clock Picknell went to the front to see general Vivian bring ing violet and her sisters with them. Though successful as he was general Vivian was saddened by the sudden news of the concentrating of the armies under his wicked son general Germania, Vivian's son but at the news of the early arrival of Picknell and the others he did not lose heart, and had no fear of failure.

It had cost the angelinian nation up to one hundred sixty billion dollars to carry the frightful war thus far, money supplies were almost unblameably balanced, and general Vivian dreaded the sure loss of the war if the foe won this battle which was the main issue just as Gettysburg was between the north and the south in the great American Rebellion of 1861. If the christians would be vic vic victore victorious the war would have a speedy determination. But when would it end? Never?

Toward eight o'clock at night poor violet and her sisters with the other two little girls made their appearance at general Vivian's headquarters with wrens and I becoming acquainted with this new christian general they reported of their adventure during Picknell's advance in the flooded region.

"It's strange I never knew that you were thought lost in the flood," said General Viviananna. "Though poor Picknell never reported to general Vivian that poor little violet and general Vvann were missing, that your little sisters had went in search of you and were rescued during the flood."

"So it's true that general Germania has joined general Vanley at last," said general Charles Brown. "If I saw him myself I would shoot him down without mercy."

"What is papa going to do to Germania?" asked violet.

general vivian arose from his chair."

"I do not know," said the great general. "I don't know whether he intends to retreat or resume the battle against the first fresh armies that has reinforced him. But most likely he will fight some more. I presume."

Violet and her sisters felt sadder than they had ever felt before. They still yearned for the terrible war to come to an end but it seemed that they were to be disappointed. They faithfully hoped however that the other christian forces would help general vivian and knowing now that general Zimmermann had no enemy to oppose him Violet herself sent him a message appealing like a child can do, to come and help her father lick vanley and germania vivian, and bring the war to an end.

To general vivian however it was very foolish to retreat after already having won this first great advantage and he knew that if he retreated his brother general wanson who originated the war would lose it entirely and so wanson himself decided to consult all the chief generals on this serious matter.

The Vivian girls though witnesses of the council which began at eight thirty had no intentions of taking any part in it, but nevertheless seeing the wistful pleading and reproachful looks of the little girls as they watched him general wanson decided to cannonade the enemy's center like general vivian and viviananna did those frightful four hours of battle before, but to keep up the cannonade all night long, and attack vanley on the morrow.

Several of the christian generals objected to his first plans saying it would be wasting ammunition but as the little girls threatened to weep if he refused to follow it out he decided to do so, and win at any cost, and intending to support his left wing under wanson's, with all his light artillery and to assail the whole wandalinian front gradually in that one day, if not simultaneously.

And that night general vivian received a surprise note from general germania which was brought by a wandalinian dressed in white under escort of two purple coats which read:

"You dog an of schristian general if you dare to attack we will repel your attack successfully. We are strong enough to fight it out on even uneven ground without further help if necessary and let me tell you general vivian, if we win this fight we will butcher all the children left, and especially, your little green snakes, called your daughters, and the sooner us wandalinians get rid of the centipedes called the Vivian girls the better it will be for the whole world. All of my army are child butchers, as you call the just executioners, and as long as you are going to fight it out to the end just the same you may never win this battle, and you might as well yell the vivian girls up to us, and if you to there will be no more massacre of other children. Our fair wandalinian armies have been better since the old slobs are out of it, and if you do attack we have enough men to intervene against your movements. We have as you know won many glorious victories, have prevailed long against your mightiest armies, and though your dogish governments, have tried to put down child slavery, the result has been a failure, christian children especially the vivian girls are a regular nuisance, that is to be put to death when is unable to work work, is the best medicine for them. If I ever lay my hands on your little green eyed snakes again, I'll make for them a living hell upon earth, before I kill them, will compel them to work under the lash in my own country, only allow them one hour's sleep at night, make their work worse than that of the hardest laborer, and if they reel from overwork I'll torture them, the little gutter snipes. The whole world will be appalled when they hear what I will do to the littlerats. I'll make them work out in the snow in below zero weather without any clothes on and if they fall overcome by the cold, I'll have them scourged with the cat-o-nine-tails.

Yours truly, my christian dog, of a father, and hoping you a defeat I am;

Yours truly again,
P. vivian.

All who read the note were appalled, evans was stung, and picknell and the others generals were in a rage. All of general wanson's officers and general vivians threatened resignation, and even picknell and evans the guardian of the vivian girls if general vivian or wanson refused to attack on the morrow. General vivian, and wanson laughed heartily at their threats, tore up and general vivian tore up germania's note and threw it all about the maddened generals. Then folding his arms and assuming a fierce expression of face he glared at his brother Hanso wanson and the others and said:

"Do every one of you generals think that I am an old fool and a boob. Ha, ha if you officers resign now you will indeed be turning down a plan I never chance. I swore to you this morning, when the enemy started to attack, that our lines would hold without a serious break anywhere, and they did. Even when continually heavy reinforcements were massed again at us and we lost heavily. We'll I swear again now that to morrow tomorrow before this afternoon you will see my forces routing the enemy from their own works and I'll have the leaders of my army who withdraws from the attack no matter who he is, even my brother though he is my superlative superior punished with disgrace. I'm going to attack as I plan also and if you artillery officers obey my orders without blunder, we may win quicker than I propose. I propose to win. And do you think that old Free Mason, general germania vivian could like me because he has done so several times, now? NO SIR. And you Jack Evans here's your instructions; Keep behind the lines without going into the action, with the best of the machine guns with you, and when general germania appears within range of your hiding place, give him a dose of lead. We are bound by boys to carry this war to a success, and when we get the reason at our mercy they'll have to give up their swords, or perish for their recklessness."

General vivian learning that general Quebaum McWhirther had had scouts out all the afternoon when the battle of the morning ceased reported it to general vivian who immediately summoned him. And in answers of to his questions said:

"Yes your excellency I have even more of my scouts out yet, and those returned scouts discovered that you have excellent opportunity to make a movement around to the left of vanley's center under germania, and maneuver him into attacking the flankers, which will enable you to storm his batteries without their being able to answer, and descend upon vanley's whole line and crush it from its position."

"You are great in helping me to carry general vanley's neck center." Said general vivian happily patting Quebaum on the shoulder and kissing him. "Happily I myself have been a soldier since I grew up in manhood, and I have been with soldiers engaged in fights during the great wandaloo-Abbieannian war of eighteen fifty two, and should know without any dispute what soldiers should do, but I never met one like you before. I was my opinion that not even seventy million of my men ever arranged and arrayed for battle could carry the enemy's center without an artillery support and I feared that if I could not shell the enemy's batteries correctly the wandalinians guns would mow down all the most vigorous vigorous assaults I made. But you have seen the opportunity and I'll let you take a hand in firing the guns."

General vivian then went to general Dargin who was present and said:

"General do you think you could go over and pay general germania a visit and my best regards for my that note he sent me?"

"Those Germanians are stubborn, but nevertheless I don't think an attacking column would not care just now to do anything else." Said general Dargin. "They'll all fear for your little girls and think that the sooner germania is crushed by your chain of batteries and infantry they will be safe. God I'm sure is with us in behalf of those dear little girls, and will surely help us to win. The Glandelinians have been reinforcing continually but we still outnumber their whole force five to one and nevertheless I will drive at them just as hard as I did against the Glandelinian armies at Cedernine. Especially I have a debt to pay to general Germania by myself."

"A debt to pay!"

"Yes his men during the battle of Erminie creek shot a little girl's friend of mine by the name of Angelina Aronburg and I want to pay him well for it."

Indeed to general Vivian general Dargin appeared very sanguine and thought himself in good luck to have the chance to lead the onslaught onslaugth in person. Then general Vivian indeed felt that he could not risk any delay whatever or let the attack suffer by any indecision on his part and that general Huebner McWhirther might know his intentions, he wrote to him this note on yellow paper:

"General Huebner McWhirther, when an artillery barrage fire is at its worse, and when I received no response whatever I shall order general Dargin to charge with all his might and crush in Manley's out center in-start your batteries in action at dawn dawn of daybreak, and have them in full sway in an hour."

General Vivian meeting general Dargin again said;

"You are to give the order to your officers to charge when the artillery fire seems to take effect."

"All right your excellency," answered Dargin. "It's not so hard to go to the enemy's lines as it looked to my officers, but the main trouble seems to be on staying there as the whole Glandelinian force seems to be there in a bunch, yet I am sure I'll win with the support of your guns."

General Vivian was almost jubilant over Dargin's confidence of success; and said;

"But remember I do not wish for your splendid force of men to be sacrificed too much general, so I have sent another note to general Huebner McWhirther telling him to watch carefully the effects of our artillery barrage upon the enemy's batteries, and that if after an hour of hammering and bang banging, he receives no response to notify you himself when to make the attack. General Jespine, senin and Francis Accountants have also been directed to charge with you, at the head of your line with a battery of ten thousand five hundred kruppt howitzers, fresh motor trucks to push pull them, and full caissons."

At this moment a courier rode up, entered general Vivian's headquarters, and handed general Dargin a note. It was a note an old copy of Violet's which one of the officers had picked up outside, a copy of the one Violet had sent to general Zimmermann. Dargin looked at it, bowed his head in assent, but did not say anything as he handed the note to general Vivian, who looked suspicious as he took the offered note and read it also. This is what he read;

"My dear friend general Williamshurger Zimmermann, if you are coming to our aid come at once, as papa has a big battle with Manley at Francis, Atlanta, -r Anna Maria Anna Maria Germania has joined re general Manley and there will be big doings to morrow so don't miss it. Papa has plenty of reinforcements, but I'm sure he can't win without you. You alone can give him proper support, for the enemy's artillery is going to be barraged to morrow morning at the first break of day. Your friend Violet Vivian."

General Vivian at once summoned Violet who came and taking her in his arms and folding her to his breast he said;

"If it was not for you my dear little girl, I would have lost hope long ago. If Zimmermann gets that note and comes and comes we hope long ago. If Zimmermann gets that note and comes we will win sure."

Some of the officers feared that the note would get in the hands of the enemy but Violet said;

"I do doesn't matter if it does, for I have written the note in a way that no one but Zimmermann could read. I learned that in school. None of Manley's men can read short hand. It's like Chinese to them."

Then they all laughed. Zimmermann got the note all right and advanced.

DID GENERAL HUEBNER MCWHIRTER TRY TO BLOW HIS WAY INTO THE BOWELS OF THE EARTH, OR WAS HE CANNONADING GENERAL MANLEY'S CENTER TO COVER DARGIN'S ASSAULT?

All night long there had been a sullen silence but which was now suddenly broken by several cannon shots as a strange signal. The signals of cannons was repeated five times. A few minutes of more silence followed and then Violet and her sisters, Hanson, their father, and Evans, found themselves sprawling on the floor of the headquarters building, while once more the cannonading thunders of the Christian batteries echoed and reached over the whole region, for hundreds of miles from the battle field itself, every section of the Christian line armed with the batteries letting loose their ears earpiercing volcano of flame and din, and rapidly it became the most heaviest cannonading Violet and her sisters themselves had ever heard, and at first the little girls had thought that in the direction of the enemy's lines, they heard incessant dull booms by the hundred thousand, believing it the response of the enemy's artillery, but it was the sudden surprising explosions of that many shells, whose fiery burst succeeded each other so rapidly as to produce a continuous continuous roar.

Three thousand five hundred sixty two

Glandelinian guns started frantically to flash reply but were rapidly silenced, the Christian guns keeping up an unceasing roar, the most violent artillery fire ever directed upon Manley's positions opening opening up, and though Manley's batteries rapped at last with titanic fury their guns soon ceased firing, as the Christian barrage only threatened every battery put into place to respond, with complete annihilation. Manley was in grave peril.

Even while the Christian artillery was in full sway guns that grew hot were withdrawn to be given time to cool, fresh guns taking their places, fresh battalions of artillery were brought up, McKell's lines of cannons broke into action, and the direction of the enemy's lines was a perfect inferno of explosions. All of the Christian batteries had let loose their hell of damnation, and wide spread destruction while the enemy's lines seemed swept with sheets of flame from the long lines of explosions, and in the space of one mile six thousand and sixty shells tore craters, craters, rotors, ploughed up treasuries hundreds of thousands, and drove thousands of the Glandelinians insane from the noise and concussion.

All along the enemy's line as Violet and her sisters could see with their glasses, glasses, long barrages of uncommonly luminous clouds of smoke mingled also with blue flashes appeared incessantly, and even a rain of chain shot waxed fast and furious among Manley's lines, and men seem ingly out of range of the shells went down by thousands from the shell's shock.

General Germanian gunners strove vainly, frantically time and again to get their batteries into action or into position to answer the Christian fire and multitudes of infantry who strove to help them soon cumbered the ground, only to be ground to pieces by the shells.

Notwithstanding every precaution by the main line of Glandelinian infantry there was never seen such destruction the ground being paved with dead, and the gunners, who did get some of their batteries into position fell before they were able to fire them, the down showers of shells and shrapnell sweeping like hail among the guns. The center of the main line of alandinian infantry were drawn back to cover the rear of the whole devastation sounding as if hell had been let loose the din of shells for scores of miles being deafening. More and more christian guns were being unlimbered and put into instant action christian dominatng the very din of the warfare of titans. As the christians opened more and more artillery the din increased a thousand times louder and manleys lines was completely enshrouded in smoke flashes and terrific explosions and it seemed as if the very insides of the earth was being torn out by the explosions so terrific was the din. Gladiolians fell in columns,....., big divisions were shattered into huge fragments fragments, and the barrage of shells bore down on everything in its path. Thousands of alandinian runners vainly trying to get their artillery into position to answer, were dreadfully cut up loaded war horses by the roaring thundering fire of shells, which increased steadily seemingly to be about to blow manleys whole center into the air. Such an uproar of artillery was never heard before since the war began thousands upon thousands of among the foe exploding with a roar of volcanic eruptions from the mountain in hellish regions itself.

Many thousands of war material material and gun carriages were shattered, and blown into the air the uproar of hell seemed everywhere lines upon lines of men in front of general Germanias headquarters were annihilated, and now above all the tremendous and stupendous and hell's hellish roar of shell explosions and crash of cannons broke the loud and reverberating crash crash of twenty big explosive explosions in Hanleys center which proved that his ammunition stores were blowing up for the crash of these explosions drowned out every other sound and twenty volcanic eruptions seemed to appear for a moment, the concussion almost wrecked general Ivanian headquarters and the very mouths of hell seemed to open in the location of those mighty explosions which shook shook down everything in Germanias lines rivaling in fiercer grandeur than the artillery fire or shell explosion, explosions. The christian cannonading was in full sway and general Ivanian and Hansonia, had to leave their headquarters for fear the concussion of the artillery a mile to their rear would shake the buildings down, the roofs already having caved in.

A No answer all this came from the enemy so it was time for general Dargun to charge and he rode over the order from general Debaum No further who rode up to him in person.

THE FIERCE ATTACK ON THE GUADELUPINIAN FRONT.

In half an hour's time the immense divisions of Margins forces moved forward, and firmly toward the enemy's lines, fresh christian batteries galloped into position to take the places of those out of commission especially for want of gunners, and hot guns were given time to cool. Thousands of rounds of ammunition were brought up, shot and shell and high explosives being arranged for prompt use. Margins line of assault in separate waves about four, each thirty miles in length making a line of forty miles altogether was the most splendid sight that any of the great christian generals had ever seen. General Ivanian and the others were thrilled with admiration. This great christian assault resembling Napoleon's in one of the battles when he made his famous charge. To reach general Germanian's line Margins line of assault had to cross an open ground for the distance of ten thousand yards, but nevertheless on account of the christian barrage fire upon his artillery general Germanian's division was ill prepared for the attack. Mc-Arthy's landline surged on the right, with the infantry forces under general Ussel Henryson and at a long angle with the main line was crushed to fragments by the violence of the christian charge, all their smallest artillery and machine guns were captured, the two landline generals were wounded severely and their lines were thrown into confusion. Germanian's division and Vienna's right flank with his many divisions in front gave the christians a hot reception but could not stop them.

Baldwin's whole line of artillery mostly fill field and machine guns sheeted in flame and smoke, follow followed by the deafening roar of seven hundred field pieces and though storm storms of shells and canister crashed heavily among the advancing christians there was an intolerable ear-splitting roar of explosions and hundreds of divisions went to fragments, multitudes went down by the score, whole waves were torn up whole armies were manly mangled and the main line was ploughed through and through the landmines fire being of greater intensity than general margin had expected but still the survivors came rushing on in monstrous surges, and the foe became an apprehended then broke the loud and intolerable roar of a thousand mighty explosions mingled with the deafening grandeur of Whilliam udolpho chain of artillery and at some points the Landelinian fire had to slacken. The surviving christian columns pressed on furiously, not the least affected by the ahh annihilating landelinian musketry fire, and whelans main divisions on the r' right pressed on with the most tremendous fury, poured fearful volleys scores of miles long at the flame created landelinians works on the enemy left wallsides of landelinians were shot down and the flame was the christian advance that the left wing of the whole landelinian army harassed also by the terrible tempest of shot shell and high explosives went to fragment, a hundreds of their own divisions being cut up, ten thousand switzerland fifteen thousand krupt were concentrating upon them and the whole line forced into the formations of a hail 8 or buckled up as it is called broke into confusion and recoiled in retrograde motion, then facing about fled in confusion from that roaring hell of death and destruction every fleeing column stric struck being scattered into fragments.

fragments. Excitement prevailed everywhere, the first heavy blow having fallen upon vanleys main left wing which still retreating were but tending more to their own left. All the captured Jendelinian artillery was turned to upon the foe, and vanleys center now in confusion recoiled, several of his main waves of gray seven miles in length melting into fragments an oblique fire of ten captured batteries being poured upon these torn tottered and bleeding lines in gray, and officers and men on both sides going down in terrible numbers. A scene appalling in deed. O it had in indeed been a desperate rush made by the christians both sides having lost ten million men already but the surviving christians though they fell in in masses before the insidious fire of the foe, leaped the breastworks and after a desperate scrimmage in which millions were engaged engaged were soon in possession of the Jendelinian artillery, not field pieces only, but the main batteries itself the christian artillery having stopped firing at this section now that the foes batteries were captured. On pressed the main christian surge general withers divisions encountering a simultaneous withering fire of great intensity all along the line and the survivors unable to endure this terrific storm of fire threw themselves flat, thousands throwing up their hands in token of surrender, and the rest fleeing in precipitate flight. All of general John vanleys armies about fifty million strong was completely cut to pieces, smashed up like a weak house struck by a tornado and was retiring every where in confusion, having lost over thirty million men in killed wounded and prisoners in that one hour of blood and agony.

THE STAND OF GENERAL JOHNSTON JACKEN MAILEY'S ARMY TO COVER HIS SON'S RETREAT IS ALSO CRUSHED.

Johnston Jackson Manleys batteries were now opening fire with a perfect concert of hell, a regular fire of twenty five thousand field pieces, and machine guns cutting down the christians columns, but this terrible fire was short lived for the ammunition was exhausted, and as the assaulting waves of christians were not checked and Manleys endeavoring to cover the retreat of the remnants of general john manleys divisions was resolved to use musketry, rifle and bayonets. He ordered hundreds of his officers to move calmly calmly and composedly along the line and they did ordering their men to hold their fire until the christians were within easy range and then when the hostile christian surges came within two hundred feet of the glandelinian front a hundred thousand hells seemed to be let loose the whole glandelinian position blazing with a simultaneous fire ten of the waves in purple going to fragments.

At one point of the landmillian front there was a terrific fusillade of twenty six thousand cannon of heavy calibe resembling the titan thros of many volcanos put to gether, and the in describable withering fire itself along the whole of Johnston Manleys line seemed to mad make a noise as if a hundred thrillion cannon was let loo

The attack of the christian waves was extremely dangerous. Ambrose Fullers line was entirely broken, and the large forces of glendelinians under general Spencer or Ambrose Spencer who advanced to cover Ambrose Fullers left, met an annihilating fire from the christian guns, the christians rushing on in a headlong advance, and with extremely dangerous fury, coming on with the ferocity of a stampede the fury of their advance being uncontrollable. The uproar of the cannons in possession of the christians was frightful the fury of the battle becoming more terrible but the gray line was giving way though they opened fire with a roar as if the world was coming to an end. The survivors attacked the christians by counter charging but the Angelinians repelled the attack with such fury as to drive the Glendelinians into an uncontrollable panic.

JOHNST ON HAWLEYS RETREAT .

This wing was exposed to a blasting curtain of artillery fire from two sides simultaneously added by terrific art musketry fire the wing was shattered into fragments and driven ten miles from their second and first line of works, the Angelinian pursuers mauling furiously with the panic stricken columns and completely routing them, the Landellinian force of three hundred thousand men under Spencer being annihilated. Spencer was killed, two million Landellinian batteries were captured, nearly a million prisoners and carrying all before them. The Angelinians literally pressed on with indescribable fury, swarming among the panic stricken survivors in a pandemonium every clandelinian division being crushed to fragments, and the survivors now broke into such a scene of panic and confusion as never witnessed in all the war. The whole throng of jacked-wings the center having having given way also was now in precipitate flight moving in a backward flow like a human avalanche with the purple columns tearing after them pell-mell cutting the foe down in such numbers that the retreat became a total rout. The clandelinian generals indeed made desperate efforts to rally their panic stricken men but amid the dreadful carnage they fell one after another the battle smitten pilans swarming with the panic stricken clandelinians in flight flight, several columns having rallied but failing to make a stand the Angelinians pressing on furiously. During the fearful rout of a force of Angelinians had clashed with Germanians cavarly germania. Vivian as it had been discovered, had the crippled Vivian girls in his possession how they had gotten among his lines was a mystery as they had been with general Vivian the night before. Jack Evans was the leader of the christian cavarly and in the scuffle got scotched he not only recaptured the Vivian girls but annihilated the clandelinian cavarly, Germanians first army of forty million having been crushed to fragments.

DANGING DISASTEROUS CHARGE AT GERMANIAS LINES AND THE RESULT.

While the other christian armies had been crushing the armies of the two desperats Manleya pargins whole line with Adels-de-garbes and Accountantas was reserves had swept forward like a series of tidal waves against Germanias lines. On account of general Vivianunna's artillery fire being directed at his lines so many of germanias stores of ammunition had been blown up in quick succession each explosion resembling whole volcanoes b, blowing themselves to pie pieces from their terrific force that he had only a few rounds of ammunition left to repell the Angelinians with, and encouraging no severe fire of any kind the anglinians swarmed upon the line of landellinians whose lines opened fire tearing asunder the whole Bicknellian line. But nevertheless they were not checked and reaching the works in mighty surges millions mingled in a dense desperate hand to hand fight which lasted twenty minutes. So fierce was Germania's resistance when argin hurled his main line upon his own that hell and millions of damnation seemed to break loose and soon germanias line was overlapped, and though he received heavy reinforcements his flank was turned and his whole line thrown into confusion. While Evans on his horse was watching the charge from the captured germanian works and was reforming his cowardly force of 26,000 men a messenger rode up to him and handed him a note. He read "Your guardian ship of the Vivian girls; Jack Evans; I saw the frightful rout of the Glandelinian divisions by the determined assault on wankles whole line including Germanias army which was routed but we inform you the Vivian girls are in the enemys army as prisoners and it is up to you to rescue them. We have even succeeded in driving the two wankles from their impregnable works and make them retreat southward and as Germanias line is badly shattered, and cannot hold the Christians back you now have your chance of not only rescuing the Vivian girls but of getting the ransom as well. But I advise you to do so right away before he gets away as every moment is precious. If you love them you will show it by going to their rescue. There is no time here to tell how they got captured, but you will find out how they got seized when they return. But for God's sake rescue my daughters before he kills them. Show if your love for them is really true."

GENERAL ROBERT ANGELO VIVIAN FIRST COMMANDER IN CHIEF.

The adjutant general of the charging Christians suggested to Jack Evans to take extraordinary caution and not do anything right away, and wait until Germanias army was devastated. But if he must go to save a small group to cover a possible retreat.

"O General a reserve. The Glandelinians though retreating are a thousand to our one and reinforcements seem to be coming to Germanias aid."

THE POOR LITTLE SAINTLY FLOWERS; SUFFERING UNTOLD MISERIES
SORROWS AND PERSECUTIONS WILL SOON BE FREE OF ALL ENEMIES.
EVANS MADE CHARGE AND THE JUST DESTRUCTION OF GERMANIA
VIVIAN CAVALRY.

But gn general Jack Evans was the maddest man ever seen anywhere. Indeed no language could describe his anger. He would get revenge for the unjust cruelties to the little dears at last, and he would do so at any risk.

"Too hell with a reserve." He yelled. "Germanias secret service agents have since succeeded in getting the Vivian girls into Germanias lines and I take that this war was caused by God in order in causing me to fail in getting my chance to slip by. This is to be a death struggle, vengeance for the unjust suffering they went through. Forward is my command."

And another officers voice roared out:

"The sword of the Lord and of Iddison shall smite Germanias to day."

The Angelinians and Goncentinians were furiously moved when Evans shouted to them the truth and at the capture of Violet and her sisters they seemed indeed willing to abandon the advantage of their firearms and when Evans flourished his sabre and yelled forward, the whole column of horsemen like a living missile of such momentum that it once lunged forward, was beyond recall, hurled themselves forward with deafening mad yells, and now it seemed to stop these maddened hordes it would be possible to destroy them, and yet there was altogether too many to be destroyed, a hundred thousand horsemen crowded fifteen deep in a long yelling thundering line in the advance of the main column fifteen million strong pushing forward like a roaring avalanche dashing down a mountain side.

This line was nearly three miles long sweeping toward the Glandelinian cavalry forces who were retreating, like the first destructive wave after the Lisbon earthquake, clouds of dust whipping aside in dense clouds and disclosing the tossing manes, the distended nostrils, and the red eyes of the steeds, the flash of sun on lances, and scabbards, the faces of soldiers furiously moved. So swift was the dash of the Christian cavalry toward the retreating Glandelinians that the bristling red and white silk guidons snapped their swallow tails in the draught of wind while the heavy national standards streamed their green corbels behind them. Nothing else else in the world could compare to the deafening thunderous roar of four million fifteen million four hundred thousand pounding hooves which drowned out completely the crash of battle all around in the distance, and of exploding shells, and tearing into the choas and coming into sight of a large force of Christian cavalry Evans caught sight of general Germania, Vivian and the little girls who seized the purple coats with Evans in the lead stretched pleading arms out toward him.

Germania ordered a retreat at the sight of this overwhelming column but the Christian column which had halted a moment now came on with an increasing rush while Evans brandishing his sabre shouted:

"Halt you devil or we will shoot you down where you are. You cannot escape us and we will recover the little girls."

"Your big bunch of Christian dogs can go plump to perdition and take the Vivian brats there too." Shouted the enraged Glandelinian general. "If you shoot me down my men will cut the children to pieces before your eyes you dirty Christian dogs. To hell with all of you."

A withering fire answered his assault and scores of hundreds of his men toppled from their horses, even those having the Vivian girls in their possession while Germanias horse staggered and reeled and fell Germania being severely wounded as a bullet had pierced his right lung. Another Glandelinian raised his sword to strike one of the Vivian girls, down but a bullet sent it flying, several other bullets piercing his body simultaneously, the reason falling to the ground around the horse dashing madly on toward the Christians violet clinging frantically to the reins and finally checked its mad pace. The Angelinians who were nearest had started to pursue the horse, and being unable to overtake it opened fire on the horse bringing it down. The other Glandelinians in their frenzy to escape the terrible Goncentinians abandoned the Vivian girls and dashed off at breakneck speed but could not avoid the engagement they wished to escape as the Angelinians pursued them.

The foremost Angelinian Angelinians quickly reached the little girls, Evans in the lead and they were surrounded. In the meantime the Angelinian column moving forward in a solid mass struck the Glandelinian cavalry in the rear and a crash that was audible above anything else, hundreds of thousands of swords clashing together in violent duels, streams of pistol shots were fired at point blank, and as the Christian columns madly dashed on, there was an indescribable mixup of purple and gray coats. Thousands of Glandelinians were trap trampled under the hooves of horses, hoshorses went end over end, the groans of wounded and dying could be heard amid the din of confusion and in the melee horses themselves went mad and reared on their haunches, screaming and nighing and fighting one another.

Blows with pistol butts and fists were swung at each other by Glandelinians and Angelinians, sabres sabres, men, and hats were tossed up like spume on a wave crest and nearly half of that column of Glandelinians amid the dreadful carnage were literally trampled into the dust, the purple column pressing on with the yell of Indians tearing through and among the rest of the Glandelinian columns with a roaring yelling and howling. The other columns however did not continue the retreat, when the Christians burst upon them but stood its ground and gave serious resistance, but the howling and screeching and hacking purple waves of cavalry pressed on like a scathing cyclone and again there was a terrible mixup, the Angelinians keeping up the attack with a yelling fury reducing the whole Glandelinian column to a mere remnant and scattering the few survivors in a frightful rout. In the meantime Evans and little Violet and her sisters, and the small party with him had started away, and as the din of the terrible battle had broken into full away again, Evans thought he saw fresh troops of Glandelinians advancing toward him, especially from an opposite direction.

"Strange direction for those Glandelinians to be coming from." He thought to himself. "I wonder who they are."

Soon he and the rest as far in the distance hundreds of thousands of Glandelinians approaching at a mad pace and realizing it was a new column of Glandelinians advancing, to the aid of general Germania cried army he said:

"I think since we have the little celestial children with us again, we'd better beat it, as too many Glandelinians is not pleasant with my main force gone on ahead in their attack, to meet with."

The Goncentinians started away in a mad gallop the men in with the Vivian girls going to the front to head off the range of the enemys fire, so the little girls would not be hit.

One of the Glandelinian generals saw the retreating group of men with the little girls in their midst, and soon a large regiment of cavalry were in swift pursuit led in person by captain Henderson.

Evans saw that they were separating and realizing that the enemy were trying to place his little force between three fires, he wheeled his column in another direction and went on tearing down the road pursued by thousands of landelinians now, who opened a fusillade with a terrific roar....

Twenty of the Angelinians reeled from their saddles but the rest returning a fire that emptied fifty landelinian saddles kept right on, the Angelinians fearing indeed that the landelinians were not pursuing because they wanted to capture Violet and her sisters, but probably to avenge the slightly wounding of general Germania Vivian.

They were coming on dashing on like a swarm of demons a whole ten thousand now, and huge bullets continually whistled about the Angelinian soldiers and the little girls who feared that the savage landelinian horsemen would catch up with them and destroy them all. These landelinians were men of a very determined disposition, more determined than the disposition of Desperate Desmond, or Rudolph Rassendale put together, and they came on with the fury of an avalanche, the Angelinians seeing that the only means of escape being to signal for help. One of the men unfurled again a signal flag and started waving it frantically toward a large squadron of Abyssinkilian horsemen who were appearing far to their front the fugitives knowing that if the landelinians guineed them they would commit massacre.

IN THE SHOT ZONE OF GENERAL HANSON'S BARRAGE.
IN PERIL FROM THE STORM OF SHELLS.

The Angelinian soldiers did not fear for themselves, but for the little girls with them when the landelinians in their frenzy of fury would fairly cut to pieces. Yet their signal for help was seen, for the large body of Abyssinkilian dragoons, were advancing at a tearing rate themselves and soon reaching the fugitives formed into battle line, their number being about thirty thousand three hundred and fifty five. The landelinians seeing this big force of lancers abandoned the pursuit, but still the fugitives were in peril for they were in the region where the random shells from the still active christian batteries were falling like hail. The firing of the far distant battle was terrific indeed to take effect at such a distance, and fragments of the shells fell or flew so close at times, that the little girls thought themselves already prepared for the grave. A shell had just then burst right near a tree, branches and pieces of bark flying all about them some striking Violet and her poor sisters, the smoke of powder and smoldering foliage prevailing the air everywhere. The little girls and even the Angelinians with them were almost suffocated by the clouds of dust thrown into the air by shell bursts, and indeed the whole region looked as if a thousand Kansas cyclones of a days duration had passed through..... To flee through this shell curtain was suicide so it seemed, and they dared not proceed, and what could they do? The horrible sound of distant firing had redoubled, and was coming nearer, the region was massed with divisions of men hurrying toward the firing line, and most of these shells were high explosive, whole sections of trees being destroyed by a single one, a furnace of fire raged in the distance, among the foliage was wreckage, filling the air with clouds of pungent smoke.

They had already ridden a short distance, when there came the terrific roar of a high explosive, in the right of the column or their rescuers, half of their number fell, and simultaneously one of the officers guard guarding Violet reeled in his saddle. Then down went his horse, the unfortunate officer sprawling to the ground....

Evans horse even staggered, and fell throwing its rider headlong.

"CHRIST have mercy on us!" gasped Evans staggering to his feet... "Be careful of the vivian girls who are among you, for they might be killed or worse than that, injured and have to suffer all over again. Hurry up wailer and shreader or you will share the same fate. The firing is too hot for us here now."

BANG.

A high explosive burst right near them, and the horses Violet and her sisters were riding sank to the ground mangled and blood bleeding the little girls being caught under the horses but not injured severely though the little girls were badly scratched by flying fragments, little Catherine sustaining a sprained ankle and arm, while Jennie sufficed from cuts, and bruises and from a sprained foot.... Though Angelina was badly bruised, on the arm, and had a badly skinned knee, the other little girls escaped a entirely unhurt, a score of horsemen rushing up to see extract the little girls from under the dead horses, but another shell burst in their midst with a deafening ear-splitting explosion, every one of them horses and all being frightfully mangled, and one of them was an officer.

"Good God!" gasped one of the other officers. "This region is a regular inferno of explosions. Gracious there goes a score of trees." Violet and her sisters were finally extracted and lifted up by seven men, and held as without the crutches, they were unable to stand alone. The little girls were almost frightened by the incessant salvos of explosions everywhere, and almost blinded by the smoke of burning trees, brush, and of powder.... The distant firing was more fiercer now, the gray line, was seen again to be pressing forward, the flags waving defiantly.... Poor Violet and her sisters did not know the meaning of this landelinian advance as they knew that the christians had been victoriously, having hoped that the Angelinians would surely win, but now it seemed that the landelinians were winning. They could hear the continuous roar of fresh landelinian cannon, but fortunately for them the shell storm had seemed to lull. It was in fact the arrival of Joshua Manley's army, who were advancing against the christians to cover the retreat of the other two manleys, and who only got his own medicine in the medicine like Federal did before the end of the first day of the battle which had only lasted four hours. The little girls were being led hastily away by Evans and the survivors, the little girls trying hard to keep from crying in their despair and loss of hope of the christians ever winning.... For fear of the carnage overlapping again Evans hurried away with the little girls having also the fear that the landelinians would see them and pursue.... However he was not to get out of the shell zone so quickly as he wanted, for in his excitement he had ridden in the wrong direction, also being bewildered by the smoke and din.... He had ridden with his little girl friends and his men for three minutes, when again he faced a column of graycoats coming toward him. He also saw that the men were muttering something among themselves, then bullets began whistling about him and the others, forty of the Abyssinkilians going down dead or wounded.

Evans and the survivors returned fifteen withering volleys, that scathed the ranks of the landelinian horsemen, and then he and his surviving men, wheeled their horses and dashed off, surrounding the little girls in a thick circular column as they did so, firing again and again....

"I'll reckon you'll stop," cried one of the landelinian officers. "We want those children you've got, and you are to surrender as prisoners."

However fortunately, another force of christians suddenly reinforced the fugitives, who suddenly wheeled and charged their pursuers vanquishing them with great slaughter. Suddenly an enormous cloud of white smoke jotted far to the right. The next moment the whole region trembled and shook to a roar that exceeded anything Violet and her sisters had ever heard before.

G-R-U-M-P! A big shell exploded among some near by trees. Evans and the rest did not wait any more but raced down a road to do, and they had not traveled a few many yards when there was a dazzling explosion. G-R-U-M-P! G-R-U-M-P!

Two other shells smashed through the shattering trees half dazzling them as they dashed among general landelinians advancing batteries.....

THE THIRTEEN ASSAULTS AGAINST GENERAL HUBBAUM MANLEY'S ARMIES....

As Joshua's arrival and counter attacks had only aroused the heavy victorious christian columns they sheathed their lines in a blaze of firing which tore the landelinian front to pieces, and amid the awful stupendous roar of musketry, the christians rained the air with their own terrific yells going far above the yells of the landelinians, and then as the whole front line of the assailants dissolved away, the christians dashed forward like a thundering avalanche, and their most frightful torrents of canister which tore and mangled their columns, added by a fearful and righteous roar of musketry which none had ever heard numbers the large columns of Angelinians under general Branton Jennings and Shrader with the support of advancing batteries of artillery which scathed the whole gray line with numbing volleys of canister, finally threw the foe into confusion and being unable to check their assailants the foe withdrew a mile and reformed to meet the next charge. All this while though retreating the firing on both sides was continuous, a million christian christians having already been killed and three million wounded.

THE SECOND ASSAULT DRIVES HUEBAUM MANLEY'S ARMIES STILL FURTHER BACK.

As the christian columns after reforming their own lines charged again the firing of the Landelinians increased with redoubled fury and a few minutes later the christian general Frank Phelanston who had penetrated into the gray line with five million five hundred fifteen thousand men had been overwhelmed by heavy reinforcements and though escaping from being taken prisoner his five million men were reduced to four hundred thousand before the foe finally gave way, the christian general having been wounded. Indeed it seemed impossible to check the advancing purple coats or even stop their wild progress, the Landelinians retreating once more for the distance of two miles. The christian christians suffered another loss of dead about the million point. General Phelanston having only fifteen thousand men left when the main christian column came up was horrified. The Landelinian fire had indeed been terrific, and at general Hanson's left grand division who had assaulted Huebaum with his forces had also suffered the annihilation of his first corps of Heedlessburg Americans christians who had been advancing across the field during the fiery storm of battle and also the eleventh corps and Day nobles brigades, which had also come up had a harder fight with the enemy than any of the other forces engaged in this second assault which indeed gave the reason why Phelanston's force was almost annihilated before the foe gave way. Archie Spence had been in command of the victorious christian on center, since Ludolph and Phelanston fell, Manley's whole line having been rallied again during the lull and now was holding his line more stubbornly against the sledge hammer assault of general Hanson's whole line.

THE FRIGHTFUL RESULT OF THE THIRD ASSAULT.

Two of Huebaum's main wings were posted along the Francis-Atlanta, and the others in reserve on the fields of Daisy and Ferns Run, and along the Roseanna Junction, Russell and Miller heard the ear-splitting and earth-rending cannonade of their fiery storm of hell extending forty miles in an inferno of vomit volcanic like erupting valleys, and general Laurencean Manionia himself joined in the fierce attack with guarantee, though finding that the firing along the whole of general Huebaum Manley's line was more horrifying and destructive than at first believed.

For an hour this awful firing continued or had continued the Angelinians attacking with utmost preternatural fury, under the support of fresh advancing batteries under Antoine, Callio, Usell and Miller's Abhianians, sweeping forward in a long line of roaring crashing infernos of damming destruction, Huebaum's right grand division was cut to pieces, and overwhelmed gave way in panic, while the batteries on general Hanson's left and right, under generals Joe Beck and Snyder Stanck opened a hurricane of shells upon the Landelinians in the center who were counter charging, undulating the whole region with a storm of shell explosions the whole line being honey combed with gaps and retiring in terrific confusion. Heavy forces of Landelinians under general Walton were annihilated, the very mout mouths of hell seemed to open everywhere, the roar of musketry seeming to rend the heavens and the whole christian line rushing forward with tremendous fury shattered the Landelinian columns frightfully but Miller, Shrader, Joe Beck and Usell were killed and most of the christian columns falling back threw the rest of the line into confusion, the Landelinian fire shattering it frightfully and all the officers apprehending the danger of a counter charge should the whole line give way, could not think of allowing a retreat and tried to rally the panic stricken columns Hanson's right itself having been rolled up by counter charges of the Landelinian cavalry under general or Joe Beck the main commands of that right wing. Hanson's castle was mortally wounded. At other points of Hanson's line, lines especially along the center, unconscious of the confusion of their comrades on the right or left, were still pressing on so vigorously that along this point the enemy's stand was broken, and the Landelinian retreat along this point was the means of salvation for the rest of Hanson's and Hanson's lines. The long double line of freshly arrived troops met the counter charging Landelinians with all the stubbornness they could assume but the assaulting columns were breaking a part of general Hanson's main line also and a frantic appeal was made, which was answered by Picknell, who attacked the Landelinians with a rush like utmost precipitation, with cavalry, dragoons, infantry and artillery, smashing up the whole Landelinian front everywhere and forcing the Landelinians back in confusion. Huebaum's left grand center being threatened with annihilation. Major general Miller himself had not wanted to be seriously engaged with Hanson's until he had heard from general Hickey, but having been impressed with the importance of Hanson's line being held back he had directed general Harry Ludolph to counter charge, with cavalry and infantry, and force Hanson's assailants back at all costs. He paid the cost with his life and no success for reward either....

THE FOURTH ASSAULT OF THE CHRISTIANS IS ALSO SUCCESSFUL.....

The battle was now in full fury again along general Hanson's whole line again the firing along the enemy's front being so furious that it seemed as if there was a million pieces of artillery in action along this point alone, the Angelinians attacking again with awful fury, returning a most destructive and appalling fire, increasing the terrific carnage.

Huebaum's right was smashed by Miller Johnston, more than compensating for his reinforcements, Archie Spendon holding his ground while waiting for Wade Fort Maxwell was imprisoned between general Joe Beck and another army, general John breadth John Harry was killed, general Prentice Maxwell surrounded had surrendered to the christians and the fury of the firing and the battle all a, along the line was indescribable the struggle being so fierce now that the war between all the nations of Europe in lasting all these four years and a few months could not outrival the fury of this great battle.

Archie Spender was not observing the peril from the south and directed general Wenny to post Oldfield divisions on the Mc-Hollesper Junction, which he was about to do when general Sunday Usell's Abhianians appeared upon the desired point, and Archie Spendon being entirely surrounded now, and threatened with annihilation also, his army which was inflamed by musketry and artillery, surrendered to Joe Beck and his remaining command of ten million men.

General Miller holding had placed his batteries into a position which when opened upon the Landelinians compelled the surrender of general P. Phelan, Johnston, and Miller Johnston's one thousand guns roaring with fearful detonations tore up the Landelinian columns in his front with their terrible torrents of shells and canister and the Landelinians being moved down by the hundred thousand, finally gave way, general Huebaum's whole line again in full retreat, though the christian troops had lost two million more dead in these last two assaults, and six million wounded, a frightful cost for victory indeed.

THE FIFTH ASSAULT OF THE CHRISTIANS.

During the lull in the infantry action the long lines of christian artillery hammered away, still cutting the Landelinian columns to fragments. C Violet and her sisters indeed were exempted from witnessing such horrible scenes from their experiences previously described, the Landelinian guns fiercely responding, though one after another of their guns were blown up..... The fifth assault of the Angelinians once began continued with relentless fury, the attack being so furious that all the Glandelinian who wounded, seriously or slightly who were yet able to fire a gun were placed behind the firing line with the instructions to shoot down any man who would attempt to flee without orders. The "lame" Glandelinian officers along this point were almost crying. They had sent appeal after appeal for help, but it did not come. This part of the Glandelinian division under the personal command of general Joe Stanley, had been three million strong when the fifth assault of the Christians started, now only ninety thousand were left, and still they were fast melting away. His front line long before this had entirely disappeared before the terrific Christian fire, and all his officers were either killed, wounded, or without horses. In the meantime general Anniss Anniss had advanced large forces from general Vivian's right, which struck against the center of general Huebaum's Manley's line, Baldwin's batteries simultaneously opening fire to cover the attacking columns, the storm of shells and high explosives fairly ripping and tearing many of the Glandelinian columns to pieces, added by torrents of canister grape, and musket bullets spreading the carnage all along the line, and causing such indescribable havoc that the charging columns were at last able to penetrate the Glandelinian front and crushing in it into fragments, driving it once more back in confusion. General Vivian's right wing was also inactive, the smoke of the forty mile battle line being so dense that it looked more like a great forest fire than a battle; the whole entire Christian line being in a tumultuous uproar, and never before in all the war, was there ever seen such a battle. Columns along the line of the Glandelinian left had been mowed down by the hundred, their whole line being rent and broken up and one more mile of ground general Huebaum Manley was forced to give but nevertheless reformed once more this time in a thick line of woods.

THE RESULT OF THE NEXT ASSAULT.

But nevertheless the next assault covered by a redoubled cannon fire of general Baldwin's batteries whose shells exploded by their hundred thousands produced a continuous dreadful roar, was completely unmanageable to the enemy, and amid the dreadful indescribable tumult the left wing of general Huebaum Manley's armies or extreme right, on Manley's left wing, was overwhelmed and gave way the Christians capturing the new wooded position and amid a maze of wreckage, caused by general Baldwin's explosive shells.

The impact at other points of general Huebaum Manley's left wing was so violent that general Manley's right also abandoned their positions, his center being surrounded. Piles and windrows of dead and wounded Christians covered the works, the Angelinians attacking general Manley's Manley's and Manley's center on all sides with utmost fury, and advancing like a raging avalanche of lava and general Manley in command of the center had to surrender.

General Orangeman tried to reinforce general Manley's lines but the advance of the Christians could not be checked and Manley gave way. Ten million of the assailants were pressing upon all of general Manley's lines of the left, yelling like demons attacking with such great energy that general general Mulberos one million Glandelinians being surrounded and reduced to fifty thousand, and encircled by over five million Christians and infiltrated by the Angelinians during their storming attack threw down their arms and hurriedly surrendered, general Mulberos committing suicide to escape being taken prisoner.

The struggle indeed along the whole of general Huebaum Manley's line was raging with a fury beyond describing the Christians attacking with tremendous energy the situation of his left wing being critical and being forced to withdraw. General Manley's divisions on general Manley's Manley's Manley's right poured an exceedingly severe artillery fire upon the Christians this whole line being lit such such a blaze that from the storm of exploding shells the battle field looked like a vast volcanic crater in violent action the firing of the Glandelinian batteries being exceedingly annihilating, making a murderous and appalling roar but nevertheless did not stop the Christian Christian advance. Huebaum's center had been shot to pieces and gapped again and again and as fast as their columns were reformed nevertheless the main line had to yield again the Glandelinians recoiling in confusion with ten of their best generals left dead upon the field a frightful result indeed for repelling this assault. Drake Johnston, Valley Henrysop

1-252

Robert O. Drake, Germania Huebaum, Harvard nonas Donaldson, Roche, Lydard, poste De-guecur, Bachelor Carters, Polman Kieff and Johnstone Edwards were the Glandelinian generals who fell and who were killed in this battle.

THE SEVENTH ASSAULT THINK OF IT.

The enemy's cannon during the lull of the attack had increased their horrible fire as they had received more guns from general Gillie tearing the Christian lines who were reforming for the next attack into huge gaps. Mangling manions left, rending Jennings line to fragments and strewnug strewnug the grounds with multitudes of dead and wounded Angelinians but the surviving columns returned the fire, held their ground tensely and at the command "Forward" the attack was on with redoubled fury. Huebaum at this moment when the battle raged with the fury of a million damnations, received a message which read:

"Your excellency general Huebaum Manley; General Mulberos right wing of ten million men is annihilated the eleventh and twelfth corps are threatened with annihilation and your main left is giving way. If you wish the great battle to be won you must hurry up aid it is reported also that your right flank is turned."

S. Signed general Hopkins. Twenty third corps.

Indeed more than this, large forces of Christians were pressing heavily upon general Manley's front and this brave Glandelinian general being exposed to the full force of the Christian fire, his man forced him to lie down. The firing along the whole of general Huebaum Manley's line sounded like billions of cannon in a action, but just as appalling was the murderous roar of firearms along the advancing Christian front and the artillery covered their charge with tenfold violence fairly pounding the Glandelinian columns to an annihilation.

The Glandelinian officers of surviving divisions had sent many officers or messengers to general Huebaum Manley to tell him of their situation but they had failed to reach him. The Angelinians under general general Mulberos Lynn had mowed their way through all the Glandelinian waves which had held despite all the overwhelming numbers but now gave way the surviving Glandelinians retreating in amazing confusion and a panic.

Manley's right and left wing had also given way after a fierce fight of demonic fury which had raged hand to hand in which the muskets were used as clubs, bayonet against bayonet, and there also had been a brilliant display of sabres, daggers, pistols being fired at point blank and of even pikes were used so freely. After this withdrawal there was no lull at all fresh columns only coming on to take the places of those giving way and so the Christians still continued the attack this time without any lull whatever.

THE ALMOST INEVITABLE SUCCESS OF THE FOE,
DURING THE EIGHT ASSAULT MADE BY THE CHRISTIANS.

The fury of this christian assault caused voices of the Glandelinians to waver, but the right of general, Joshua Manley's left had delivered a most violent counter charge in perfect waves of men driving the christian back with frightful loss capturing a portion of the works in possession of the christians, driving the rest of the christian line into panic and yelling with rage and fury ploughing their way through the christian line killing thousands. While the Glandelinians were giving way at other points of Joshua Manley's lines the Glandelinians who were victorious still pressed on with terrific fury the Angelinians rallying and fighting savagely to drive them back or at least check them and reinforcements arriving the christians gave fierce resistance the Glandelinians recoiled and the christians again pressed on driving the foe back three miles further many of the Angelinians striving with might and main to reach general Jones who was surrounded by a covering square of Glandelinians a shell having landed in their midst however killing Jones and annihilating his body guard.

THE NINTH ASSAULT IN WHICH THOUGH THE GLANDELINIAN CENTER IS VICTORIOUS AND RECAPTURES ALL LOST GROUND TO THEM, THE CHRISTIANS FINALLY RALLY AND A RESULT IS THE ROUT OF THE GLANDELINIANS:

In the meantime general, Michael Walsh had been sent with his entire command by general Vivian to the aid of Hanson's right commanded by general Charles Brown and when these came up the ninth assault began, this assault being more violent than any of the others. On the Glandelinian right the situation of Hanson's line was serious the christians over their losses seeming to break out in paroxysms of uncontrollable fury plowing their way through his line amid the longest and most desperate hand to hand fighting ever seen during the war.

As the conflict became still more terrific general, Michael Walsh, all severely wounded but nevertheless the christian columns were thrown again the immense multitude of Glandelinians in the face of a scathing fire along an eight mile front. The christian heavily outnumbered the Glandelinians who met the assault with a storm of fury and general, Michael Perry or on the Glandelinian fell mortally wounded and general George Auston taking his place and restoring order in the line was killed by a shell hursting among a gun, general Wholers divisions of ninth corps being overwhelmed threatened to give way and finally did so despite the attempt of the slightly wounded to stop them by shooting many down. The Angelinians were swarming forward like huge torrents of human beings, Manley's whole right was again being shattered to pieces to pieces the christian assailants ploughing their way through the Glandelinian columns and never before was there such a mix up of men and flags, muskets crossing in deadly earnest, at a sabre clashing together, pistols and muskets blazing face to face, and the men even fought with fists and wrestled.

Though finally the two main wings of the Joshua Manley's army had given way once more, yielding two miles of ground the center had held its ground finally, these Glandelinians being assailed by fresh divisions and counter attacking with irresistible fury, despite the withering fire that tore their whole line to pieces, and being successful drove the christians into confusion mowing down large portions of the retreating line, and kept on, recovering all the lost ground the christians had won until it was stopped by a perfect hurricane of shells that crushed their right and left to fragments and yet though stopped the Glandelinians did not waver and returned a fire so severe that it indeed was a miracle that the fleeing christians survived through such a storm of carnage. A little after this happened general Vivian got this note:

"Your excellency general Vivian:
The eleventh corps under general McHollester, Vivian's almost annihilated their leader is dead, and though Hanson's right and left have been successful again driving Joshua's right and left back still further Joshua's center has received reinforcements and had so counter charged and Hanson's center is cut up and is retreating in confusion. His center must have aid or the battle is lost. It is reported also that Hanson is wounded though it cannot be confirmed."

GENERAL CHARLES BROWN
COMMANDER OF HANSON'S RIGHT WING

At this moment general Miller's artillery was arriving and soon being unlimbered fired charge after charge of canister and shells crushing and smashing the Glandelinian assaulting waves to atoms and driving them back. But amid the fearful carnage general Miller Stanley was wounded four times and now again a glancing bullet struck him in the head inflicting a serious and dangerous injury but for fear of causing panic among his lines he stayed at the firing line until the enemy withdrew especially only at this point, as they were still attacking elsewhere. At other portions of the christian center, the Glandelinians were fairly pressing through with such fury that the Angelinians were driven into a panic. But Miller's batteries were now also adding to the terrible carnage and the terrible cannon fire staggered Auston's line. In Glandelinians and though now they were halted they did not yield ground while other divisions of Glandelinians under Nathan now arrived with numbers pathing guns and soon a storm of canister was poured upon the retreating christian columns mowing them down in frightful numbers and again driving them into confusion. Simultaneously three large brigades of Glandelinians under general Charles Mitchell arrived to the aid of Joshua Manley and then came another battalion of artillery under general Shoop, John, Hartas, Knead and Ogden. Ogdens these guns opening a storm of fire, and a charge of Glandelinian cavalry drove Miller's guns back almost to Aronburg's pike. But Hardee and Ogden were killed as soon as their artillery opened fire but still the foe faltered not. Another note however reached general Vivian and he was trembling after he had read it:

"Your excellency general Vivian: General Hanson's center despite his other wings being victorious is overlapped and driven from its cent position, despite the reinforcements you had immediately sent. The enemy have opened eight thousand cannon upon Hanson's whole center and the confusion and carnage is heartrending indeed. The assault of general Joshua Manley's divisions is destructive and tremendous and even many guns commanded by general Miller Francis Smith which had opened a withering fire has been driven back almost to Aronburg's pike by the enemies cavalry assault, under Shoop, John his line of infantry is almost annihilated, general Hanson is reported severely wounded but won't leave the firing line for fear of his whole center retreating if his injuries are known. Vivian's whole line is overwhelmed and will be captured or annihilated if more aid is not immediately sent."

GENERAL ABNER ANDERSON.
COMMANDER OF THE FIRST BRIGADE
BRIGADE ARMY OF ARABIANIA:

Indeed at all points the christian center was in confusion, Miller Francis Smith was mortally wounded on the christian side, while Shoop, John, and John Silvers and Katzmer were wounded on the side of the foe and fortunately on account of heavy reinforcements from Picknell it was evident that the foe could not advance any further having only succeeded in driving the christian center back for ten miles, hundred hundreds of the ranks in gray being mowed down and Hansonia also receiving reinforcement under young Rhodes Frankerson and Whilliam scholar managed at last to hold his ground along the center and finally he wrote this message to general viviania:

"Your excellency general viviania!
I've received reinforcements from Picknell and can now hold my ground but the attack of the enemy has not abated in the least and has only increased in revenge for the check they received. The whole battle line even where my right and left has been successful besides the two wings of Hanson's army, has assumed an indescribable fury, he'll seem to have opened all along my entire line. I have ten thousand cannon of heavy calibre ready for action now, the roar of the enemy's guns are fairly shaking my men down from the concussion, millions upon millions of muskets are being used, and I am almost deaf from the din. My center has been shattered into a thousand fragments before the arrival of reinforcements as the fire of the enemy all the time is annihilating and the attack of the foe is still extremely ferocious. With a few more divisions I would be able to drive the enemy back and recover the ground they lost in this section.

Your assistant commander in chief;
General Hansonia.

Hansonia received reinforcements by the whole sale after sending general viviania the message and the firing of the christians became so terrific that masses of the grays were mowed down every second but still the glandelinian assault continued everywhere along the line. Soon in front of Hansonia's whole line the dead Glandelinians lay in windrows and all these dead Glandelinians became piled so high between the lines that at times the Glandelinian curtain of artillery fire hid hundreds of thousands of arms, legs, heads and fragments of bodies shattered human forms, and a storm of lacerated flesh and intestines back on the christians in their trenches. On the center of the main christian line under Hansonia the Glandelinian waves under general Harold Bell were attacking with stupendous fury though their whole line was riven with thousands of gaps again and again, so it became shattered. The enemy were indeed attacking with all their might, but now as more reinforcements concentrated upon them the Glandelinians being cut down in perfect waves finally became panic stricken, and soon the whole center gave way in confusion, Hanson himself capturing thousands of Glandelinian cannon millions of prisoners and recovering not only the ten miles of lost ground but drove the enemy still further back with heavy loss.

THE TENTH ASSAULT COSTS HANSON GREATER LOSS THAN EVER. TERRIBLE SLAUGHTER ON BOTH SIDES.

More heavy reinforcements under Hendon, disunited came rushing to the aid of the christian center also, and confident of his heavy numbers now Hansonia made another terrific assault, the fury of the Glandelinian fire was redoubled ten times and the christian columns fairly withered. The Glandelinians themselves however received such a tempest of shot and shell, that they were confused. Otto Van Hannish captured the wooded regions held stubbornly by the enemy on Warren's Run in the face of fierce resistance and also turned the Glandelinian flank shattering their surging lines. General Federal Doubleday was coming up the Aronburg and Costello roads at this time and these forces were thrown upon the Glandelinians under general Frank Ottoman Hannish, and as more reinforcements arrived the Glandelinians on the right of Warren's Run became panic stricken and retreated, Hannish the Glandelinians also being overwhelmed and retreating.

Along the main left the struggle was still in full sway and even increasing with terrible ferocity as still more reinforcements arrived but soon along the whole left the Glandelinians were soon wavering after thousands of volleys over the short space of a mile had been fired by the christians within fifteen minutes, but nevertheless general Costello's cannons artillery started to pour a rainstorm of shot and shell and high explosives upon the advancing christians tearing thousands of gaps in their main line, and even shattering to fragments their entire front columns but still the assault was continued with such force and desperation that though the lines were rent and torn to pieces the survivors swarmed up, forced the Glandelinians to flee and captured every one of Costello's cannons guns thousands of his men and the general's line. While this was occurring general von Johnston's Glandelinians retreating had taken up their position on Cemetery Creek and from here they opened a murderous fire of cannon machine guns and musketry upon a portion of the nearest advancing christians annihilating them all and within fifteen minutes this portion of the field seemed to be a wide smoke inferno, many of the Angelinian columns dissolved in dense gaps by secret were torn in their main line and the left wing was combed with shells, but advancing oblique in manner these christians soon had this fiery inferno surrounded on all sides and facing annihilation with Heller killed, the Glandelinians surrendered.

Manley Chamberlaine whose main positions were hastily erected on Erminia Junction Erminia Junction and whose line even extended from Hill number five, connecting with seven and four hill and from Sacramento and Chamberlaine hill, where his main line of artillery was drawn up, opened a fire on the advancing christians that made this three hundred foot hills of wide extent seem like volcanic eruptions annihilating every assaulting column in purple as fast as they got within as fast as they got within range but now Baldwin's artillery opened a curtain of artillery fire upon these positions making those hills untenable for the Glandelinians, Manley Chamberlaine and Aladden's men were killed, and moving his lines from his own new positions it had first held to a commanding point at Vivian's gun from which it was refused to a large wheatfield and so surrounding these deadly series of Glandelinian salients the christians compelled general McWolfeater Francis Stanck who took Chamberlaine's place to surrender, the Angelinians capturing twenty three million Glandelinians besides twenty three thousand pieces of calibre cannon, nine thousand machine guns and two hundred howitzers, besides a thousand krupp guns.

At other points the tide of battle rolled on with the most fearful velocity especially toward Hubert's Manley's center and dashed like withering tidal waves against the Glandelinian front the Glandelinians breaking into confusion. A fiercer and more titanic artillery fight commenced the Glandelinian general Gustapha was killed and another total rout of the Glandelinians seemed certain. Hubert's Manley took personal command of his central divisions at this critical moment placing brigades of artillery and giving orders for the Glandelinians to hold this point at all costs until general Hermann's reinforcements came or until the last man fell, but that there was no giving way under no conditions whatever, even for the Almighty himself if he should attack with his legions of angels and heavenly beings put together.

Riding hoofs batteries struggling up and tried to reach by the point in time, but White Wolf's divisions of fifteen men rushing forward like an avalanche avalanche came face to face with the Glandelinian artillery so quickly that they were not able to fire one discharge.

Riding word had enough artillery to stop a charging force of any size but he had not been quick enough and though he finally got a discharge before the christians swarmed among the guns that was equally terrible enough to stagger the christian advance, he was nevertheless in bad luck, for the Glandelinian muskets were emptied and there was no time to load and though the hand to hand fight exceeded all description the christian assault was just as easily stopped as a small lawn could stop the crush of a violent tornado. General McWolfeater Johnston striving to rally the panic stricken Glandelinians was killed, Buell Franklin fell at another point, Hanson's army on his successful christian troops then Warren's German and Red Riding Hood of the foe, had to give way and the whole entire line of Hubert's Manley's retreated in confusion, his main line was cut in two by general McWolfeater's brigades by accelerating the movements of the Glandelinian Glandelinian center and retarding that of the wings, and the entire line was completely rolled up with more frightful loss than what the christians had suffered.

ANOTHER HELLSH SLAUGHTER. THE SEVENTH ASSAULT. THINK OF IT THE CHRISTIANS ARE SO VICTORIOUS AGAIN.

The Glandelinians amid the hellish carnage and despite their main line being cut in two rallied once more, the main chain of glandelinian artillery responded with good and telling effect to the deadly fire of the christian artillery and prepared for greater resistance. The main surges of the Angelinians advanced furiously against Solomon Alseddian positions accompanied by sixteen batteries of Mortar artillery the frontal columns of the graycoats seeing today dissolve by the hundred in the force of the fire of mortars and being batteries, and while the survivors strung to their post positions stubbornly other immense divisions of Abheannian swarming forward charging in one vast multitude, as they spread out into a long line and though it was torn and mangled through and through, the line soon encompassed Solomon Alseddian line in a half circle.

But with an awful roar the firing of the Glandelinians increased, and though this one multitude began to dissolve away, whole surges more appeared. Already four thousand runs were opened upon the Glandelinians this fire beginning to sweep the Glandelinians away in whole multitudes, the very size of the christian surges.

Division after division of the Angelinians were sweeping on to the aid of the christians, the Angelinians pressing on, thousands being slain outright, but the ravaging fire which streamed from the whole Glandelinian front failed to stop the christian charge and though the Glandelinian cannon increasing their roar in a fearful manner more were placed the christians were nevertheless winning.

Even from the enemys whole line of infantry terrific storms of minnies were poured, and in every direction trees were cut down by shell fire. But on and on streamed the massive christian line, one thousand more of the enemys guns along the center flashing frightfully through through the smoke, fresh volleys and the roar of explosions broke out anew, and the enemys line seemed to be one vast stream of flame and smoke. But now all of the Glandelinian batteries were thundering away with redoubled violence, hurling torrents of shells everywhere among the enemys lines the Angelinians covered by Baldwin's artillery fire pressing on relentlessly and coming in close quarters with them poured a terrible stream of destruction destruction upon them.

Innovation on the Glandelinian side, a great general point going down mangled and bleeding disconcerted the Glandelinians the str struggle having been something horrible. No before the foe gave way. The christians were were advancing everywhere with con temptuous fury driving the Glandelinians back a all along the line for another couple of miles and though once more victorious the christian loss was heavier than the enemys in killed and wounded.

THE TWELFTH ASSAULT.

During the fury of the 12th assault the Angelinians met a fire of terrific fury from Glandelinian reinforcements and while whole brigades melted slowly away, Baldwin's batteries increased their ever increasing roar, hurling shells like rain among the enemys lines stripping all the trees of their branches in that region. General Robert Costello had taken prominent place and ordered the Glandelinians to stand firm. The long brilliant waves of men in purple pressed on, the whole front of the christian line was shattered by the fierce collision but notwithstanding it continued the attack and also Glandelinian and Stanning and Fredrickson sweeping toward the enemys lines encountered encountered an annihilating fire and were forced to recoil. General Wedge five million men, and catapaults three million men sweeping forward with tremendous fury saw their commands crushed to fragments, and Wedge Johnston being killed his men broke into utter confusion. Five thousand and fifty guns simultaneously opened an annihilating fire upon several brigades moving across the intersection of wolden crossroads and every one of the christians went down into mangled and bleeding corpses. So fierce was the carnage that logs and trees were catching on fire and burning branches fell everywhere.

For ten miles the christian columns melted away, but the survivors swarming over the abandoned salienta pressed toward the enemy, and now to the enemy at this point the thunder of fresh cannon to right front and rear, broke in a continuous roar so loud that it seemed as if the world was blowing to pieces, the firing of musketry sounding like a million cannon broke loose simultaneously, and to add to the terrible din other terrible volleys broke out from general Bavaria's line then came the deafening roll of fresh christian musketry from another direction, which blazed in a general fire heard at Angelina Agathia six hundred miles away. At some points these Glandelinian columns started to retire having been torn and mangled by Baldwin's batteries but found themselves surrounded, thousands of burning trees adding to the horrors of the great battle. The whole force of Glandelinians under general Bernard Snyder was driven and hard pressed on all sides, but other portions still held a silent tier musketry and cannon fire sounding like the exploding of millions of tons of dynamite sticks.

All the christian batteries at the same were swelling to tin titanic throes filling the air with a horrible roar heard for hundreds of miles and a hundred thousand Glandelinians trying to force themselves out of the christian lines had been a all moved down the few survivors throwing themselves flat to escape the merciless fire of merciless fire and finally general Bernard Snyder surrendered with his whole surviving command of ten million men. With irresistible energy the other parts of the christian line had attacked the main left of general Gustavus Manly's left and though columns after columns were swept away, and the whole of Manly's line was simultaneously crushed to fragments, besides six other surges of christians, who were also torn to fragments, the rest pressed on with relentless fury and now master Johnston's line though his first divisions were crushed to fragments managed to break the Glandelinian front, and attacked with such ungovernable fury that they gave way, the Angelinians also falling upon the rest of the line with murderous fury.

Indeed along this point it was impossible for the Glandelinians to stand at all before the charge of the Angelinians and general Henry Stanley's army being hemmed in by a maelstrom of carnage were compelled to surrender, Odder Warren and Henry Stanley falling mortally wounded.

The Glandelinian officers made the most desperate attempts to reform the confused Glandelinian columns, but such a hot fire was poured into their ranks, that to a reform then was utterly impossible and the Glandelinians retreated in confusion. The Angelinians were now swarming everywhere, attacking the Glandelinians who still stood a their ground all along the line, striving with all their might in this inferno amid thousands of shell bursts and hundreds of thousands of toppling trees to carry the rest of the position, the Glandelinian being hard pressed ever everywhere, their generals being Stanek Wilson, Wido Widrow, Wilson Jenningson, Galsen Perry, Perry Farm and James Wright, being wounded, the whole line of battle being simply in a hellish uproar and so intense became the fire of general Tribunan Tribunes Glandelinians that thousands of Angelinian regiments were mowed down. But Watson Costello was killed, his Glandelinians were driven back Wilson Padua two hundred guns were captured, besides thousands of his men, the whole of the enemys line was torn tottered and his blood bleeding, and parts of it gave way in a general retreat, thousands of their ranks having been mowed down, the survivors retiring in the greatest confusion.

Every column of Wilson's divisions were also swept back for three miles to the Maria and Marius gun, Perrys one million three hundred thousand Glandelinians encountering an annihilating fire when countercharging with the fury of an avalanche failed to reach the christian lines one million of their splendid division having been mowed down all of his Glandelinian divisions pouring across Wright's Run in panic under a hot destructive fire. Wright made energetic efforts to advance his columns to a counter charge but the fire of the christians was too hot, and so he had been compelled to give way and this assault was also won by the christians completely.////

THE HIGHEST FURY OF THE SECOND DAY OF THE BATTLE!
THE BLOODY FURY OF THE THIRTEENTH ASSAULT, AND THE BLOODY ANGLERS.....

Baldwin on the christian side by this time had been wounded, a portion of his battery was silenced by the severe Glandelinian artillery fire but hearing that seven hundred thousand of Wrights men had been captured general Baldwin took courage. During the first part of this assault the christians had taken possession of the Glandelinian Glandelinian works, by overlapping the enemy's line, but at this point the christians met with such stern resistance that they could not hold onto the success thus gained, these christian infantry lines were crushed to fragments by a roaring counter charge supported by the fire of one thousand three hundred guns and while the carnage and din became so terrific that from the fierce uproar the very heavens seemed to be bursting the surviving christian columns gave way, the Glandelinians pressing on and bearing down everything in their path.

The Glandelinians resisting Baldwin's furious assault had managed to gain their ground, but they had fought stubbornly so long on till so few were left of that division of seventeen million five hundred thousand men that they that is the survivors never again entered battle. Though at this point the Glandelinians had retained this bloody angle general Edwin being in action elsewhere with Jackson Vanleys encouraged Hanson to continue the attack at Ushum Manleys lines. The Glandelinian positions to which Ushum Manley had retreated, was in the shape of three three long angles, the surrounding woods sheltering the foe, giving fine position positions for the foe in infantry but not for artillery and it was at this point that three of general Evans divisions had penetrated amid frightful slaughter, and then had been repulsed for lack of support.

The loss on the christian side had been dreadful more heavier than the losses of the enemy. Major general Adolphe had come in with his divisions, Imboden's McRae had been repulsed and general Hanson had a large force of infantry that had not yet been in battle. It was now when all of Hanson's artillery broke into general action the Glandelinians responding with their cannons and now Hanson's fresh forces resumed the fierce onslaught with full fury, one hundred pathing guns mowing twenty of the christian surges into fragments within fifteen minutes, the very abyss of hell again seeming to open open, the firing on both sides roaring like a million call cannon at once. Thousands of frightful volleys was poured upon the christians but as they pressed on undaunted the titanic roar increased with redoubled fury.

HANSON'S WHOLE LINE IS REPULSED AND THROWN INTO WILD CONFUSION.....

Along the whole of the gray line under general Estre's direct guidance there broke a simultaneous roar of musketry and the christians went down in hundreds of thousands every fifteen minutes the whole assaulting line being fairly riven but at last the command of the line reached by the right of the Glandelinian position, but the Glandelinians under general John Silverhair, Janinga, came to the rescue, McCallen also arriving with his artillery and pouring a murderous line of fire upon the christians who were already swarming swarming over the works. The right wing of the assaulting line of christians began to give way, general Pitts patricks line was shattered into fragments by the terrific fire of the Glandelinians, and now the whole line was giving way in confusion but checked, the Glandelinians pressing on after them, louder rattlings of musketry breaking out along other parts of the line then the whole christian line not as yet in confusion but checked, became all ablaze ablaze and the brigades of the Glandelinians met led away the uproar of the firing being almost unearthly there being such a deafening uproar that so terrific was the concussion that the people in the cities and towns hundreds of miles away feared to remain within their houses as they deemed that the shocks which they believed were earth quakes would level the cities to the ground.

The swift Glandelinian columns countercharging, came on in massive battle line now fully ablaze with musketry fire, the Glandelinians already holding by fierce reaction Hanson's main left in check and also driving it in a had succeeded in crushing general Hanson's left by superior numbers and by constant flanking, but had lost on their own center a severe brigade and ten battalions of artillery. General Prentiss Wallman's division had been in danger of being cut off and surrounded and so had fallen back before the Glandelinian attack, but later succeeded in closing up, at general's left, and rallying a part of general Hanson's line.

THE FRIGHTFUL SLAUGHTER OF THE WAVES OF GLANDELINIAN.

The whole of general Hanson's line unaided, shook in the red wings of the bloodiest of wars, the line that wavered before the sludge hammer hammer blows of a wild infernal enemy of God, stiffened and held once more, discharging Glandelinian waves by tens, crumpled and broke once more, before an assault raging with devastating fury, a line that rallied and formed again, mowing a gray surge sixty miles in extent into fragments, stood against storming assaults of redoubled fury, cutting all the Glandelinian waves down, and advanced again successfully once more retreated, turned and held again, it being a frightful battle indeed....

The Angelinians at this section were surprised and outnumbered, outnumbered, outgeneraled, outflanked, without orders, with aimless orders, with conflicting orders, broken, disorganized, confused, beaten driven back by the Glandelinian assault which was as desperate as the defenses was, unflinching, suffering horrible slaughter. This battle line was indeed a regular death trap.

On the Glandelinian side general Henry Darger Wells and Tontil John, were killed, Wilcox was wounded, David Gaudin was captured, the commands of these divisions were wiped out just like a child in school would wipe a slate with a rag. Even Hanson's two main commanders Francis Whelan Wallace was killed, and McCallister Prentiss was mortally wounded.

As the reinforcing came along to the scene of the surprise, they met the full tide of retreat, remnants of what had been armies, and divisions with frantic officers striving in vain to rally them. The reinforcing columns spread out in the fields to the right to left, threw out skirmishers, and advanced more slowly in line of battle, opening up their ranks, unallowing the broken and panic stricken troops to pass through, who reformed under shelter and followed.

Availing himself of the absence of specified orders, general Charles Brown used that knowledge well, seizing upon the strongest position of the battle field, where there was shelter of crust and under brush for the christians, while there was open fields and plains over which the enemy must advance. Barely had they taken their position when the foe came swarming through the woods on the far farther side of the fields and plains while from the christian center came the steady crescendo of thousands of cannon and millions of muskets, but immediately in front not a shot was fired. The enemy were waiting for a volley, while the christian commanders rode slowly along, behind the lines, ordering the men to lie down to reserve and hold their fire. The Glandelinians coming forward in a long yelling surge to the line strong were now only three hundred yards away and suddenly delivered a volley all along the line simultaneously, countless numbers of the Angelinians being struck and falling to the ground in all kinds of struggles as thick as rain, while further along the christian line some of the christian divisions gave a speedy answer, the Glandelinians there wavering for a moment before coming on. But again came the commands of the christian commanders.

"Ten-shant. Hannev your fire. Wait for them. Wait for them....
Steady --hold your fire.Steady wait for them....wait for them to comecloser."
 A battery of forty guns posted at this point under like instructions, to hold their fire was unable to endure the strain, and becoming panic stricken because they could not fire when they wished, they turned tail and fled without firing a shot. The Glandelinians closer now than before, yelled in a perfect uproar that was shocking and fired again with a tremendous rolling crash of musketry that stunned all who heard it, but the whole christian line unable to bear the strain any longer lost their fire with the same roaring rolling crash, their thousands of volleys fired simultaneously crashing out murderously at point blank, the whole Masonic line was frightfully shot to pieces, the second line was rapped and torn, but still on came the survivors.

Hundreds of thousands of gray forms lay still and quiet on the May grass, multitudes of forms limped, crawled, or staggered back, while all around through the frightful roar of the musketry fire, rose pitiful cries of agony to ring the heart.
 The whole Glandelinian surge withered and broke, was in great confusion.
 Hundreds of thousands firing incessantly rushed madly on, hundreds of thousands of others huddled together and fired, some stood or knelt alone and shot as coolly as at target practice, then in an instant like shrapnel in a fire they melted away also, the knots large or small dissolved in to dead or wounded, the survivors streaming back across the fields for the shelter of the woods. Then a second gray surge the same number in strength, came from the woods, opened up to let their fleeing comrades through, halted fired, reloaded and came on with dreadful swiftness yelling in one chorus which shook the air in deafening tumult.

Then a third gray army sprang up from the woods beyond, while an unseen battery began to hurl a storm of shot and shrapnel into the christian lines. Wave after wave of gray ten million strong each, rose shrieking, beat upon the christian lines, tore them to fragments, fell back in remnants before the horrible slaughter and rose once more, and went at it again and again every time with the most redoubled fury, fairly raising calm with the whole christian line. Above the titanic uproar of hundreds of thousands of thunderous cannon, crash of million millions of rifle volleys in an incessant roar, screaming shells and high explosives by the hundreds of thousands which seemed to hurl the earth into the air in horrible eruptions, flaming conflagrations among the woods, and battle smoke, clattering roar of titanic explosions hurrying columns of smoke and debris thousands of feet, above uproar and clamor like the whole world bursting to pieces, in millions of volcanic eruptions that could tear up the earth's crust, and turn it into a molten planet, through all the wild hellstorm of seething inferno of battle, and whole scale slaughter, pierced the shrill fury of the charging legions in gray, the dreaded Glandelinian "DEVIL YELL."
 The fierce Glandelinian cheering on her sons. The cleaved fields for scores of miles were thick strewn with great seas of Glandelinian dead, hundreds of thousands of wounded men rose there in their unendurable agony heedless of the leaders hail about them, or seeking to reload in its fury. General David Wilcox Manning was borne swiftly by on a stretcher, his army having been shot or carried away by a cannon ball, his whole side was dreadfully torn by a shell explosion and a splinter of bone blood-dripping protruded through the blood soaked hasty bandages, the despair and agony in that white face being pitiful.

Hannonia's whole line during this seething avalanche of hell's damna-tion, was outnumbered throughout the rest of the day, the only chance for the christians laying in the strength of the ground, of using every available means of shelter to the utmost, for to present themselves for long as a fair target for the wildly attacking and screaming enemy would be fatal. The first main Glandelinian charge had come when too many of the christians had been still deaf to all commands, drunken with frenzied victory, blinded to all sorts, except the apparently fleeing foe, or dazed at seeing his strength suddenly renewed.
 That assault though repulsed had cost them dear. The christian losses was frightful more frightful than that of the enemy, and it did seem even to many an Angelinian commander that flesh and blood could not stand the strain of the assault any longer. So the slow afternoon wore on in a long almost unendurable unendurable inferno of horror all along the line both sides strong as they were seemed to try their best to annihilate each other.

The bleeding Angelinians here, with their thinned and shortened lines closed stubbornly up for the dreadful task, knew nothing how this most bloodiest of fights was progressing elsewhere, save as strugglers joined them, with news of black disaster all along the line. Hour by hour amid an inferno of firing of cannon and musketry all along a line of sixty miles, they were steadily losing ground hour by hour, that grim angle was bent back to a sharper curve, fighting bitterly for every inch with a foe of God and all his angels and saints and children that that seemed invincible, that no slaughter no matter how terrible and costly could daunt, no loss even in officers or men could blindingly the christians fought on tenaciously now without fear, as without hope, stubbornly gaining a vast morgue, losing, gaining again and losing most. This Glandelinian charge however the most ferocious of the day was already beaten to a standstill, but the christian left was sadly less lessened in numbers, forced to fall back again so that they might have less ground to defend the next time when the appalling attack was resumed and at it was at this time that the Glandelinian chief Huesbaum Manley felt seriously and dangerously wounded, and yet his men as now did not know it. Stuart and Capt. Johnston had been out flanked and driven back with frightful dissipation, Hannson's right was outflanked and dissipated, other columns were driven back in mere platoons of all that were left, Charles Brown was outflank outflanked and stood, Phelan Wallace Grant with them, amid all the fury of the bloodiest of all wars. But Wallace Grant had been killed his divisions scattered and so surrounded, though six of his divisions under general general putting attempting to cut their way out had made good their escape. In the fatal lull of the Prantice surrender a Glandelinian general, the breathless christian fell back closed up, that tremendous gap placed their massive batteries, and drew their lines to gether for the final struggle. A partial partial assault was replurepulsed with annihilation to the attackers. And in the brief a space in that followed Hannson saw his furious staff officers officers forcing the drivers of ammunition ammunition and supply wagons hurrying down the hill side roads, down the hill sides themselves to give soon above for headlong cannon, new reinforcements and batteries, and to his joy the main forces of general Picknells came up with Virginia, Wisconsin, and Nevada divisions, and so the last desperate stand was successful.

A new storm of artillery fire was sweeping the blue ranks, concentrated deadly and unceasing, the low sinking sinking sun-gleaming through the battle smoke. Victorious, confident, steady the Glandelinians poured forward in a hundred great waves millions strong, their volleys sweeping the christian columns with terrible effect, and receiving only a feeble answer the gray host came on in a line of rebel formation, and now as another volley, and another shattered the purple lines, there came a frightful roar seemingly everywhere, the gray waves heaved shuddered melted to fragments, rallied came on, dissolved away away, in halted and fired, and in the awful der delirium of battle the wild high pitch of heroic madness, the unceasing christian fire withered a every wave, scores of them melted away and the survivors broke and fled in confusion. Picknells, Wisconsin, Hannson's and the rest of the christian forces, leaping forward in swift pursuit. The christian banners reeled forward again again and again, for the christians the second day of the battle was won. The whole Galverinian country from coast to coast had been shaken like an earthquake by the tremendous di-astrophical of the second days battle, wino windows by millions in the scores of cities being broken by the concussion, though this great battle was being fought fifty miles south of the Galverinian boundary line in northern Angelinia. In Angelinia itself cities a thousand miles away from the roaring battlefield was vibrated at strong enough by the concussion, to cause millions of dollars loss in damage, not of only windows or dishes but in houses as well.

Under the cover of the night after resisting the christians until until nightfall Huesbaum's aid gathered the fragments of his army and withdrew taking with them as many cannon as had not been captured by the christians.
 Huesbaum had been successful long enough to cover the withdrawal of the armies under his father and brother, but had been unable to win victory himself, and now was lying wounded in an ambulance, and though not wounded enough to die was unable for further service for nearly a month.
 On the second days action the Glandelinian losses too terrific to be estimated but the christians lost suffered the loss of 13,996,000 dead and 36,000,000 wounded.

Amid the inferno of flame and din, earth tearing explosions it was indeed a nerve trying journey for general Jack Evans and the poor crippled Vivian girls, who were almost blinded by the smoke haze, dazed by the earsplitting explosions of shells and the horrible prolonged roar of the frightful battle everywhere. The booming of cannons by the hundred thousand was almost driving Evans and the little girls mad, they could hear the frightful shrieking roar of the Glandelinian devil yell, during Huebman Manleys last onslaught, and the screams of shells over their heads was as constant as the shrieking typhoon. Another shell at this moment had landed among the column Evans was leading exploding with an earsplitting detonation, killing and injuring a whole mass of men and unfortunate horses and annihilating the rest.

As they progressed on now under cover, the almost preternatural up roar of the distant firing seemed to grow louder, and Violet seeing a thick wall of smoke haze far to her right, fancied as if in a dream that she could see the opposing lines writhing to and fro, batteries being placed and withdrawn and men falling in terrible and faster numbers quicker than she could count by the hundred.

Divisions of Angelinians and Nicknellians were now rushing past the little groups guarding the helpless Vivian girls, and now Violet and her sisters believed that from the way things looked the Glandelinians were doing the attacking. Never before had the little girls heard such an awful uproar since their short captivity by Baldwin Glandelinians at Gloria Francisman's great fight and so many wounded, all in frightful condition were being brought on stretchers or crossed guns, by soldiers carrying them across their shoulders, that the little girls could almost believe that all the people in the world had been injured in some great calamity.

It was at this time that the din of the battle had seemed to grow at its worse and showers of bullets spattered against the trees caused the soldiers with Evans to stand behind the thickest of them, Evans and the little girls doing the same, though at times when they managed to see the gray forms in the direction of the frightful battle.

They shot them down from their hiding places. A certain Christian officer was riding toward their hiding place of Violet and her sisters it being general Selgunary who had rescued them at Worms during the rag reign of terror there when a high explosive shell burst to the right of them hiding their view in the smoke and sending clouds of gravel and wreckage in all directions around the edge of the shell crater already dug. When the smoke cleared to the horror of Violet and her sisters they saw the mangled horse and the rider lying on the ground and Selgunary was lying over them both.

One after another of the soldiers firing from behind the trees were dropping lifeless to the ground, from exposing themselves recklessly to the random storm of bullets, and now only twenty men out of the thousand that rode with them was left, beside Evans and the little girls who crouched low to avoid the danger of being hit by the stray bullets. The very shells were dominating the open ground beyond these trees, and Evans and the little girls did not dare leave their shelter. Division after division of men were seen retiring in confusion, far to the right, many of the men in purple quickly summing the ground.

Three other generals, Hemmings, Baldwin Frank Sedwick, and James Dearborn were galloping toward the panic stricken columns within sight of Violet and her sisters a minute later there was an awful roar of explosions in that direction, a wall of shooting smoke belched forth in clouds, that rolled like an eruption, and when it cleared all that was seen of the former retreating column was mangled fragments of bodies, or bodies mangled and torn, scattered over y-where those generals having been blown to pieces with their horses, as nothing was seen of them afterwards.

The firing of the attacking foe and their batteries was indeed terrible to take effect at such a distance, and bullets began to spatter against the trees so incessantly, that the little girls thought themselves goners, and what if a high explosive shell would land among their refuge. There could be no Vivian girls afterwards to write about. But the little girls constantly prayed, as did Evans, and no harm as yet came to them. Far in the distance flags were seen and battalions were moving to and fro and several more Christian generals, Hemmings Bonville, and Henry Bantle covered with dust and debris from head to foot were riding toward their refuge, yelling to a force to advancing Nicknellians far to their left.

"Call the main column to go forward as we are winning, though general Rudolph Randolph is killed. Hurry for delay will give the foe time to rally. There is no time to lose."

Three other officers were dashing madly in another direction, the forces of Nicknellians swarming forward at a double quick. Other officers were dashing about, the firing seeming to have abated considerably along this point, or otherwise these officers would have dropped!..... But nevertheless Evans and the others did not as yet dare to venture forth. All around in the midst of all the overwhelming to and fro rush of battle, the little girls had two twice already saw themselves surrounded by Glandelinians and Angelinians together, fighting like maddened demons, bayonets clashing everywhere, and as the Glandelinians were shot to win the little girls before they realized it were seized from behind and carried away. The little girls soon found out that they had been taken by some of general Quincy Angelinians who terribly incensed by the offering loss of so many of their comrades, were nevertheless bound to save the little dears from the clutches of the Glandelinians, who were surging forward like angry waves. Shells were still bursting with earsplitting crashes but the Angelinians with their fair charges and Evans in their midst were hurrying to the rear.

General Nicknell just came up and halting demanded lieutenant Walsh to turn the little girls over to him. He knew that if the foe captured them they with the Glandelinians would treat the little girls as spies and slay them..... The officer obeyed Evans remaining with the little girls.....

"What beauties!" Thought Nicknell to himself, paying no attention for the moment at the appalling Glandelinian attack. "Indeed I never saw them prettier in faint features and looks as they do now and look at their beautiful little arms. And thank heaven that I can see them walking without crutches and ride horses and they use to though they still limp a good deal."

Evans spoke to Violet, who answered and the turn of her head glancing in the direction of the enemy, some of her golden hair golden hair brushing her face.....

.....THE THIRD DAY OF THE BATTLE.....

All night long the opposed opposing armies lay within battle reach of each other Manleys armies having prepared to make a last and general stand though his whole army was shattered, and the success seemed never to come. All night long was spent in retrench work, fresh cannons were brought up and by dawn the foe were ready again to meet the Christian charge which they felt sure was to come. The Christian lines under generals Hanson and Vivian were still solid, heavily reinforced, by the arrival of general Williamsburger Zimmermann's army and his batteries were concentrated in the center. Behind the whole Christian line the shattered stretch of wooded country, which which just the day before had been in possession of the enemy, was still visible, the wreckage of the last two days battle.

The battle field had already extended sixty miles in length, and was thirty thirty nine miles in width....

On account of Huebman Manley's successive retreats, on the afternoon of the second day of battle which had raged seven hours, everywhere, the Christian armies had advanced pretty far southward, the shattered Glandelinian army was apprehensive over the new movements of the Christian army though everything was yet still and silent and preparing for an expected attack made a demonstration to try and convince the Christians that they were stronger than they were for facts and the result was a complete disillusion of the troops who made the demonstration for the Christian batteries suddenly opened fire mowing them all down to the horror and surprise of all the Glandelinian commanders.

At nine o'clock nine o'clock in the morning, an hour after this fatal demonstration on the part of the enemy, the Angelinians started to move forward again under cover of the same artillery fire which had not ceased since it began and which now seemed to blow everything before it. Four hundred thousand cannon being concentrated upon the foe and now the battle was on again in full sway..... Violet and her sisters watched the columns go by talking to each other in soft whispers and the deafening uproar of the distant cannonade, the enemy lines in the distance seeming to be unaided by shell explosions. But to Violet and her sisters these great christian columns seemed to resemble a vast score of multitudes of soldiers advancing to annihilate them for they knew now that the foe would offer more terrible resistance than ever, the Glandelinian fire in the far distance becoming more intolerably oppressive than could be imagined. On pressed the christian columns, bringing speedy success at seeing the shell barrage tearing hellish devastation among the enemy lines but suddenly along the whole gray front there was a frightful roar sounding like the explosion of a million cannon which shook the whole entire country, horrified the vivian girls who heard it and proceeded by a blinding flash, the ten foremost waves of christians dissolved amid the heartrending carnage, huge gaps appeared in the main line and Violet and her sisters hid the scene from their view with their hands across their eyes.

But nevertheless the survivors continued on amid the crashing seething hell of fury the Glandelinians as their piercing yell being again heard above the uproar of firing the whole christian line being torn to pieces. Whole wedges of the Glandelinians also were going down before the fire of the christian batteries, a perfect barrage of shells and high explosives tearing everything to pieces, razing the wooded forest regions to fragments, and silencing many a Glandelinian cannon but amid this roaring inferno of flame and din which moved down thousands all along the line simultaneously, the Glandelinians gave vent to their most bloodcurdling "DEVIL YELL" returned blow for blow, with all their might, denouncing the region for miles and miles, and with avalanches of seething shrapnell, withering nearly the whole of the christian line, which wavered and recoiled, some columns stood, fast and fired, others threw themselves flat and returned the enemy's fire in a perfect storm of musketry that that was incessant, but finally dissolved away the Glandelinians pressing on after them amid a frightful scene of confusion. The whole christian line that made this desperate assault was crushed to fragments driven into panic and confusion and recoiled in scattered columns almost hidden in smoke shrouds the Glandelinian waves pressing on after the fugitives in a human wave and the christian officers who tried to rally them fell dead or wounded.

The whole christian column fell like chaff the advancing forces of the enemy seeming to appear like the very swords of the destroying angles of to thepanic stricken Angelinians, and in a very few minutes mostly all the the ground so dearly gained the day before was crammed with perfect waves of graycoats in pursuit of the panic stricken Angelinians as they retreated across the fields. Advancing rapidly the Glandelinian columns still giving vent to their dreadful "DEVIL YELL" rapidly spread out closing in on general Amos christian columns the panic being terrific....

"To little Catherine creak with all haste." Shouted Evan to the little girls as he dashed up to Violet and her sisters who stood almost paralyzed to the spot with horror at this scene. "It's our only chance to escape this seething inferno advancing toward us!"

General Kindernine fortunately had witnessed this scene through his through his field glasses and hurled great forces forward, with the instructions to their gnera generals to regain all the lost ground at all costs to check the infuriated assaulants and press them back until thepanic stricken lines could be reformed.

As the christian columns came up to the rescue the scene became appalling, the Glandelinians firmly cornered by the new armies of advance advancing death in front became confused, the scene terminated like a forty mile length of active volcanic craters, and the Glandelinians seeking to flee before the murderous assault trod recklessly upon the fallen, the very air was filled with the horrible yells of both sides, cannons by the hundred thousand volleyed and thundered in the most deafening salvos, the earth seemed to rise up in seething eruptions everywhere, the horrible misadventures, and tumults of bayonets added to the horrible pandemonium, thousands of the Glandelinians surrendered, and finally the main gray line rapped and torn drew back in a steady retreat across the flaming fields and plains appalled at the horrible slaughter.

KINDERNINE IS SEVERELY WOUNDED...

Kindernines whole surge pressed on as thousands of raps were torn in the retiring line of the enemy and victory seemed certainly immediately, but but amid the deadly inferno which checked and threw back the impetuous advance of the foe, it suddenly seemed that thousands of gray lines opened up into blinding furnaces, Kindernine went down mangled and blood bleeding, his main columns were riven through and through, and the foe again counter advanced, pressing on like a monstrous wave, refreshed by others and Kindernines surviving divisions gave way before the Glandelinians who were coming on like a regular multitude rushing on to murder them all and yelling their famous war cry so furiously that the worse clamor of the wildest tornado could not do credit. The whole surge came on, shouting, singing, cursing, blaspheming, defying God, shrieking, howling, and yelling like the wildest demons and even the roar of the christian battery could not drown out the awful roar of the roaring devil yell of that screeching avalanche of Glandelinians coming on with the fury of a demon charge, the christians still giving way their lines reduced to remnants. The whole christian line had been torn to pieces the enemy now being overwhelming in strength, which a few minutes which a few minutes before had been terribly overwhelmed by their christian foes and now they poured on with the nose and fury of thousands of waves of yelling demons with the force of a thousand avalanches, at once, thousands of christians were riddled with bullets per minute, the confused survivors were half suffocated by the thick smoke and the ground was fairly paved with the dead and wounded of both sides.... A big force of christians had rallied behind a barricade, but the Glandelinians tearing on captured them all prisoners, strangled or shot many more who would not surrender, and bayoneted the others without mercy. Other columns of christians now barred the way, the fighting being still more fiercer, ten thousand Glandelinian brigades were shot, ten thousand of their best regiments were annihilated, thirty thousand of their cavalry regiments with all their horses were wiped out simultaneously, hundreds of their divisions were riddled with their ranks torn to fragments, and though the main line was checked large columns tried still to advance facing the seething extensive inferno like the brave men they were....

THE CHRISTIANS PRESS ON A THIRD TIME. THE SLAUGHTER GROWS WORSE. ANOTHER REPULSE.

General Francis Hansons lines, extending for thirty miles had entirely disappeared before the terrific christian fire, another Glandelinian column extending for forty three miles had been swept and torn to pieces their general Frangtonia was dead, and the main line facing a shrieking storm of millions of shots per minute, finally gave way again and now as general Roswell Juster, Johnston samies appeared the christians started to go forward amid the fiery uproar, and soon extending along his whole advancing line was an immense immense rolling cloud of powder smoke followed by a perfect avalanche of bullets which added by the storm of shells that ripped and tore through the retreating lines of the enemy caused such indescribable havoc that the Glandelinians became panic stricken, and this enabled Hanson to enable to rally his demoralized men and get them to press on also. All the christian batteries seemed to be in a tumultuous uproar the enemys whole line being rent and torn many columns were mowed down and such a sea of dead and wounded Glandelinians were exposed to view that this fearful unaccountable slaughter appalled them. Everywhere now the battle was raging with the most indescribable fury and amid the terrifying roar of firearms along the enemys lines that again and again blazed forth like the uproar of a million pieces of artillery, the Angelinian columns under general Roswell and Hansons pressed upon the enemy this time with a more awful fury spreading and expanding their lines amid the carnage and in a few minutes the christian waves scores of miles in length which were crossing the elsie lanes were caught in a seething roaring crashing inferno of fire and mangled fragments. The whole Glandelinian army thus engaged though held at bay were not entirely driven back as yet their main line hiding away in a great wall of smoke, from the most dreadful firing yet delivered by them.

But all of the cannons of the christian batteries christian batteries besides the many batteries they had captured and had in their possession roared with more frightful detonations pouring a great barrage of shells upon the glandelinian surge the flashing of a cannon all along the line the being dreadful their main front line was torn to fragments, the advancing christian line dashed fearfully with their own musketry fire and finally the enemy wavered in general's front and the enemy facing vindernine's battalions also received a fierce fire of artillery which obscured all their ranks in smoke of shell explosions, also fell back it being another repulse of the enemy.

THE GREAT FALMS BACK ALONG HANSON'S LINES. BALDWIN'S BATTERIES BREAK LOOSE IN A TURBULENT UPROAR.

Along Hanson's whole line the struggle was still in full swing and even increasing in fearful ferocity the enemy encountering a fearful machine gun fire on the left and also wavered, and now Hanson's column rushed upon them, many of the glandelinians still still holding their guns and these let loose a shower of projectiles, which fell like hail among Hanson's most massive lines his front columns went down into mangled and bleeding and his main line was badly torn up, but still the survivors seeing the main gray columns wavering, swept on the trembling shattered gray columns with their own line bent and tore full back along, from all of the christian front leaving behind great numbers of dead and dying. All of the front columns of the enemy seemed to dissolve as the Angelinians with the cannon they had captured opened fire, yet in their withdrawal the enemy were not hastened though immense divisions of the Abbeasians and Angelinians pressed after them the whole of their many waves of men now charging in one terrible line spreading out in a long surge.

This vast surge was reared into thousands of pieces by the furious fire of the enemy's batteries but nevertheless the christian columns continued to advance pressing the glandelinians so hard that general Manley became apprehensive. The christian batteries were still pouring their terrific broadsides, the blood soaked ground being strewn with multitudes of dead of both sides, in deed, the whole line of battle seemed to be all of dead and wounded. The glandelinians were now in a panic stricken and retreated in confusion yelling and cursing as the long chains of batteries under general Baldwin roared like the Galverinian volcano in eruption. Hanson's columns, musters, and kinder lines despite the approach of a whole line of reinforcements coming to the aid of the panic stricken glandelinians hunched up to make a stand to cover their retreat, continued on in their fearful charge, this whole new line also being pressed back though both sides retain their murderous firing, and in due time that reinforcing line trying gain again, to make a stand suffered annihilation.

The advance of the christian line under general Hanson's puster, and those of vindernine was completely irresistible, and the enemy was driven back for over ten miles most of their designated divisions and columns being scattered, abroad. All the batteries under Baldwin were thundering loud enough to vibrate the battle field, and now for the foe all seemed lost.

THE DISASTER OF THE SUSTONIUS ONSLAUGHT.

All along the whole christian line the battle was raging with the most titanic fury and covered by the fire of general Vivian's main batteries the whole christian surge twenty million strong still strong under general Sustonius, wadice, atus, Gaul and Anglesay made a frightful on onslaught on the main glandelinian center the struggle being something terrible. Incessantly along the whole glandelinian center a perfect storm of death and destruction was hurled upon general Sustonius' divisions. The waves of men under general Gaul being reduced to remnants and Gaul being shot in in the heart only lived a few hours.....his surviving columns falling like leaves in a hurricane from the trees, the glandelinians at this point carrying all before them. The armies under general Catus were simultaneously but hurled back with the loss of their leader, who was mortally wounded, and three quarters of their men. The other christian divisions were still attacking like a wild ocean of raging waves in a hurricane upon a strong breastwater, and general Galverine Hanson on the christian side was killed. Everywhere the crushing shells stripped the trees of their branches sent more trees crashing to the ground than a hurricane could lasting a week but amid the incessant ear splitting detonations of shell explosions all along the line from general Vivian's main line of batteries which made a sound like a million volcanoes in eruption the whole glandelinian center stood as firm as a Gibraltar, sweeping to pieces columns after columns and now general Anglesay received a mortal shot in the lung and fell.

It almost did seem that ten millions of these horrifying disasters and shower of death were not half as bad as the great battle of Francis-Atlanta or, Maria hundreds of their thousands of Anglesay's men were slain his whole line was threatened with annihilation and recoiled in confusion.

All of general Vivian's five to six hundred thousand cannon were in a spasmodic action now which had increased in a fearful manner, being fearfully violent, all of these guns pouring a perfect hailstorm of shell, shrapnell and high explosives upon the enemy, but all this terrific fire and he which dealt such terrible havoc to men by the hundred thousand and felling trees in almost the same number did not daunt the surviving foe who amid the screaming of the shells, and the tumult of titanic explosions, gave the christian waves of assailing men still greater devastation and now Sustonius had only nine million men left, but still he continued the bloody onslaught, the unbroken christian lines streaming on. Hanson's assailing columns having pressed over the enemy's works was now in danger of being hemmed in by the columns of the glandelinians and threatened with annihilation had to withdraw, and during the retreat which turned into confusion he fell severely wounded and the smoke of battle was becoming so thick that the retreating columns which rushed on through it, over burning barricades, through forests of burning trees, the swinging menace of broken burning branches, and tottering tree trunks became lost. But now the rest of general

Sustonius line had swarmed over the many glandelinian works when there came a salvoes of resounding million cannon like volleys, the whole christian advance was staggered, their entire line was in fragments, and gave way slowly all along the line the christian columns having went down into mangled and bleeding for the distance of nine miles alone point their main leader was mortally wounded and the surviving columns as more of the same volleys which outrivaled the heaviest cannonading in any volcanic eruption broke loose again, each as separate volley succeeding each other so rapidly as if to produce a continuous roar like if the world was blowing to pieces, gusts, and now the enemy pressed forward again the whole battle field seeming to be torn by the stupendous carnage. Falling trees were crashing everywhere about the Angelinians rending their way to earth the thick glandelinian wave which was now advancing, extended as far as eye could see, and seeing that these black battled devils were reaching out like several wings, and encompassing the retreating survivors general Vivian sent general Costello, Costello Francis Bonilian to the aid, but these could not gather in time and making a last stand, the Angelinians fought till their number was reduced to fifty thousand, Angelinian to doing his best to cover their retreat but he was soon hewn down from the field severely wounded. Long after this battle so many men had died in Sustonius command alone that it made a hill hills of grave stones with their names engraved upon them when buried decently. Out of that twenty million fifty thousand returned. The dead numbered 18,000,000.

Hundreds of thousands of columns of clear white smoke from exploding shells prevented the enemy from counter charging and now general Costello Johnston's lines of the same number in strength swept into view and made another frightful attack on the glandelinian center supported by general Vivian's batteries which pounded hell out of the glandelinian front, but this vast christian surge was also pounded to fragments, Angelinian, and Jennings Johnston being wounded. There was a terrible outburst of millions of musket volleys and explosions as everywhere.

all along the line which was succeeded by a simultaneous redoubled pandemonium of crashes like the exploding roar of a hundred thousand cannon and from the whole Glandelinian center there came an annihilating fire of the greatest intensity and amid the final outburst of volley fi ring five hundred thousand Angelinians under general Estrabrook melted into fragments, Costello w Johnston was killed and the whole purple surge still almost withered in the face of the enemy's fire recoiled in confusion.

But a fearful withering fire of christian cannon upon the Glandelinians made a sublime uproar from the spasmodic salvos of exploding shells like millions of exploding dynamite sticks, and a devastating barrage extended for seventy miles hundreds of thousands of shells being hurled upon the Glandelinians, while all of the christian batteries on the extreme right wing also swelled to the titanic throes filling the air for many hundreds of miles with the most tremendous uproar overheard in war. Another great force of christians forty million in strength was thrown against the Glandelinian center, but in one quarter of an hour five million five hundred thousand Angelinians were moved down, the survivors many as they were retreating in panic. The main columns however still advanced to the attack with seemingly the most irresistible energy and in the mean general Oswald master Johnstone whole left wing was swept away into inert obscurity, the whole of general Charles Brown's line was split into gigantic gaps twenty miles long, he himself lost all of his staff officers, who were all killed, and he was obliged to withdraw the fragments of his divisions which recoiled in confusion.

THE ENEMY APPEAR APPARENTLY VICTORIOUS AND THE INDETERMINABLE

.....CARNAGE.....

Shoeman and Dickson too on the Glandelinian side was killed their divisions were swept away to pieces and recoiled with the noise of stupendous firing behind them and the general Oswald master Johnstone fell as seriously wounded and was borne from the field in a dangerous condition. The Glandelinian general Benigan Johnstone, was killed and Costello's attack had to take his place. Shoeman's main army which still continued the assault was literally reduced to a mere divisions shattered to fragments, and these gave way in panic and confusion. But other christian columns spreading out with rapidity that was incredible resumed the assault with almost ungovernable fury, but general Costello's men could not any longer stand before the withering fire of the enemy, and hemmed in by hundreds of thousands of yelling, shouting, screaming gray-coated madmen, was compelled to retreat quickly but reinforced shattered the assailants that attacked him after resuming the attack himself. Hanson himself now commanding the main christian center, did not know what to do when he saw how his attacking waves, were so frequently vanquished with such appalling slaughter, but nevertheless he decided to attack in general fury once more. He drew his revolver and said:

"If it's death for us all if we do not force the line of these human tigers somehow. We in the first place were fools to retreat."

The Glandelinians were advancing now at a fierce counter charge, Kindermann's whole line being pressed back, all at first believing that the battle was lost, and were broken hearted and felt themselves over towards to retreat before an even enemy of God. Reaching the shelter of Lincoln gun Kindermann's officers ordered all of their men behind every object of protection just as the madly yelling enemy were coming within range. General Leveson of Scott general Leveson Scott who took Kindermann's place ordered most of the men to use the windows of dead for shelter also, and not to fire under any conditions until ordered.

The Glandelinian batteries were being trained upon this point however and though the range was as yet too short, hundreds of trees per minute were shattered or thrown down by the explosions of shells, and general Scott felt sure that he would not be able to hold. Germaine Cannon Vivian, Jamieson, and Wallen Jennings arrived with their artillery, and when the enemy came close enough a fire was poured upon the foe that melted away their columns one by one, but nevertheless they could not be stopped, and one stalwart Glandelinian crazed by the din and confusion of the battle rushed at Scott who was snorting commands, and shooting down Glandelinians with his pistols. Scott brought him down with several quick shots, the two opposing lines were now like mad armies of demons, the fields in front of the Angelinians being cleared as quickly as they swarmed with the Glandelinians, but the surviving columns amid the tone of toppling trees, which ran knocked off by the storm of bullets crashed among them, tried fiercely and with the fury of desperation to cut the position and general Scott sent an appeal for help.

The whole line of battle was now in a more tremendous uproar the firing of scores of millions of muskets at this section of Lincoln run becoming so intense that the shattered and torn lines in gray shuddered. Most of the main line halted but some of their main columns still pressed onward and onward, Costello's army was killed, and his gray surge annihilated.

But still the other columns as yet did not waver but rushed from field to field, through lanes to lanes, the fury of demons, but the most of general Vivian's short range guns opened a general withering fire which tore many of these reckless columns to fragments and the smoke itself along Scott's lines was so thick that hardly anything could be seen and the whole of Lincoln run was a horrible inferno of wholesale slaughter of Glandelinians.

Amid the dreadful carnage general Scott was killed, General Agricola was mortally wounded, but nevertheless the christians supported by one third of general Leona Bicknell's command still held its ground in that fiery inferno, though the enemy had even struck their left flank a terrible blow, and the gray line was terribly gapped and torn, and the Glandelinians were being driven down, and no many brigades utterly annihilated, that the Glandelinian surge quite retreating although still refusing to retire.

THE FRIGHTFUL STORM OF BATTLE ON THE PLAINS OF LINCOLN RUN THE FRIGHTFUL SLAUGHTER OF THE CAVARLY.

At this moment general Dargers, Dargins, and William Schloeders immense cavalry forces 19,000,000 strong made a roaring charge upon the assailants attacking Kindermann's leaderless forces, holding so firmly on Lincoln run, supported by Scott's infantry. But every line of christian infantry was swept back horribly gapped and torn clean to Tercians on every column was bended, buckled, or shattered, men lay dead in hundreds of thousands, and the two main Glandelinian commanders, Leodonia, and Leveson fell mortally wounded for the reward of their sudden success against the christians.

The immense cavalry forces however continued its maddening charge across the plains of Lincoln Run and it was a wonder indeed how this whole cavalry force survived the annihilating fire of the enemy's musketry and cannon. More than nine million one hundred thousand men and horses were either frightfully shattered or disemboweled amid the awful carnage, through they succeeded in riding through the enemy's lines with a fearful dash, their leader Scholder and Schloeder were killed with their horses, and Dargers and Dargins were dismounted fifteen times as they strove vainly to rally Scott's fleeing infantry fugitives. A portion of the routed cavalry divisions found temporary refuge in a small lane of Lincoln Run which was smoke filled but all these meadows and fields in their immediate front and on the Evangeline at Blue railroad line for scores of miles were now gray with scores of million pursuing glandelinians and they were captured it seemed impossible for the main line of cavarly to stand against even the glandelinian infantry. But great multitudes of fresh Angellian Angellian cavarly and Concontinians were pouring across the region of Lincoln Asylum near Gertrude Run like panic stricken herds, so swift was the charge of the enemy the firing, along the whole line cannons and musketry decimating whole waves of men and horses together. At one point the furious cavarly forces despite their most energetic efforts could make no further progress for a while, but at another point a large force of glandelinians trying to overlap the cavarly divisions suffered complete annihilation. While the numerous christian cavarly divisions were pressing upon general Costello's glandelinian columns who were fleeing Antonio's gunguis swept on with their forces from little Catherine Lincoln Run, to check them but in vain and so fierce was the tremendous cavarly battle, that all the whole fields for miles seemed again broken out into an inferno of slaughter hand to hand. All of the glandelinian guns before this had opened fire a withering fire of such intensity that though the onslaught of the cavarly had seemed to become unmanageable the glandelinian cavarly clashing with them like a legion of enraged angels and demons together annihilated them at bay, crushing each column after column to fragments, scores of monstrous windrows and piles of men and horses of the christians alone being revealed every where.

The front line of the christian cavarly, one million strong however, at the very first clash had been annihilated other columns had been crushed to fragments, and though each checked at last the christian cavarly was impossible to be driven back under any conditions, and the y had struck such a terrible blow that at this point the whole of the enemy's 51,000,000 men had been reduced to fragments never advanced again that day.....

THE ACTION ALONG GENERAL VIVIAN'S MAIN LINE OF THE LEFT AND CENTER ALSO SITUATED ON THE LINCOLN RUN? CAUGHT IN A TRAP AND THREATENED WITH ANNIHILATION. SENGUINE TO THE RESCUE OF COSTELLO.

The main christian line including Hanson's whole line and general Vivian's right and left were almost hidden in wreaths of smoke and flame and now the enemy along the whole line of battle, which seemed to be almost seventy miles long came rushing forward in successions of waves. For a few minutes the christian cannon only blazed away in an uproar fairly to blast the heavens, the violence of the battle now growing worse, then as nine million of the nearest glandelinians came within close range like a regular yelling army of demons, and direct for the Abyssinians, the whole line of other christian batteries formerly remaining silent let loose in a hell of fury, heaven and earth seemed to turn into a mighty conflagration and from the seemingly blazing heavens a frightful storm of shells shattered all the waves of those nine million glandelinians, to pieces and as the carnage became almost preternatural the Costello on the christian side was wounded, but nevertheless was still able to retain his command. From afar even with the naked eye Violet and her sisters noticed this terrible scene and she said to Alice:

"O If Hanson or papa fails to check the enemy and lets the foe get the best of them then after all this desperate fighting our cause will be lost. Costello or any of the other officers do not want to withdraw because if they do Hanson's whole line who is resisting the hardest may be destroyed."

"Can't we do something to save the christian armies from the awful defeat retreating threatening them?" Asked Alice impatiently as the uproar of the firing became ear-splitting. "Well crippled as we are we have got to do something at any cost." Said Catherine. "See how the glandelinians are pressing their attack!" Little Catherine was interrupted by a Evangeline who came limping up followed by little Jennie.

7-762

"The whole christian line will catch it if general Vivian don't receive reinforcements or do something pretty soon." Said Jennie. "As for ourselves we can't stay watching them here much longer, if the christians do give away because we can't walk hardly yet sometimes without crutches and would be captured again. Yet I don't want to see general Hanson's army annihilated."

There was a roar of fire now like as if the heavens were were bursting and Violet and her sisters saw for truth that they were a good deal safer if they did leave this spot immediately as a large retreating column far in the distance was heading toward them, and that their own annihilation would follow when the foe came upon them. After going back many paces Violet quickly placed her glasses to her eyes and then said:

"Costello Vivian is at least rallying, for the retreating columns are going back, but general Senguine McWhirther is in danger of being inflamed and if we remain even within a mile of the spot were are now standing on, we will not be able to escape. And therefore there is no telling, there maybe enemies all around us and if we did not be cautious we would run headlong into an ambush."

The whole entire main line of Antonio's wicked army seemed now to abound in terrific broadsides of field pieces on Lincoln Run, besides gatling and machine guns, and tearing the whole assaulting wall of graycoats along their front to pieces, and while the very heavens seemed ablaze over the whole battle field, Nicknell sent a messenger to general Vivian and Viviananna to inform them of Hanson's danger, as general Hanson's main right wing in the midst of that dreadful dreadful Lincoln Run Inferno was unable after all to be weakened to send reinforcements, that Hanson's right was threatened with annihilation, and that their main commander general Santa Anna Damselanna had been severely wounded by a shell.

The whole line of batteries, all of general Vivian's batteries and all of Nicknell's incessantly threw volumes of shells, the distant hills were wrapped in smoke as if they were newly formed volcanoes in eruption, and though the numbers of the glandelinians were frequently reduced, they were added by others. The advance of the foe was fearful, portions of Senguine's army was giving way, the entire christian front was almost hidden in smoke as the firing grew more intense, but all along the line the enemy were pressing on throwing themselves forward with great fury.

The battle was now at its highest fury along this point. At this portion the earth was torn to pieces by the series of titanic explosions which resembled volcanic eruptions, the gently sloping valleys in the entire battle field seemed to be breaking out into a fierce conflagration, and the scene indeed was terrific.

THE WHOLE OF HANSON'S LINE GIVES WAY.

From numerous low hills, millions of cloudy puffy jets of smoke issued per minute, the glandelinian columns were going down, the very atmosphere seemed to be full of fire and smoke from bursting shells the vibrations of the cannons being indescribable. Heavy waves of glandelinians continually threw themselves with the most greatest fury upon general O'Hanlon's whole line and though surely, but slowly they were breaking through a mid the immense columns that resisted the, a line of one million nine hundred thousand men extending for seventeen miles came upon a portion of general Charles Brown's front rushing forward with the greatest fury, swarming up to the very muzzles of the christian guns and Senguine's columns wavering everywhere amid the constant and furious agitation broke into confusion.

Hanson's whole line was slowly giving way the large forces of the enemy the size of Hanson's division itself continuing on, and now there came an incessant firing of general Vivian's batteries the frightful volleys of shells withering the very forests, causing the earth to rise seemingly into space amid the incessant ear-splitting roar of a barrage of explosions the din driving a hundred thousand glandelinians insane. But nevertheless this immense wave of glandelinians deepened this increasing war redoubled the energy of their advance and fell upon Hansonias retiring forces like a shattering storm of waves do upon a ship stranded on the rocks the whole line of Hansonias army being punched by the pressure of the assault, whole regiments that tried to stand melted away, Hansonias whole line went to fragments, Charles Brown and Bicknell's were severely wounded and Hansonias after the battle made the statement that a hundred horses were shot from under him before he fell severely wounded himself.

The whole entire christian line was giving way but slowly, and stubbornly, and the whole of Charles Brown's army was threatened with annihilation, his command consisting of Hansonias right wing, and the fierce Glandelinians attacking Violette's lines, those of Lindernines, Cannon Cannon, Jennings, Costello and Hansonias Johnston, swelled a welled their lines to an immense stream of graycoats, and fairly yelling and roaring with rage swept on, crushing these christian divisions to fragments, and the survivors retiring heard the appalling truth, that their generals were wounded. A line of thirty million Glandelinians all horsemen simultaneously rushing upon general Penlighlin's forces with the fury of an avalanche down a mountain side, precipitated themselves upon a sheer wall of Abbeemians who in the death struggle slew nine million Glandelinian soldiers and horses, with their cannons, pithing gun, pikes and bayonets, it being awful.

A STORM OF BLOOD AND FIRE. SAME SITUATION?

These assaulting columns of cavarly were now drawn all to their center, during their wild rush, but nevertheless contrasted their flanks, and continued their mad charge, like a horde of savage demons, blinded, frenzied, and insane from rage, forcing their way through the solid christian columns in an inferno of fire, and simultaneously the whole surge of Glandelinians along the rest of the christian line continued to hurl themselves boldly against the slowly retiring purple wall, but their dashes despite them being as swift as a fast as men and horses could go were not progressing as fast as the cavarly columns, their platoons were mowed down by the hundred, arches of smoke and flame sheeted all along Bicknell's retiring line, and it seemed at last as if the savage charge of Glandelinians was stopped, but general Violette's line was broken and thrown into confusion, and the Glandelinians giving vent to their mad "Devil yell" hurled themselves madly toward the still massive christian columns, and now already in all of these retreating christian columns 6,265,732 had fallen, Costello fell. Balhoff received two, wounds which though slight made annoying pain, and unable to retain command general Hanson Evans to his place, and trying to rally the christians amid the furious mixup found that the enemy was curving and shattering the whole christian line, while the dead and wounded were being heaped up in windrows and ridges. Violette was killed, and Maurice Manian, and Francis were killed also at these last two generals being on the side of the foe.

HERCULEAN FIGHTING. W. WARFARE OF TITANS. HELP BUT NO CHANGE?

Now it seemed as if the whole battle field was becoming a regular morgue or slaughter ground, the depth of the assaulting columns being fifty men wide, moving against the christians like a regular shattering storm wave, rushing on in their very fullest frenzy, and the left column amid the furnace of battle at last came into contact with Bicknell's main right wing, but ten times amid the shattering of their twenty mile waves amid frightful slaughter, back were thrown the Glandelinians, their main lines almost withering away amid this warfare of titans.

of christian men massed upon them. At other points of Bicknell's lines, the Glandelinians still pressed on with the most dangerous fury, and now Costello Manleyson was badly wounded by a Glandelinian shell, and borne from the field..... Bicknell's whole line in retreating, was only playing off defeat, for while the main section was recoiling, another portion of his line was fairly closing in on the enemy's left, and now the scene became terrific both sides battling with all their rage. All of Bicknell's staff were either killed wounded or dismounted, and the big surge of gray rushing upon the opposing christians, and during the collision Hansonias after opposing the enemy, for an hour with herculean fury was forced back from the works, and another christian divisions of 8,650,000 strong was shattered to fragments and all of their officers were among the dead and wounded.

By the arrival of general Farnell Lindernine, Cannonias or Cannon Hansonias had gotten out of the inflade into which he had been hurled, but could do no more, his staff of christian Glandelinians, and all the christian officers who dared expose themselves to these Glandelinians were shot down amid the most dreadful of the carnage at this point.

Indeed the frenzied rush of the Glandelinians was now driving everything before it and the furious onrush of general Adele-de-garhe Johnston's Glandelinians though successful in forcing Bicknell's lines still further cost them the annihilation of whole brigades, to that of the multitudes of christians that were mowed down, the christian fire being so terrific that the surging wave of phoebos was torn into columns of woe. Wonderful fantastic shapes like exhalations writhing forward from the devil's house before of these mighty surges of Glandelinians seemed to stretch forth to seize the left of Hansonias columns amid all the fearful musketry and cannon terrapin fire, and volcano of turmoil and deafening roar of hell's damnation. The Glandelinian losses were indeed frightful, as their columns were being mowed down like chaff, but still the survivors came on furiously. Adele-de-garhe Johnston was mortally wounded, Jennings Jensen, Frank Smigtonia, Johnnie Johnston's Glandelinian generals were killed in this frightful inferno of flame and din, Accountants on the christian side was wounded, and accountants of the Glandelinian side was dangerously disabled, general Leavenand Francis his chief staff officer on the christian side was killed, and Penline Johnston though painfully wounded refused under any conditions to leave his command and command. Sherman on the christian side received a ball in the hand but wounded severely as he was he remained in the field though his staff of all ranks were going down by the score.

HANSONIAS WHOLE LINE IS THREATENED WITH ANNIHILATION. ANNIHILATION OF SEVERAL LARGE GRAND DIVISIONS....

A long Hansonias retiring front the Glandelinians with terrific demon like fury continued their insidious advance and pursuit, and now the whole army under Bicknell consisting of Hansonias center was fairly crushed to fragments and driven back there as a was a demonical orgy of sounds, cannons by the hundreds of thousands roaring as if all the mountains of the whole world were volcanoes and stationed together in this one battle field, machine guns, whirring and shrieking, and with their pop-pop-pop-pop-pop-pop-pop-pop-pop-pop guns of knuppt and centimeters thunders thundering and roaring in millions of different scent accents, at once, the very atmosphere seemed to turn to smoke fire, it seemed as all the world were seized with a conflagration, and possessed with legions of earthrearing explosions, in perfect salvos the hill tops for miles seemed hidden in clouds of smoke of hundreds of thousands of giant explosions, that seemed to split the earth the valleys and wooded regions for scores of miles seemed seas of fire and smoke and undated by hundreds of thousands of explosions, the livid remnants of the earth, trees grass and everything visible seemed to wither and fly off in the fiery blasts of shells and shrapnel, the whole world whole world seemed threatened with destruction, and yet again over all this wild pandemonium of wild unearthly tumult dominated the frightful "DEVIL YELL" of the assailants as they rushed on into this blasting sea of musketry and barrages of cannons of all descriptions.

Contello, Picknell's Christian line of one million men had been annihilated in this fierce fiery conflagration of battle and also Cannon Jennings and Anders the same strength singly and these generals with one hundred and fifty others of lower rank from colonels down to lieutenants were borne from the fields seriously or mortally wounded together while sixty one others were killed.

Most of the purple coated columns on Hanson's left was a tumultuous mass of men that soon fell back in tremendous confusion and the huge extravagant stretch of withering, yelling surges in gray rushed furiously in pursuit the purple columns of Glandelinians pouring on seemingly indeed to complete victory the whole surge being impelled forward by the thought of success like a tremendous tidal wave of humanity.

The next Glandelinian generals to fall were Romayne Johnston, Melding, Kinderrine McAllister, and Benlipan McWhirther. Whole divisions and grand divisions being annihilated on both sides, and so terribly reduced was Hanson's whole army that it seemed certain to be dear destroyed, if the terrible advance of the foe was not checked, and Post-Elloes lines of two million, on Picknell's ragged center was almost hemmed in by the great columns of Christians and he was finally forced to surrender this surrender indeed leaving a big twenty mile gap in the line of the advancing foe. But fortunately it was at this moment that the jagged Christian lines still retreating was suddenly being reinforced, and an attempt was made by the Christians to rush through this gap the firing increasing to redoubled violent violence.

THE ENEMY HELD AT BAY AT LAST....

All along the line the battle was raging with utmost fury appearing indeed to be one of the most spectacular battles ever waged. All of the Christian columns were now rallying again, and along general Picknell's front the enemy seemed to be retreating, the Picknellians pressing after them, and pouring in a fire so terrific, that the multitudes of retreating Glandelinians became seriously handicapped and fell back in confusion, before the fierce advance of Picknell's columns but the rest of the gray line, except along general Hanson's, it left, which was still retreating, was at a stand still being held at bay. Along Hanson's main left not as yet reinforced, the Glandelinians under general Vivian Germanie kept up their marvellous activity which had increased to a more fearful carnage as Christian reinforcements suddenly came.

From over all the fields, valleys, lanes, and meadows, fearful numbers of the enemy had poured with indescribable fury, but their many columns were now swept to mangled remnants and for a time the Angelinian reinforcements seemed to be having everything all their own way, but as fast as these Glandelinian swarms were swept clear from the meadows, fields and lanes, into dead and wounded, other surges poured across, but it seemed in vain. In vain scores upon scores of columns in one long line swarmed against the massive Christian front they were only rendered asunder or crushed to fragments by the raging Christian fire.

Many of the surviving surges recoiled panic stricken, across the bloody fields, lanes, and meadows, but still other columns of the foe driven insane by the brain tearing din rushed on with fearful hopeful dashes, and leaps toward the Christian line only to plunge recklessly to their deaths as they were all mowed down by the machine-gun force.

Surge after surge, column after column, of Glandelinians sweeping over these exposed regions were wiped out completely, but again and again the Glandelinian waves assayed with the fury of desperation to cross the Lincoln gun forming like monstrous packs of gray demons, but dwindled away into countless fragments the carnage being still more appalling. Time and again before these successions of violent onslaughts the left wing shuddered and staggered like a drunken man, tumbling into a post, but nevertheless stood its ground firmly, descending column after column, until their own line was riven to pieces by the continuance of the dreadful onslaught and the dead and wounded piled in heaps. But not a single part of Hanson's line ever gave ground again that day though time and again his left heavy with the weight of the pressure of the onslaught was bent backwards, but as reinforcements were continually arriving the line that was bent back by the had long sweep of the enemy, was more like a slithering back, only to fly forth when released the onrushing purple columns fairly borrowing themselves into the massive Glandelinian surges arriving the field at the point of the bayonet, decimating whole armies with their advancing line of musketry fire, and sweeping the Glandelinians away like chaff.

THE MASSACRE COMMITTED BY THE CHRISTIAN CAVALRY UNDER GENERAL BAREMORE.

During the time when the enemy's assault Hanson's lines were jarred so wildly and when the Christian reinforcements arrived general Francis Jennings Baremore's cavalry of eighteen million men arrived, a portion of this cavalry dividing a large part of the pursuing Glandelinian army by the whirlwind line like maneuvers, caught Hanson's worse assailable on the main flank forcing it upon the bayonets of Hanson's men in front with terrible slaughter, and in another minute a whooping billow of Concentinian dragoons pounced like a roaring avalanche upon their central flank right along the whole length, and these unfortunate Glandelinians were borne before the Angelinian cavalry as if before a terrific cyclone of exceedingly great violence.

In the meantime another portion of the cavalry poured over the fields with their thunderous roar of horses hooves making another clean sweep of the enemy's flank. The gray line twenty million strong thus being closed in by the cavalry was shattered, many ranks of men being trodden down under the horses, each cavalry division striking the Glandelinian forces so tried to rally a terrific shock.

The Glandelinians were like a ship aground, another cavalry force catching them on the front center, and hurling them foremost upon the lances of the cavalry in the rear, the frenzied sweep of the Christian cavalry causing many columns of the Glandelinians to break into a panic. Most of the twenty million fought their way out but the sixteen million still encompassed fought stubbornly against the cavalry, forcing, breaking their lines again and again but it was in vain.

Their generals were going down one by one their many columns were broken all to pieces and all seemed lost.

But they refused to be taken prisoners and as the Glandelinian batteries were roaring with increasing fury, and seeing their own shells exploding among the cavalry forces, with ear-splitting detonations soon took courage and fought the cavalry furiously, amid the thunderous tumult but before their fierce attack one column after another of the Glandelinians were rapidly reduced, the cavalry time and again crashing furiously among their shattered ranks, the unfortunate and foolish Glandelinians indeed fighting until they were all literally slain. It was a literal massacre but it could easily have been avoided, if these foolish Glandelinians would have given up given up and surrendered. General Condonia with his army of sixteen million men were completely annihilated by the cavalry it being probably the fiercest scene of the battle with cavalry forces, and infantry, against each other, resembling a whole nation of cavalry, massacring a whole nation of infantry. In the meantime the whole of the enemy's army of Glandelinians which had previously assaulted general Hanson's and Vivian's and the other Christian lines so furiously had met thousands upon thousands of broadsides of shells which ripped through and through, and through the main Glandelinian surge but nevertheless it stood as firm as a Gibraltar and as general Vivian's fresh columns rushed on, they relieved avalanches of broadsides from the Glandelinian chain of cannon, which as the assault increased with redoubled fury added by general infantry fire which again became like the roar of a hundred thousand cannon, the thousands of Glandelinian shells in their shrieks making a noise like a screaming typhoon tearing over the Abbeysian shores.

The yelling of the furious Glandelinians was deafening, the very heavens seemed rent with the Glandelinian "DEVIL YELL" all the nearest columns of the Angelinians were being mowed down like snow melting on top of a furnace, while whole divisions were badly shattered and shot to pieces, the battle seemed to be at white heat, the whole ridges of woods were ablaze, the whole Christian line was yielding again and the titan thrice of battle, and the foe began to press on again, but as the Christian columns were falling back they met on all sides disordered groups, and were forced to make a stand to cover their retreat.

The losses on both sides was incredible, but the accurate numbers were not yet known, forest fires had been started by the musketry firing itself and so many millions of trees were split and broken by the crashing shot, shell, and high explosives, that the ground was strewn stream six to eight feet deep with foliage, debris and branches, and the region of Lincolnian and Lincolnians which were very extensive had hardly a tree remaining so many having been uprooted, by shells, or gnawed off by bullets during the firing of both sides, when in the battles raging in these regions long before all that was done to the trees was a slightly marring by bullets and shell fire.

The immense christian divisions on Lincolnian and Lincolnian had been annihilated making the christian loss at these section as 11,972,000. In killed and wounded while the Landelinian loss generals reported the christian loss as 39,900,000 making a combined loss of both sides in the battle in this section as 51,872,000 in killed and wounded.

GENERAL VIVIAN'S TWO HOURS DESPERATE STAND

It was already ten thirty and every bit of general Vivian's line was now reinforced. The Landelinians were still advancing and attacking, and retreating, and rallying, and retreating in series surges, storming the christian lines under every available commander I can remember, and all of the Landelinian and christian batteries were still in general action both sides seeming to be shrouded in flames and smoke, the roar of fire of cannons was redoubled as more was brought up, and the fury of the battle was also redoubled. But most of the christian infantry lines fired so furiously that it seemed as if the ammunition would be exhausted. In the next assault it indeed did seem that the Landelinians were advancing with a fury that seemed as if it would break through all obstacles, the screaming torrent of shells tearing through the Landelinian surges, ripping them to fragments moving down columns at every broadside, pouring the torrents of shells faster and faster the blasting fury of Landelinian firing assuming its most deadly and disgusting and destructive results, increasing the carnage and rendering more fearful the Landelinian losses.

As the Landelinians advanced on their dead and wounded, was fairly heaped up, every rank or column fairly exposed to the batteries melted away and thousands upon thousands of Landelinian columns, pouring across the fields were shot to pieces, but on came the survivors, mowing the christian works only to dissolve away completely.

But in vain did the stubborn christian cannoners blow them down, or try to drive back the assailants,...

SHOFMAN AND BICKNELL TAMERLINE DRIVES HARD AGAINST THE

.....CHRISTIAN LINE.....

But nevertheless the tip seemed to be seemingly uncontrollable avalanche of men pouring across these fields was before the main battery, fire of general Vivian's artillery, like the read before the whirlwind, the ranks of Landelinians were mowed down as fast as they swarmed into the fields, the artillery fire carrying all before it.

"Behold it is the advance of Shofman and Bicknell Tamerline's gray surges, coming on in overwhelming numbers like the black hattered devils they are." Shouted general Vivian himself. "Stand to your works at all costs and do not give way until given orders to do so. It's a trick in my mind to accomplish, and giving way too soon will blunder and cause a most horrible disaster. And I'll shoot the first who retreats without my orders, no matter who he is or how high in rank."

Fifteen large surges ten million strong mingled with the fifth corps under Shofman was rushing forward seemingly unchecked this night of attack filling the Angelinians with treacherable awe and dismay, but nevertheless they were unafraid and opened their machine guns on them, though the infantry remained silent. Indeed the whole gray surge that was advancing stretched away as far as eye could reach but some of the columns were already shifting and wavering in their awful advance, though at every movement the main line looked frightfully ominous. All this while the christian fire increased in fury being echoed back by the fiercer and stupendous and sharper detonational uproar of the storm of exploding shells. The whole entire line of christian batteries blasting forth in a most terrific manner, making a most indescribable and intolerable clamor. Even in the city of Antwerp, many hundreds of miles away the concussion of the cannon fire shook all the windows out, of the buildings, roofs saved in, thousands were killed by falling houses and the people thought it was an earthquake that heralded the approach of Antwerp's eruptions..... Several of the enemy's main line of advance, trembled from their losses but the surges of Landelinian Landelinians were now spreading out into many separate divisions and began to suddenly rush forward with the fury of a frenzied multitude of demons, though the nearest columns became frightfully mangled, and the entire main line with an uproar of yells, sounding like a hundred million demons swarmed to the very musket range like a surging tidal wave, there was a frightful roar of musketry all along the christian line that sounded like one shot and which shook the earth a volcano of flame and din all along the line, and the waves in gray dissolved in three score like an execution, the nearest panic stricken survivors driven insane by the sudden ear-splitting crash of musketry, driving on madly, swarming over the works and among the christians fighting like madmen only to be hurled back in remnants, the whole line of waves being at stream three deep with the Landelinian dead and wounded, the main line was staggered, cut up, and reduced to a thousand fragments, Bicknell Tamerline was wounded and a frightful panic ensued among some of the nearest columns but Shofman and Leonia Bicknell with accountants and general mash in the head mash in the head tried to rally them with threats and commands the nearest columns in their precipitate retreat dashed madly, pressing furiously, crushing against the other or running blindly toward the christian line, trampling each recklessly over the fallen, amid yells, curses, yells of defiance and hatred toward God, gorans, horrible blasphemies, and sudden shrieks of confusion and rage. Through the avenues of shattered trees of Lincolnian, swarmed forth the immense crowds of panic stricken Landelinians, many fearing that the flight would mean a horrible disaster tried to rally their comrades, while there was yet time, some rushing into narrow orchards, some taking refuge in the Lincolnian, and other houses, and the parks, seeking shelter of any kind for protection from the awful terrors of annihilation, but nevertheless the main line though staggered did not as yet retreat, but continued the frightful onslaught with redoubled fury, while cries and fiercer yells of derision, hatred, defiance and bewilderment resounded from all sides.

From christian officers came the wild cry: "The enemy. The enemy. They are beating the Angelinians in the extreme left wing back."

"There is no falling back along this line." Said general Vivian grin grimly shaking his fist in the direction of the enemy. "Slacken your fire boys, and wait until those screeching cursing, blaspheming fiends get nearer. Then give them another good volley."

General Vivian and his staff knew the dangers produced by this kind of a Landelinian charge, was which was probably the main one of the battle, especially if any parts of the christian lines once gave way in confusion, and by of the advancing foe in his front should they overlap his extreme left, and decided to stand like general Vivian and the rest if he had to destroy nature to do so. "We must stand. We must stand. Or we will be doomed to annihilation." Said general Vivian as lieutenant general William Bell was borne from that shocking inferno wounded. "We cannot retire now or we will lose the whole battle. Mark you crashing batteries and shell barrages. See you charging surges in gray coming on like a storming typhoon. Not a moment is to be lost. Hear their crashes of musketry. It sounds like a million crashing thunder rolls splitting the earth."

Some of the christian columns belonging to general Vivian's shattered command were moving forward with a threat to demonstrate or counter charge mowing down the Landelinian ranks in shameful numbers, but already so furious was the onslaught of the enemy's thompson's lines were still torn, that the christians started a clattering fire of great intensity and violence, the officers ordering them to stop until ordered to fire. The angelinians were encompassed with horror at the first catastrophe of this appalling attack they had caused among the foe, the attack of which was now complete in fury it being an awful hour of slaughter indeed. The landelinians rushed forward with the same great noise and fury of maulin yells and blasphemies and curses, the fiercest of the main glandelinian surge pouring upon the christian line, only to entirely disappear when the christian musketry fire came in a simultaneous storm and once more in the midst of this terrific inferno the surviving gray surges torn to fragments, sprang back, the smoke of canister and shrapnell seeming to close them in and their two genera is, Frank astrabrook, and astrabrook wailen were killed.

The firing on both sides was now becoming general and more fearful than in any other part of the past two days battle, the dead and wounded being fairly heaped up in that smothering inferno, but the rest of the main line though staggered a second time still continued the attack, pallidians artillery mauling their columns until ten million lay strewn upon the ground.

GENERAL VIVIAN PRETENDS TO RETREAT!

In the meantime general had pretended to withdraw his main center and now confident of victory the Glandelinians pressed through the wide gap, eagerly intending to turn the other two wings of general vivian's army, but general vivian had now reformed his center, the other wings had almost closed up the gap, general vivian himself pressed forward in a roaring counter charge, gaul pauntletted the panic stricken Glandelinians in a sea of cannon and musketry fire, killing thousands every minute, and hewing gaps by the score, cutting down so many Glandelinians that confusion reigned everywhere. Hundreds of thousands sought vainly to hold back the onrushing purple coats their dead and wounded fairly paving the ground and their main columns already reduced to fragments, became panic stricken and fled, premeditatedly. Hundreds of thousands tried to rally under the shelter of thick clumps of trees the face of the fugitives being pale and harrowed, thousands surrendered, general shoeman was dead, and the remainder retreated in a conglomerate of confusion.

THE CRASH OF HELL, DURING THIS GENERAL ONSLAUGHT OF HAWLEY'S ARMY.

Along the whole lines of hanson's vivian's, hanson and robert vivian and the other others the clatter of musketry was abated, but the general crash and uproar of cannons was redoubled and knowing that this great fray was only the forerunner of a general onslaught which had started general vivian at general vivian's warning reformed his lines into an impenetrable wall of men, the firing of his own batteries of cannon becoming so preternatural that the retreating columns of landelinians who were ambushed could not be completely rallied. But as all could see hawley's whole army was advancing, hawley having thrown forward all his force forward at the beginning thus accounting for the terrible fury of the battle pallidians batteries continuing their vivid and booming roar committing awful havoc but now the landelinians were coming on in magnificent array that is those that had not as yet received the shock of the christian fire, like the other two main columns had, and during the whole battle now there was no pause in the awful firing of artillery, the roaring of the christian batteries all along the line being mingled with the grinding and hissing roar of hundreds of thousands of thousand exploding shells.

The glandelinian columns now moving against the lines of christians that had not received them as yet assumed vast and mighty lines of smoke striding fiercely in their herculean attack, shaking or rending the air with their most horrible bloodcurdling "DIE!" "DEVIL YEELS!" and bat battle cries in a general tumult that was deafening. As the smoke cleared all along the whole line of christian artillery, the glandelinian waves that were nearest seemed to vanish swiftly, but the other landelinian columns of this gigantic surge divided into two sea separate wings, the outburst of this onslaught striking with utmost fury against the heros christian front which held stubbornly though at first a portion of valiant gray divisions came near carrying the works on his extreme left, but without the protection which the main line of assaulting glandelinians could have offered them they could not hold the position they had captured and were soon driven back with horrible slaughter.

7-386

Along general vivian's and vivian's vivian's lines there was a such a tumult as the two forces closed that it seemed as if the whole elements of all civilized worlds in all the past and future were combined into one, the firing of distant cannons were redoubled, to ten fold fury, a rush of hundreds of thousands swept by general vivian's left grand division of batteries, many of these recoiling were wearied despondent and bewildered landelinians unable to see anything on account of the thickness of the smoke driving through and among a portion of vivian's batteries despite the storm of canister and shells dominating the region everywhere but finally realizing their danger and seeing no escape these landelinians especially of those who survived and surrendered.

All the mighty and deafening noises from all of general vivian's and hanson's batteries all along the entire christian line, their frightful torrents of shells, and high explosive, and shrapnell thrown upon the attack ing glandelinians and the hurst and awful billion cannon like roar, of the fiery and fierce eruption of thousands upon thousands of mine explosions and munition store blowing up seemed to redouble in fury again there was a conglomerate fury of hellish sounds enough to drive all heaven insane, but yet the landelinians came on yelling their same vehement devilish cries. Then all the christian machine guns let loose their hose like torrents of canister and millions of bullets, and the foremost portion of the landelinian wave was shot to pieces in no time, Jack vandine's gray line broke upon general Jack Evans' forces and positions like a storm storm wave in a typhoon, samuel francis palize, advanced to their aid and also james costello's regiment and the firing soon became so intense that the very planets of the whole heavens seemed to be in a seething uproar of flame and din extending also along wienstone's, heros, and vivian's lines, with preternatural fury and above the stupendous roar of millions of muskets, which drowned out every other sound, and reverberated among the distant hills, in millions of echoes, broke the crash and of flame and din from vivian's one hundred thousand cannon, and through all the awful cannonading and musketry fire which vibrated with the most horrible crash and uproar of hell, the glandelinians charged on, struck the whole christian line like the waves of the sea broke into thousands of fragments, receded, rallied so stormed on, struck the christian line a blow that staggered it, the firing swelled to a terrifying and most indescribable uproar, the glandelinian waves reeled back, rallied and plunged into the inferno once more.

Samuel Francis Palize on the glandelinian side was killed, his own men went down in many multitudes and the dead and wounded lay in monstrous windrows. Confusion was ensuing among a nearly the entire line of christians, shells from the enemy's batteries crashed through their massive lines, causing such havoc and confusion that horrible scenes ensued, but these retreating christian columns, were reformed and banged the enemy's assaulting columns to pieces, obstructed the way of the other assaulting columns, and increasing their mad musketry fire to terrifying fury, many columns of columns of the landelinians and even tens of surges receiving a furious fire, that tore them so that few fragments were on ly left, but still the surviving forces continued the attack, with a still their violence swarming on and on....

To add to this immortal carnage heros had placed ten million angelinians in front of francis-atlanta, and the same number of cavalry men in a large field, but at this point neither force could retain their position here the frightful onslaught of the foe disconcerted them, and the sudden collision into which they came was doubly terrible, but nevertheless the retreat was slow, and the enemy received four times much more losses, than what they inflicted.

THE INEVITABLE FOLLY OF THE GLANDELINIAN ADVANCE. TERROR AND DEATH STRIKES EVERYWHERE.

The assault though hurried back at many sections was again resumed after a fourth rally, the two monster forces again contending with each other like two great armies of demons, both sides firing at each other so steadily steadily that the carnage was spread still more the enemy attacking in serpentine and irregular waves, rushing swiftly against the christian lines, that there was a fearful roar all along the whole christian front, there were sheets of orange and stupendous dull streams of cannon flashes, there was now a continuous exploding roar like a trillion cannon blowing to pieces, thousands of volleys tore the assaulting waves to pieces, the ground shook beneath the contestants from the concussion, there being a titanic uproar everywhere that seemed to tear to pieces the whole battlefield, a simultaneous trillion cannon like roar and crash of musketry resounded all along the line in front of the main surge completely withered, and many a column or division melted away. Indeed amid the appalling uproar which echoed and rebounded everywhere the enemy's solid line was fairly shot to pieces, their men were still falling in frightful numbers, but still the assault continued, the carnage increasing to tenfold fury, the fearful roar of the christian fire fairly increasing a further times louder, everywhere there was deafening detonations, the enemy's left withered, many more columns dissolved away, the whole line was shattered into huge fragments, and yet the survivors recklessly continued the assault, the christian shells bearing down on everything in their path, sweeping away whole fields of men, turning the whole battle field in a fierce fierce battle storm, and amid all this mortal folly, gave forth yells, of derision, rage, and defiance.

The terror of death seemed to strike everywhere, and though the shell fire opened large gaps in the christian line they were closed again. An unearthly uproar had already fallen upon the air, such an uproar that it sounded like ten million volcanoes blowing themselves to pieces, in the one battle field. Two of the main monstrous surges of the Glandelinians extending for forty miles, each singly wavered amid the increase of this awful uproar, recoiled, rallied, only plunged again into the fray amid a long continuous uproar of cannon and musketry the mightiness of which no language can describe, recoiled back in thousands of shattered fragments, recovered rushed on, fell back, shattered to remnants, and again rushed on crushing themselves against the christian line with the fury of demons, while over all the scene rushed forth another, and another, and still another volume of white smoke rolling on, another and another, and another and still another, and another such indescribable scenes presented itself and part of the christian line wavered and recoiled back, but still held, the foe receding again, only a little.

Desolation was everywhere, seas of oceans of dead and wounded, wounded Glandelinians paved the ground, lay piled up in mounds before the christian works, cumbered the lanes and fields, lay strewn in windrows or ridges all along the christian line.

The courage of all of general Hanson's men was beautiful to behold, fate favored them with victory for their daring, and defeat already stared Manley in the face. Hundreds of thousands of surviving Glandelinians were deafened for life, and almost blinded by the hellish deafening uproar.

Phelan Jennings was wounded, few of his staff were left, poor Nero was seriously wounded, three generals were all there worthless to Manley, and they more badly wounded than himself, who was as yet able to retain command and general Jennings reported to general Manley that one quarter of his own army was down. Whole lines of his men were now rag fragments, the enemy was still attacking and hell seemed to possess the atmosphere everywhere.

Most of the panic stricken Glandelinians who were still retreating, grouped in the shell shelter of ravines, amid the frightful uproar, and tempest of shells, others continued to flee, but the main columns continued on, the uproar of the firing now abating somewhat, until the foe again came within close quarters, then again came a most frightful burst of musketry fire, and the running waves spreading among the fields, arrested the divisions of christians who were in confusion, and the assailants driving in at the christians once more met the same terrific fire and reeled terrified at the gasping forms, of hundreds of thousands of the wounded, and by the splitting detonations of the shell shells....

THE FRIGHTFUL BATTLE PROGRESSES WITH INCREASING VIOLENCE AND REDOUBLED FURY...

The enemy however had rapidly recovered from the shock they received recoiled from the christian fire and swarmed forward a sixth time, the firing being in full sway. This attack of the enemy presented a frightful spectacle as they swarmed forward in roaring billows, and now all the lanes, plains, fields, and lanes, for sixty miles displayed the havoc caused by the furious christian cannon, the increasing of the carnage shocking the mighty multitudes of Glandelinians, never before were the faces of wounded men seen so a haggard, the whole battlefield was littered with seas of dead and wounded, and far forests were burning.

Through the whole surge of Glandelinians the musketry, shell and musketry storm tore, and now now as the enemy again swarmed against the christian works, there was one blinding flash of musketry after another, astupendous continuous trillion cannon like roar resembling a most awful terrific explosion blowing the earth to pieces, that seemed to rend the heavens to bits, and though waves after waves of the Glandelinians were shot to pieces, before this simultaneous volley all along the line, and recoiled others came on anew roaring in preternatural fury from their return fire, mingled with appalling screams, as many thousands of men per second were torn by the balls, and rolled and writhed upon the ground, then charged on, became galled through and through, away and gave way only to resume the attack with redoubled violence, the clouds of smoke from thousands of exploding shells being wafted far and wide over the entire region.

The whole region even behind the christian line was littered with their own dead and wounded, many of the prostrate bodies being officers, who did not escape that awful shower of bullets from the enraged Glandelinians. They lay dead or dying. The other columns of the Glandelinians still on, the same awful flash and uproar prevailed everywhere. Jet off fire seemed to shoot from the christian cannon under Baldwin his batteries pouring the same steady barrage of shells and high explosives, and almost half of the assault assaulting forces of the main line of the enemy along Vivian's front was dissolving into dead and wounded, but the survivors under general Jennings Haterine came on, recoiled in panic, rallied, drove on like wild deer, could not be confused and tore the christian line, only to be staggered back again with excruciating losses, and amid the dreadful carnage, and wailing cries of many of the fallen who did not escape the surviving Glandelinians continued to sweep on in gray billows, their own lines fairly blazing in an inferno of firing, sweeping down whole masses of christians, only to be crushed in return.

All along the whole christian line the assault was continuing, and again and again the enemy's lines were torn asunder, and wavered, hundreds of their officers going down, the terribly terrible booming sound of cannon and crash of musketry stunning the multitudes of Glandelinians, their lines seemed to open into hundreds of large gaps and seemed engulfed in a vortex of smoke clouds and flashes of exploding shells.

Along the main left wing of general Vivian's front the assault of the enemy was still fiercer, the awful uproar of the battle had redoubled the christian lines were obscured in thick wreaths of flame, the entire general christian line storming with a wild withering fire of the great east intensest intent, the christians themselves were enveloped in the smoke of exploding cartridges the large surge of Glandelinians came on relentlessly crashed upon the christians line and gaining the mastery denied the christian front, a winning a temporary advantage, but nevertheless failed to break the main christian line and though the line impetuous onrush of the foe was checked, the whole of the enemy's main line came into view, struck against the christian line like a tidal wave, and then only to reel back in fragments.

Yet the other surges came on, and though they were again shattered forced to recoil other perfect waves in prayer went to it with all their might, and it was well that the armies under general Vivian retained its ground so stubbornly, general Bicknell Barry more Glandelinians rushing again him, and thought first there was fearful peril of his men, being overwhelmed and annihilated, he stuck like a Spartan hero that he was, massing his hundred thousand can con upon the assailants in simultaneous action, with the christian musketry cutting the Glandelinian surges to pieces, annihilating general Jennings' columns, and destroying general Bicknell Barry's right wing, and his hurling his main line back crushed to fragments, and in the wildest confusion.

ANOTHER HERCULEAN ADVANCE CHECKED AND BEATEN.

All of his Angelinians had the frenzy of a single idea. They must stand shall check and throw back the appalling wild onslaught onslaught of the terrible columns of Glandelinians who still rushing forward like swarms of wild demons. It looked as if all the nations of the world had come together in wholesale carnage, whole forests of trees were shattered, but still the avalanches of Glandelinians continued to sweep on amid the perfect orgy of devastation, the distant fields at times flashing into ghastly lurid sheets, as sharp as flashes of lightning at night, the very hills covered with the christian batteries seemed to have broken out in eruption, the whole sky was enshrouded in smoke, and the din was more terrific than before.

Despite all this the enemy still came on, the whole christian front formed on along line of flame and millions of bullets tore one wave after another of the Glandelinians, but still the reckless waves of Glandelinians came on, pouring against the christian line like an immense torrent, many whole multitudes of Glandelinians continually cumbering the ground.

MORE TERRIBLE SLAUGHTER AMID THE FIERY CONFLAGRATION OF BATTLE.

For over two hours already the terrible attack had continued, both sides were enshrouded in the smoke, which was pierced by hundreds of thousands of vivid jets of flame, the ground in the christian front and everywhere within sight was now fairly packed with the dead and wounded purple coats themselves, but they struck to their works, the christian fire honeycombing the Glandelinian columns with gas gaps the assailants being thrown flying back, but nevertheless rallied again, and though the progress of their advance was for a time checked, the furious energy of the main columns became so great at other portions of the line of assault, that these Glandelinians reached the works, swarmed upon the christians with horrible fury, and pouring above poured in a fire, a great uproar was heard for the distance of fifty miles. Both sides delivered this terrific fire simultaneously, there was a nightmarish volcano of flame and din never described before, and the Glandelinians advanced in this terrific fire, and intolerable havoc among their surging lines, began at last to give way slowly, but all the columns did not take to flight, but kept up the attack, the rest were rallied, and general Germanine Bicknell coming up with thirty million men the uproar again became so terrific that a thrillion cannon and muskets combined seemed to lose their concert of hell. Immense fresh columns of christians, that arrived just at the right time and formed into strong reinforcing lines pre-propagated the effects of their destructive fire for the length of their entire battle line, and by this terrific fire Germanine Bicknell's whole entire line was torn to pieces, many columns of the other lines dissolved, multitudes lay dead or wounded, and the rest seemed swalloped up in the smoke, but a seventh time the onslaught was resumed. Forty large divisions of Glandelinians were partly destroyed and the first line of the nearest assailants, coming within close quarters of the christian lines four miles in length, were honeycombed with gaps, hundreds of thousands of the graycoats had been killed, a proportionate number of small armies were almost annihilated or cut to pieces, and the discharge of the heaviest cannon checked the onslaught of the survivors only for a moment, then they came again with great noise and furtive fury, the whole line of gray itself emitting uncommonly ominous clouds of smoke and vivid jets of musketry fire, rushing on in perfect streams.

But now the firing all along the christian line became so terrific, that for some more moments it was able to stop the progress of the Glandelinians, though the first main surges had managed to break upon the christian line amid the tearing to pieces of their line, which like at Glorinda Francis Anna threw both them and the christians into a complete confusion simultaneously.

The main Glandelinian surge however still came on representing an awful spectacle, as a struggle in heaven with all the wicked, in hell on the point of victory, only to be hurled down into intolerable slaughter, but still the surviving Glandelinians pressed on with such vehemence that a portion of general Veldon's Schleeder corps were almost annihilated, for their brave stand Veldon and all his brave staff having fallen, Nelson's Vivian among them. In this furious onslaught the Glandelinian managed to break a portion of Baremore's fieldings line, but amid a furnace of fire at the same moment, the divisions under general Julio Padulacame to his support, and the firing along this point became so terrific that for a time the Glandelinians were prevented from penetrating any further, the battle increasing to still greater fury, Bicknell's main columns sweeping on as if intending to carry all before them, but his columns were by counter charge driven back to a distance of five hundred and fifty feet, the width of this charging avalanche of men being seventy deep and was reduced to ten deep, with the loss of lieutenant general Michael Francis Smith, who was killed, generals Gabriel Johnston, and Raphael Manning, being also killed, while generals Joseph Hadley Johnston, John Joseph Joseph, and Peter Baptist were mortally wounded. Violetta Baptist the daughter of Bicknell Padulacame's command was killed, his Glandelinian division annihilated and Padulacame himself was wounded, his army shattered and recoiling in the greatest confusion. General John Peter fell mortally wounded, in front of the christian works, his line in gray was shattered, general Paul colonel was killed, and lieutenant general Andrew James and John McWhirter, and John McWhirter were wounded, and major generals Thomas Fallon, James Thompson and Phillip Bernardson were killed. Of Bicknell's main right general Bartholomew Hargerson was killed, general Matthew Simpson and Simon Camp, and capt. Peterson Johnston, with Kempt Thaddeus were wounded. It was an awful loss of Glandelinian generals.

The fury of the battle was frightful, and all the columns that came on with their extraordinary violence and alacrity was decimated, and never was there ever such an uproar heard in any battle before and the enemy which was 81,564,238, strong continued the frightful onslaught attacking the christians all along the line with the fury of a hurricane. General Bicknell was killed, general Luther Barnabas was a hero shot to death, in the melee, general Luke Depie was killed, and Fatsbrook was wounded, while generals Stephen Colonel, general Vincent Lawrence, and Jenson Daniel Vincent were severely wounded, while Fatsbrook and Sebastian Colonel were severely wounded. It was awful the loss of so many Glandelinian officers. The attack of the enemy was in full swing, column after column hurrying to the attack and all the while along the whole christian line the extensive volleys of muskets and rifle rifles, thousands of broadsides of machine gun s, was stormed upon the surging fray waves accompanied by incessant crashes of cannons and a most deafening thunderous noise which was compared to a continually firing of a hundred thrillion cannon firing off simultaneously, and more than that many pistols and revolvers. Johnston and Pauline Vivianaria, Glandelinian generals were killed in front of the christian works generals Cosmes and Panania fell almost in the arms of picknell Shoeman, generals Garvarie and Protase and el Sylvester Henryson were killed, with major generals Gregory, Ambrose colon el., Ambrose Ma for Augustine, Jerome Marten, and Nicholas Crowley, while general Antonio Anthony Sanders lost a hand and a leg, general Benedict lost his head, and both left legs and arms, while general Bernard Johnston had his very insides torn out by the fragments of a shell, Dominic and Francis Logannia were mortally wounded, Amosstead was slightly wounded, and picknell Shoeman himself had a bandage around his head. The Glandelinians swelled by fresh troops spread their surges far and wide continuing their attack with still greater fury.

FRANTIC EFFORTS TO CHECK THE ENEMY.

4 S. Eighteen million was directly advancing against general Viviananna's main center and amid the destruction of whole whole sections of their number, the firing making an uproar a million times louder than the worse eruptions of Mt Calverine, but still the great columns of Gln Glandelinians thr thr threw themselves forward, with great fury and a frenzy that seemed uncontrollable. But still the assault of the enemy did not stop. The attacking columns continued to advance sweeping up to the very muzzles of the christian guns with the greatest fury, only to meet with such terrific slaughter, that they were appalled.

General Adele-de-garbo Laytor is, on the Glandelinian side, fell headlong inside the christian works, his head being split open by a shell fragments, generals Thomas Mc-art, Arthy and general sergeant Johnston a with Jennings Frank Smith were also killed and general Joseph win Hennishi ones fell across rayr Laytor's, Noertine Smith was wounded, Anthony C Dressel, and Jackson Mc-art, were also wounded. Nevertheless the surviving Glandelinian columns continued the onslaught, the battle now raging in full sway the Glandelinian columns were shot to pieces time and again and general Harrison, Lester of the enemy fell mortally wounded. Kellerher Richardson, and John Jai Heithington were killed. Russell D.C. Andrew Mc-Huge McHerbertson and John H.C. Latchanford were borne from the field wounded. Major general Wehr Fern-coed and general Theodore Benna, and Johnston Joseph, Callen Lukazeurshe were killed. Edwin Knapp fell wounded immediately afterward, and Wendlen Musche and Louis A. Miller fell along side of him.

Along the whole christian line the Angelinians made frantic efforts to check the enemy, to stop their attack, the losses of officers among their lines was terrific, Angelinian waves were badly broken up, many columns dissolved and still the assault continued with unabated fury the vastness of their columns increasing the anxiety of general Viviananna whose batteries were already exhausting their efforts and a uniting a uniting but soon the steady losses horrified the assailants who wavered only a little this already being the ninth rally.

General Viviananna in the meantime had sent a message to general picknell to charge the retreating Glandelinian columns with all of his men not knowing that he was wounded, and his army badly depleted with its frightful losses...

THE CARNAGE RETAINS IT'S FRIGHTFUL FURY....

But thought recoiling the enemy they only rallied and came on once more with fixed bayonets. The living went to yell as deafening as the shrieks of a cyclone. The enemy's columns of advance had now formed into a long line a sheet of flame swept their ranks there was a most terrible and awful stupendous roar of musketry, and then in brilliant long surges, the enemy fell upon the seemingly unvanquishing lines of purple coats, only to be crushed back with hundreds of their columns fairly withered, but simultaneously general Viviananna's already shattered line received a perfect storm of shells and high explosives from the enemy's batteries, which grew worse and worse every moment, but still the Angelinians would not yield their ground, but kept up their mighty roar of musketry but still the enemy increased the fury of their assault, pressing the assault with redoubled fury while simultaneously along general Viviananna's line under Viviananna there was suddenly an unusual roar of musketry, proceeded by awful flashes of all kinds of artillery, this terrible firing increasing minute by minute, and the din now could be heard for more than five hundred miles.

The vast lines of christians held their positions stubbornly and even spreading their lines to keep the furious fire of the enemy from picking too many of their men at once. But on and on came the broad lines of the enemy like an advancing avalanche overwhelming themselves with the most terrific fury upon the whole christian line, but more progress than before, their surges forming an average breadth of seventy men deep, and moving with the yell and fury of a tornado against a Kansas town across the shore swept open ground, and still and still on the Glandelinians came forcing their way through and over the log barricades simultaneously, tearing and cutting the purple lines frightfully, but again two of their best generals Mackenshire, and goose-canna Oosensia fell, and losing courage and filled with consternation these Glandelinians recoiled....

SOME OF THE FIRST OF THE DEADLIEST CARNAGE OF THE BATTLE!.....

Yet nevertheless the main portions of these advancing enormous columns under Ketrabrook, reached the retreating Glandelinian columns, thrown back by the terrible fire along the whole christian line, and now the enemy redoubled his exertions, striking in waves against the christian lines, and though again and again their waves were torn up and mangled, the survivors while hot with fury, continued the onslaught with the most frightful fury and though the losses caused by the increasing carnage was more enormous than we could ever imagine or conceive, fifteen of the largest surges of in gray rushed upon the christian lines as swift as they could, but again their divisions seemed to dissolve as fast as they came on. Along general Viviananna's entire line immense masses of Glandelinians during the furious increase of the frightful carnage, rushed forward in waves after waves, and forced their way up to the very christian lines, striking and closing with the fury of titans, the vigorous energy of the christians were redoubled, though portions of their lines forty miles in extent was bent backwards, by the impact the frightful firing mowing down one hundred twenty six thousand per quarter of an hour all along the line..... All of the Glandelinians were attacking scores of those awfully big columns advancing furiously to overwhelm the christian line, but every one were cut to fragments, by the terrible christian fire, every volley of musketry and cannon committing incapable damage.

The battle had redoubled to still greater fury, the incessant uproar extending all along the line of battle, but still more fresh divisions went into action, the Glandelinian surges withering, resuming their charge, hewing their way through the christian lines, again compelled to withdraw, again rally, recoil, rally, attack and storm with fury, general Viviananna's saying over and over again

"When will those blasted Glandelinian devils ever know when they are licked!"

The whole line of battle seemed to be in a blasting furnace of fire all of the Christians striving with their utmost fury to drive back the terrific Glandelinian assault, and it indeed did seem that both sides were intending to annihilate each other, the uproar of firing still retaining the same fury that made it seem as if the heavens and earth were being blown to pieces at one time.

DID CONTENDING ARMIES OF DEMONS, AND ANGELS EVER FIGHT LIKE THIS, AND REFUSE TO ACKNOWLEDGE THEIR DEEPEST DEFEAT
AFTER REPULSE AFTER REPULSE!.....

Whole columns of men on both sides were dissolving, the surviving Glandelinians still attacking with the same untiring fury, and never before during the first two days of this bloody carnage, the struggle being now like a hell of fury, and a general hell tug of war, both the massive Glandelinian surges swaying back and forth like angry storm waves, and even the torrents of the hundreds of thousand shells exploded with an incessant ear-splitting crashing uproar, so that at times the nearest discharge of 100,000 cannon along general Vivian-Anna's line was completely drowned, and six hundred heavy calibre cannons had already blown up from overheat ing, out of a single battery of a thousand Christian guns, making a louder crash and uproar. The Glandelinian main line of advance which had shaped like two hideous gray wings, was now shattered to fragments, the appalling attack being crushed back, for the tenth time and it hardly could be possible that the war with general Lucifer, and general St Michael in Heaven could have been as terrific as the battle of Francis-Atlanta, or Anna-Maria.... The whole Christian line was again heavily assaulted, the surviving Glandelinians attacking on the eleventh time, this time with incredible fury the uproar of the devil yell this time being formed drowned out by a freer roar of musketry, which was far worse than any indescribable number of volcanoes in eruptive eruption. Although this one hundred mile line of Christians had now held their series of positions for over three hours since the general counter assault began and continually poured a storming fire the Glandelinian waves attacking the Christian line in the vicinity of Francis-Atlanta had rushed instantaneously with incredible rapidity and fury, against the Angelian works and would have certainly carried all before them along general Vivian lines on Lincoln Gun, and an annihilated both the whole crippled armies of general Hanson and Vivians and even picknells, had not general Hanson's large reserve forces permitted the enormous surges to rush into a deadly infilade, which crushed them back with intolerable slaughter, and with the death of general Shoemanna Johnston Jensen, and Caltonni a Hondros. But even this favorable circumstances did not in the least exempt general Vivians extreme left wing under general Jenting Anle, Anderson from the almost disastrous effects of a terrific shock from the Glandelinians under general C Calmannia Shoemanna.

A STORM OF SLAUGHTER....

The left of this almost irresistible Glandelinian wave which had crashed itself against the main Christian center, swept in forty-twenty mile surges against general Vivians extreme left, under Jenting Anderson with the same fury the most frightful tidal waves did upon the shores of the islands devastated by the eruption of the Krakatca volcano, the whole line of Jentings forces was swept and torn to pieces, and this millions millions of hell-damned and damned fury, millions fell, Jentings was morally mortally wounded and the rest of the line was thrown into confusion, before a rally staggered the enemy.

The battle indeed was raging at its whitest fury here, the enemy's forty columns or surges being also swept to pieces, but as quickly as they were confused, as quickly did they rally and return to the assault with utmost precipitation and in this frightful melee was the Glandelinian general's pursuit, Johnston, Lieutenant general Francis Johnson and Jennie-Anna were killed, each receiving a fatal shot in the head. The horrible scenes of this battle field exceeded all description. It was a scene of slaughter. Amid the incessant uproar of battle, no intelligible could be heard but the shrieks of the millions of wounded, sighs, groans, prayers, and curses. Hundreds of thousands upon hundreds of thousands had been killed on the Glandelinian side alone and millions of wounded in only this mere fatal extreme fury of the herculean struggle along the left. Hundreds of broken ammunition wagons lay everywhere, with every one of the horses, their masters and cannoniers crushed under them. Even many of the unfortunate officers after the battle was found, with broken trunks, backs, shattered arms, lacerated a torso, and with whole bodies smashed and mangled. Many of the officers were even found, with broken necks or crushed skulls, or headless bodies, vast holes in their bodies, and their intestines protruding. Scores of officers riddled by bullets and cut to pieces by canister and shell fire lay where they fell, some with sides of body or faces torn away, and wounds of dead men lay in front of the Christian workworks almost buried on top of one another, and bathed in blood.

It was a regular crimson tide, the sight being too fearful to describe in long detail, and still the battle raged. The most fearful sight of all was of the largest proportion of general Hanson's army, which had lost over 11,566,000 in that fatal three hours in the afternoon. At no point whatever was the foe giving way, it seemed not only impossible to check the advancing foe but to even stop the enemy's progress in Hanson's location, though division after division was sent against them, and though the enemy would be forced to withdraw a few portions of the line they would only rally under support of the main Glandelinian batteries which gave the Christian lines great desecration. It certainly was awful indeed to see this.

THROUGH BLOOD AND FIRE ONCE MORE.

And where was general Williamsburger Zimmermann's army, which Violet had requested to come by note? Why did he not come? All now depended on him and yet no Zimmermann came. The Glandelinians had now resumed the assault with odious horrifying, and deafening barbaric oars. Devil's Falls the mouth of hell seemed to have engulfed the whole battle field amid the awful slaughter, and the Glandelinians rushing forward with the fury of a hurricane, struck again with such furious precipitation against the Christian line, that another unchristian front was shattered frightfully, but despite the furious charge the surviving instead of giving way, held firmly counter charging, forming deadly infilades, and storming with fire, again and again the Glandelinians broke through a portion of the Christian line only to be wiped out with great loss, and though things were becoming more complicated than ever, general Conventinian Aronburg made a counter rush with his divisions with a fury that was beyond description, finally checking the foe, and the terrific struggle was still fiercer, but he and Ricknell Thompson fell severely wounded, and were borne from the field. At many sections before Aronburg's charge the Glandelinians had given way before a new fire of cannon which shattered their line, and which mowed down multitudes, but the giant columns and the brown tremendous carnage only drove on again in the face of a withering withering fire. Cannon Ricknell and Aronburg's lieutenants on the Glandelinian side being killed, the twelfth part of the assault being at its height, the Glandelinians seemed to be attacking with irresistible force, but again and again their columns were torn to pieces, or crushed by counter charges, and meeting a perfect hurricane of bullets, the assailants saved for a moment only to rally again the batteries on both sides blazed with unwonted brightness, the shells crashed everywhere in a storm of explosions, then to leave the region, threatening to go into the fearful turmoil if they did not. They reluctantly obeyed, Violet protesting that he never thinks of himself at all, but only of their own safety, and wished him and themselves with him in heaven right away. They loved him so.

A regular sea of dead and wounded graycoats, own exposed to the horri horror of the little girls, only a short distance away, the noise we even so far from them in the distance seeming to come from millions of volleys with a roar as if the whole battle field was a long erupting crater of some mighty volcano, and gladly from sheer horror and terror they left the frightful scene behind. Three hundred thousand landerlinian shells in the meantime had been poured upon the christian lines anew, multitudes of the christians were slain, their whole line was bathed in an inferno of blood and fire, and it indeed seemed impossible if they could much longer stand before the attack and despite their energetic efforts Viviananna's left had been overwhelmed twice by the glandelinians who screamed like millions of demons, and though hurling the overwhelming columns back the situation seemed critical, and all the officers were over anxious about Zimmermann's delay.

Along general Ricknells line under general Sandal, the attacking line of graycoats though galled through and through, a hundred times still seemed to extend beyond the length of the christian line, and tremendous, most horrifying and odious were the yells, screaming, and howlings of the glandelinians as they attacked with the same indescribable ferocity, recoiled with shattered columns, by the hundred, reformed, swept forward to be mangled again, and indeed Sandal had no idea of the almost preternatural fury with which these Glandelinians could throw in their frightful onslaughts and infuse in their deafening and appalling voices of fiendish rage, cupidity, and derision when giving vent to their famous "DEVIL YELL".

Thousands of columns tore at the christian line while yelling at the utmost top of their voices, recoiled with the only remainder, reinforced came on again, receded, resumed the attack, overwhelmed, and Sandal left in a headlong onslaught, went back in fragments, advanced to the attack again with their devil yelling rising so furiously that it sounded like a million hurricane forming into one, the full force of each impact, though each gray wave were swept back each time in pieces, was terrific enough to throw the christians into confusion before a repulse, whole lines of christians were either shot to pieces, or annihilated, the enemy's main lines were also ripped and badly torn, held at bay, and then resume the attack, became honey combed with gaps, recoiled in panic and confusion, the whole three wings of Sandal's three grand divisions seemed bathed in a furnace of musketry fire, wipe gaps and seemingly networks of smaller ones appeared time and again in the very christian lines making the lines seem split to fragments, the very heavens were hushed for six hundred miles from the far reaching dreadful reverberating clamor, the enemy resumed the attack again and again, in thousands of monstrous masses, that was only swept back and no one can conceive of the almost unearthly violence of this great battle, which filled all the hills and valleys hundreds of miles from the battle field with countless millions of deafening echoes. The noise of the battle was horrible enough to deafen those in heaven as it seemed, millions of glandelinians sweeping forward, only to fall in hundreds of thousands at every rush, the fourteenth section of the onslaught being as it seemed at its highest fury the christian fire piling the glandelinians down ridges high.

Fifty yards from where Violet and her sisters were crouching, watching the greatest of battles ever seen yet, a big explosive went off, with a blinding ear-splitting detonation, the little girls having been thrown head over heels by the concussion, their crutches being shattered by the storm of earth, loose stones, and debris scattered everywhere, their hair was filled with gravel, their clothes were dirtied, their ribbons were gone, but they escaped even the slightest injury, though the problem was how to get along now, without the means of crutches.

But Evans made them some rudely made crutches out of the bare branches of trees, which did them for a while.

Just before the whole line of the enemy came into sight of the christian fire, the battle became a great massacre, and then reports came that general Viviananna and all the other christian generals besides general Hanson and Vivian had been forced to leave their headquarters on account of the enemy's almost preternatural artillery storm, also had been driven from Snyder's barns by the near approach of battle, and then general Viviananna was reported to have received a severe but not dangerous wound, while the uproar of all the battle along the whole line, made it seem as if the world was coming to an abrupt end. But could this report be true!!!!!!

AN AVALANCH OF HELLISH FURY....

General Vivian had taken possession of a large barn in the rear of a half ruined brick house formerly owned by people known as the Schoeder, the woman's husband and sons and best friends being in the war on the side of the glandelinians, having been driven here by the near approach of battle and the deadly shell storm, the walls being unindented with pictures of children some whose names, read, Mary Glanck, Dolores McColister, and so on probably taken from Snyder's barns and brought here by the unknown owner after the battle of Gloria Francisanna. General Vivian had planned to check the enemy and his wild onslaught by making a counter charge in full force, overlap Federal Henryson's whole line and sweep the assault back, but most of his best generals in here with him, even the one who really owned those pictures, refused furiously to follow this without Hanson's orders to do so, saying that he alone could make out some means to check the enemy, with out it resulting in disaster and the loss of the stubborn battle.

In the meantime around the town and everywhere else to the surprise and alarm of them all, as constantly as thunderbolts in a severe and violent thunder storm, shells were also beginning to explode, the south wall of the western end of the shed was suddenly shattered to splinters, the roof was ripped away simultaneously, the glass in the windows shattered and door thrown out by the concussion. The first swarm of pictures at the same time had been sent flying out a side door by the crash, and two generals were killed, all the guards annihilated, and the rest forced to leave this barn also. They were all outside in an instant, general Vivian went about as if he had gone mad, all jumped on their horses just as they saw a cavalry force in purple dash past on fiery steeds, there was confusion and excitement, the barn and ruined house was becoming a furnace of fire, the ear-splitting roar of battle approached nearer, a shell exploded near Vivian's two of his generals dropped, there was a flash far behind a geyser of smoke and an ear-splitting roar that seemed to make the earth shudder, with horror, panic stricken men came rushing from all directions, peals of deafening rolling thunder from high exploded explosives, shook down the burning structures from which the pictures had been saved from the concussion, there was a wild gallop of a horse coming from an opposite direction amid this avalanche of hellish fury, and general Hanson came dashing up, as a shell burst killed a colonel, wounded two generals, shattering the blazing wreckage in all directions and amid the wild conglomeration of tumult he shouted

"For heaven's sake, the battle is lost though the reinforcements are coming.... Williamsburger Zimmermann.... is advancing.... with all haste..... I observed.... his army through.... my field glasses." "Well, I knew the enemy cannot do anything." Said general Hanson the owner of the rescued pictures, riding up and down along the rear of his own stubbornly holding lines amid that shrieking roaring inferno in a passion of joy, just as another shell exploded among the turning wreckage of the buildings scattering blazing embers all around. "I was I who took violet's appealing note to general Zimmermann before it was taken by the foe, when the messenger she sent with it fell mortally wounded. I knew that if the foe got that note, we would be beaten, for Zimmermann would not come, as the foe learning Zimmermann's intentions would guard against his advance. I got back here an hour before Zimmermann arrived."

"God cried general Anson his face lighting with joy, and shaking hands with the brave Abbisannian. "Go and sent twenty boy scouts to signal Zimmermann our situation, and to hurry him before our main line is broken."

THE CONCLUSION OF THE BATTLE OF FRANCIS) ATLANTA, OR ANNA) MARIA.

Those twenty brave boy scouts went without flinching and general Vivian watching the frightful scene, and starting to go back to the firing line was horrified a few minutes later, to see nineteen of the brave fourteen year old lads all beautiful lads brought back dead, and badly mangled and shot to pieces, and the twentieth lad Francis Vennith Casey mortally wounded. He was able to speak however and said between gasps;

"W-w-e-w-were-----unsuccessful. Th-th-the f-f-f-r-a-f-i-r-e of the e-s-enemy i s h-h-horrible. T-t-thousands of officers are slain. T-t-the G-g-g-landelinians a-a-a-are c-c-c-carrying our---w-w-whole center, t-t-the s-s-s-signal station w-w-we u-u-used was---b-b-b-blown---d-d-d-don---down---u-u-u-under---u-u-us-----and)---" He could say no more but fell back in a faint.

"Let us go and signal Zimmermann!" pleaded Violet.

"No indeed." Said general Vivian wheeling sharply upon them. "Evans you watch them. If they are killed or injured and in general will Vivian and Anson will hold you responsible with your life."

Violet and her sisters still insisted but general Vivian himself came up and hearing them said sternly and even angrily; "What is the matter with you little girls lately? Are you going crazy or do you want to commit suicide? No and don't remark about going again. We absolutely refused to let you go so don't say anything more about it."

"You little dears will have no chance to go anyway." Said Evans himself. "For my sake, and God's don't be foolish. Those boys as you have seen with their little lieutenant has been sent your uncle not expecting the tragedy and see the result. Had he known this to happen he would have sent men or gone himself. Why you can study on those dead boys. The station has been blown in the air by a mine as a witnessing officer told me, and every one brought back in this condition."

EVANS DOES THE SIGNALING HIMSELF!.....

Evans himself while Violet and her sisters were protesting with their father and other generals went to the nearest signal station, quickly ascended to the top though a tempest of minnie's moaned in furious concert around him, unfurled the signal flag and started waving it. A solid shot struck the staff hurling it in fragments out of his hand, but unfurling another he had with him, he waved it frantically, but a shell crashed through the side of the signal station ripping and rending the timbers, with a most dreadful noise, but before the inevitable happened, he got an answer for he saw in the direction

Zimmermann's army was supposed to be coming, a different flag waving in rotation which the meaning he read;

"Have seen signals before and know what situation you are in. Am coming slowly to distract foe toward your lines. Large forces of my army under Francellie moving on Vanley's flank. All will be well."

Just as Evans had descended after answering back a high explosive shell brought him sprawling to the ground by the concussion, the station was blown to bits and a crater dug where it lately stood.

"Gosh but - had a narrow escape." Gaped Evans staring to his feet and stumbling back to the region of the burning house and barn. "If I had stayed on it much longer I would have been killed."

He reported to general Vivian who was shouting and directing orders, about what he had received in answer to his own signals and Evans for this daring feat was looked upon by Vivian and her sisters as a hero hereafter.

THE FINAL ISSUE. THE AVALANCH OF SLAUGHTER.....

Many of the assaulting columns were still torn to pieces by the christian fire some were recoiling the main line had reached the christian works both sides seemed now to storm with a preternatural fire, that mowed down thousands upon thousands, all along the line, the whole battle line was hidden in smoke, the din of the firing seemed as if the molten matter inside the entrails of the earth was forcing its way through the crust in a titanic eruption on the whole battle field, the nineteen million assailants wavered, reformed, stopped the christians as they rushed forward in a counter charge, the whole battle now became a blinding hellish uproar, the enemy's main line seemed threatened with dissolution, while most gigantic through out that awful carnage and the cannon and musketry fire which swept them like the most horrible storm of hell, the landelinians resumed the fierce attack, their whole line was cleaved to shreds, recoiled, but once more to the horror of the christian generals attacked, the main entire gray surge striking and plunging against their christian forces, though honeycombed with gaps, and raked through and through like a fine comb so does hair, still pressed on battling like demons to win, and over the works poured the surviving columns of the foe in violent agitation, but the death dealing christian batteries which had slackened their fire on account of being overheated cooled rapidly and again let loose their horrible cannonading thunders in a perpetual crash the whole gray surge pouring over the works withered, hundreds of thousands of others fell, the appalling circumstances of this immense line of batteries withering score of landelinian surges and throwing the survivors back in the wildest confusion. Even the horrible cannon fire along the other parts of the christian line was at its highest fury, but still the dense columns of the landelinians continued their assault with extraordinary ferocity, the fury of the continuous onslaught now being more frightful, the firing grew heavier, the survivors came on, more fresh troops swelled the landelinian armies, and general Vivian seeing the danger brought all his remaining forces into action, swept back the landelinian columns again and again, but still the landelinians retained their furious attack, our partisans Melrose and an ideal christian being among the wounded.

The terrible battle now seemed to be drawing to its highest fury, the Olandelinians though swept down by hundreds of thousands continued the attack, whole columns extending for scores of miles were almost annihilated as they closed with the Christian line, the very air above the batteries of cannon seemed riven by their heavy action the surviving Olandelinians continued the attack and now as all the Christian columns which had been in confusion were now rallied there came a fire as from the very insides of hell and there rushed hundreds of thousands of volleys making a simultaneous hundred trillion cannon like roar as before the gigantic columns of Olandelinians torn to pieces wavered, fell back, rallied rushed again at the Christian line once more reeled again, and resuming the assault while all along the line the fields were covered with fields of dead and wounded and never before except in Morinia which was soon coming was there ever such a battle fought which had swelled to such a frightful extent and the worse about it was that it increased and continued to increase without pausing a single moment now while before there had been a repeated lull.

Whole divisions of Olandelinians were repeatedly being shattered hundreds of brave officers had fallen the surviving Olandelinian surges continued the attack with stupendous violence breaking the Christian center into many parts, then after three hours more of preternatural fighting the broken center was reinforced the Olandelinians wavered in general, a general opinion thought it over, but again the assault was resumed the Olandelinians rushing forward in grand array the lancers, first, the dragons and cavalry battle lions next and the infantry, the carnage was still more fearful the purple line became a long stream of fire which roared and thundered with maddening fury, the whole of the main gray line was swiftly following the whole battle field became a worse inferno, the decimated Olandelinian surges were swept on-----to their deaths, the surviving

Olandelinian Olandelinian surges or crashed through the center of the purple line ripping it to fragments, general Joseph Popcorn was killed, Julia Pirrie was mortally wounded and the fragments of Olandelinian divisions were scattered in all directions the whole gray surge was wavering having been struck already by the flankers, Stanley mounted a second time but again was unhorsed, the onrush of the Olandelinians was being checked at all points now by the arrival of general Zimmermann's forces picknell Johnston was killed general Bennett Shearson was badly wounded, a Washington was killed in trying to rally a shattered Olandelinian division Cannoni was seriously wounded Murphy Marletoni was also killed, general, general Gillie was wounded and John Joseph Jamption was killed while Federal Tamerlinia was riddled with a thousand bullets. S. Smith Pyne was wounded, a shell exploded near general Johnston Stanley, the fragments tearing his horse open thus dismounting him again the general was thrown a hundred feet by the concussion and he was slightly wounded. Bicknell Johnston and picknell Johnston who was killed was a general serving on the Christian side not the enemy, all his staff was down, Olandelinian columns were being driven clean back to their main line of works which was carried, he himself was killed his Christians driven into confusion, Shoemans Christian line was annihilated he himself was badly wounded, the fields were now ashen of purple Zimmermann's line of action was also shattered, he himself was dangerously wounded, the whole Christian line was being shot to pieces the main Olandelinian surges came on once more general Estrabrook on Zimmermann's right was killed, Adels-de-garbe Francis was severely and dangerously wounded, his whole side being torn away by the explosion of a shrapnell, but still the main Christian line held like a rock. Through her field glasses Violet could see that the whole attack was at its highest fury, she saw that the whole attack was at its most murderous fury the enemy attacking with all their irrefragable fury and the shells were exploding now like a storm of daminating destruction.

In the meantime general Jack Evans mounting his horse hurried to the rear rallying all the retreating Christian columns that he could manage, and then he came upon the preternatural crashing of the distant firing which was echoing among the far distant hills mingling with the uproar of the wild Olandelinian "DEVIL YELL." He had passed the first glen and started on the road to the ferry to bring them to the defeated Christian lines when he saw Violet and her sisters standing at the northern end of the glen watching the fight from the hills.

"You little girls in the worse of this battle regions and God help you if you do not take my advice and get away," said Evans almost sternly. "The battle is at its extreme worse now and you little girls are in a dangerous location. You must go or I will, though it hurts me to say it make you go by force to save you. Come now or if I'll take you rudely on my horse and go off with you immediately. And don't be foolish. Why worry we will win. Come. Come or I'll take you any way."

Even as he spoke there was a blinding crash of thunderous salvoes from a line of bursting high explosives or Olandelinian shells that seemed to shake the very earth and echo in all the mountain regions with awe inspiring grandeur, and Jack Evans and his sisters were hurled from their positions.

A TRAGEDY FOR OLANDELINIA.

"You little girls in the worse of this battle regions and God help you if you do not take my advice and get away," said Evans almost sternly. "The battle is at its extreme worse now and you little girls are in a dangerous location. You must go or I will, though it hurts me to say it make you go by force to save you. Come now or if I'll take you rudely on my horse and go off with you immediately. And don't be foolish. Why worry we will win. Come. Come or I'll take you any way."

Had it not been for the anxiety of the outcome of the battle Violet and her sisters would have enjoyed the outcome of the greatest battle they had ever seen. They had seen a battle like it, like its wild grandeur before, and they went with Evans not of their will either but because though he was a great friend of theirs, and their guardian and his words and commands just the same had to be obeyed by them.

Just as they all saw something like a long line of separate thousands of gigantic eruptions mingled with screeching detonations a shudder ran through the Olandelinians. Would this terrible battle battle never abate? Panic stricken Olandelinians were now seen flying in all directions peals of deafening thunder from more volleys of shell shook the ground the blinding flash of firearms was more incessant and in the midst of it all they heard the wild gallop of a horse suddenly coming up the road down which they were riding and springing up in his stirrups General Vivian saw general Vivian himself coming looking very pale with excitement and almost lit up with joy.

"What is up?" exclaimed Evans start stretching out his hands to him. "Are you hurt?"

"No Jack. Dear I'm not hurt." Gasped general Vivian. "But there has been an awful clamor among Stanley's army and now the whole command had struck against our whole line in the mightiest onslaught every seen seen or what could ever be conceived before any body, and his whole command is now in shreds whole fragments, and we are carrying a' all before us."

Another officer at this moment came up his parched lips seeming hardly able to articulate, his breath came in short gasps, and the cold sweat stood upon his forehead while his eyes stared wildly as if still seeing some awful sight.

"Come tell us what happened!" Demanded general Vivian.

"The storm of battle is sweeping your whole left wing back with mortal fury, and threatening it with annihilation, though they are doing their best to check the frenzied foe, and as I was passing that regions throw a horrible flash it blinded me followed by an ear splitting roar that shook me from my horse, the whole line gave way, Zimmermann's army is crushed to fragments, five hundred of his officers are down, Vivian is wounded, Maconia is wounded fatally and general Vivian is really wounded, dangerously wounded, and oh it was horrible. I shall see the looks on their dying faces till my last day."

"Here drink this. My two main commanders mortally wounded! Good God how can it be!"

"Yes and they say Zimmermann is more seriously wounded than any of these. No! Williamsonburger Zimmermann. But Francis Zimmermann whose side is torn as well as a shell, and you can see his horrible lunge and other entails. All of his officers are down, but Main Zimmermann cannot halt the enemy's advance at any point his army is dislodged into one quarter, the whole line under Manson is giving way instead of the enemy as you thought and the battle is really and has honor honestly to goodness and truthfully before God himself lost. We are doomed to annihilated annihilation for most of our army is trapped in a big ambush and cannot escape. Hanson Vivian your brother is also severely and dangerously wounded. General Jentien's army and Phelan tanks are annihilated and General Vivian's is being destroyed. Oh God but it is horrible. It is all the truth general for God can strike me if I'm lying before you and your beautiful daughters."

General Vivian stood white as death a look of unutterable horror and anguish on his handsome face.

"Oh God," he murmured. "The war is lost. If it had been some body else than Francis Zimmermann Williamsonburger and my brother Hanson Vivian. Oh it's horrible."

Then suddenly turning to General Jack Evans who still sat in his horse with down cast head he exclaimed:

"I will go back with you General Evans and try to rally them. Even if it has to cost our lives. My main center is still holding. I might be able to rally the rest."

"I think it is exceedingly dangerous for you to go back into such a storm of carnage," said Evans. "But if you intend to go or to do so, to do so you must have another horse. As your horse is exhausted already."

General Vivian tucked onto his new horse and soon went on out into the frightful storm of battle with three generals. On the horrors of the next few hours, the anxious almost hopeless attempt to rally the panic stricken columns, officers adding their number to the body strewn fields faster than the Glandelinians generals who had fallen, amid the thunder of hundreds upon the hundreds of thousands of shells, that seemed to dam up the battle field in a storm of destruction, the flash and roar of the ore cruel battle lines in gray, the lung lines and masses of great trees crashing to earth, the fury of hissing canister tearing tearing everywhere, breaking twigs and sticks, General Vivian's horse was prostrate by a shell, crushed and mangled at the foot of a crag with its intent intention protruding, but the great general escaped unhurt. But what good did it do. Was not the main main Christian commander the supreme leader of the whole army engaged in this mighty but battle down seriously wounded? The frenzy stricken officers shouted commands, rode a o among the panic stricken columns, trying to heat them back but two by two they dropped every minute, a tree crashed down near General Vivian unhorsing Evans but not injuring him.

If we could only get a large cavalry force, to charge into those panic stricken forces we could check this confusion," said General Vivian. "Could you sack my boy send for them?" "I'll lead for them in person."

"But it is suicide for you to point to that tumultuous conglomerate pandemonium," protested Evans. "I'll get the cavalry but let me lead them. I can do it better."

"No," said General Vivian. "I'll lead them, and that is all there is to it. It's your duty to take care of Violet and her sisters and ride them away from this region immediately so that they will be safe in case the foe wins."

Evans however did the opposite in secret but all the efforts of the cavalry could not rally them, and so Evans fearing a disastrous defeat went back to Violet and her sisters. But was Hanby Hanley really winning? Seventeen of Hanley's main columns under the highest generals had been overwhelmed and cut to pieces by the flankers sent by Zimmermann, his main line of assault 91,000,000 strong had been decimated so terribly that it seemed that only ten million survived, and that nine hundred thousand of the survivors were prisoners. The main commanders of the seventeen divisions were Germaine Cannon, Maurice Vivian, Walter Costello, Jennings Vivian, Louis Paliwin, Neiligan Maurice, Bel Benlipan, Fredrick and Jackson Fredrickson, Ricknell Benlipan, Adels-de-garbo Ricknell, Hendro Johnston, Franklin Johnston and Meldonia Jacksons who fortunately however had not been killed or wounded, in the frightful battle though the losses of these seventeen divisions under the fourteen generals in chief was about 38,000,233 in which 19,564,333 had been killed and wounded and the rest taken prisoners.

Indeed on account of this terrible slaughter terrible tragedy threat and Glandelinia should the Glandelinian armies lose.

"No Evans," said Violet at his serious question. "I'm not nervous nor am I low spirited. If it were not for you Evans we would never be perfectly happy."

"Why my dear little girl what a had made your little heart so sad? There is a great many things that make me sad, that make me seem dreadful to me also," said Jennie. "I would have rather died long ago than go through all the misery again which will come when the enemy wins. And they are already victorious. But yet we don't want to leave you as it almost breaks our hearts."

"But don't believe there will be any victory coming for the foe," said General Evans. "We have only got to hold our patience. And they saw it is only the main left wing of the Christian army that is driven into confusion of the whole of the army under General Hanson and Vivian in person and not the rest. And what makes you all seem sad?"

"Oh something down by this horrible battle. I feel sorry for the poor injured and dead who are fighting and have fought in vain for love them all dearly as they were all good and kind to little children. I wish Evans this terrible carnage had not happened and would cease, even no matter how it ends."

"So do I," said Evans. "But we can not stop it and dear little girl you are a too sensitive. I'm sorry you little girls ever saw the frightful battles. I ain't for the eyes of little children anyway."

"But dear Evans that cannot be helped," said Catherine reproachfully. "You want us to live happily and never have any pain, never suffer anything, not even hear a sad story, or see terrible sights, when millions of other poor creatures now having nothing but pain and sorrow probably all the time during the horrible war. It seems so selfish. And we can't help witnessing such horrors, and we can't help feeling about them. Such things have sunk into our hearts deep."

I've thought and thought about the battle now raging and how it was to end. Evans Evans is not there any way to have the broken divisions restored."

"That is a difficult question dearest," there is no doubt though that the army may be restored and reformed somehow but how, do not know. I heartily wish there was not a single war in existence, but then I don't know what there is to be done about it."

SLIGHT REPORTS OF WHAT THE BATTLE DID.???:

1 In the meantime reports had reached General Vivian that General Blominia's army had been swept by the same storm of battle and with frightful devaluation and that the terrific concussion of the battle had been felt with disastrous effects for about three hundred miles from the battle field, prostrating a number of cities, and wrecking thousands of villages. This gave rise to the fact that the battle of Francis-Atlanta had been tenfold worse than any battle in the war, except Aronburgs or Floridia which raged the following month of November. The battle all that frightful day as Violet and her sisters had observed had been terrific, the main swing of the battle having not extended toward Francis Atlanta until the afternoon when it then raged on the region on Francis Hill, then every where the battle had become a veritable screaming tempest of hellish fury that surprised all the Christian general in the enemy.

And now it seemed as if the foe was victorious. General Vivian's whole line was rolled up, Vivian's army was reduced to fragments, Francis Zimmermann's ruined army was driven out, by the Glandelinian onslaught, where the battle raged with a din loud enough to wake the dead, and General Hanson's main entire Christian line, that is the entire army fighting in the battle seemed on the verge of giving up at all points.

Three days had passed since the fatal news of the disaster was received by general Vivian who had been at Ananaria when he met Evans and though the battle was still surging back and forth the situation as reports came was the same or worse. Many of the fragments of assaulting divisions was hastily abandoning the assault at certain points. Evans had sent off with a large force of Christians to leave the region with Violet and her sisters for their safety should the enemy win most of the time the small force double timing and forced marches had been made, and now the whole force of Evans escort soon came within sight of a desolated town called McWhirther the same town ruined by the commander of the battle of Alorinia. From a plain whose terrible ruins and forest fires raging in the same regions barred their way in any other direction. The city had probably been swept by a conflagration, for bricks, mortar and ashes seemed to be the only remains. Most of Evans' command were well tired out from their long fast travel but as there was no shelter in this city of death, and as the heat of the encumbering ruins was intolerable, they headed swiftly in another direction making a clean breach of the ruined city and listening to the roar of the distant battle. At turn general Jack Evans carried the little girls, who though able to walk now pretty good without the crutch crutches, and even able to run somewhat easily when one crutch was more fatigued than any one else.

He liked to do it for them, because he generally fancied he was carrying children of the celestial regions. They were not heavy for him in the least and he generally carried them two at a time for miles for a mile before resting. Violet and her sisters marveled at his super human strength for in truth as they were now in a healthy condition again the little girls were quite heavy. Late that afternoon, three o'clock they reached the ruined regions of what had once been known as a Ogan. Though the ruins were passable they were yet too harrowing a sight to relate for such scenes of wars ravages and desolation are shocking to the ears. And heart. What typhoon is there or what tornado has any man nerve to face? What of these could outrun our primitive the ravages of the battles of the Alandoo-Angalinnian war? What even the millions of poor victims suffered a for a these years or war cannot be told us, even in our most secret chamber it so harrows up the soul. Thus was the ruins of Ogan. Roseanna Ogan. Violet and her sisters could hardly bear to witness it. Yet for short cut, and fearing the enemy would come upon them suddenly the Evans decided to try and make a passage through even with his cavalry forces, and there was no backing out now. The city was entered readily enough, and as they passed through one of the wreckage strewn streets they saw whole lines of desolated buildings all in total ruins as if shattered by severe earthquakes. It was a long time since little Alorinia Francisanna which ruined this city its concussion but nevertheless tons of debris lay beside these ruined buildings, or on the streets, many boards and sticks protruding from the brick piles. Evans began to have thoughts about seeking shelter for the little girls but none could be found in Roseanna. Now as every building was practically in total ruins. As the city was quite a size Evans decided to seek shelter in some house not completely leveled, but no such house could be found. Yet Evans was bound to see that the little girls get some rest somewhere and so a small halt was made. One of the soldiers fearing less something might happen stood on guard to give the warning. The May afternoon was very hot and sultry and quite stormy the rain falling in a drizzle. Suddenly the guard noticed a storm of red flashes in the sky toward the northwest.

"A fire sure enough," he cried. "I wonder if it is traveling in or toward this location?"

He was astonished and almost frightened at this moment for it suddenly disappeared. Far off could still be heard the roar of distant battle. He determined to keep his eyes peeled and did so but nothing unusual happened though the peculiar flashes showed incessantly all the time once covering the entire horizon. As the march was resumed and as they left the middle of the city the atmosphere became hazy with smoke and still more sultry generally indicating the approach of cyclonic storms. General Evans and the others who were well on their way toward three thirty noticed the very suspicious change and fearing that it was another sudden change in the course of the extensive battle line and knowing that they were dangerously close to it again from the nearness of the roar of the distant conflict, hastened to get out of the ruined city and so a successful

"Goodness! if the possibility of the typhoon of battle comes here again it catches us unawares and we could still be in this state it would be good day with us," muttered Evans to himself. "Wow!" They hastened onward climbing the wreckage of the trees at intervals and plunging through ravines choked with dust and wreckage. General Evans alone feared that his small division get out of the region before the battle surge would reach them and now wished a he and the others had not gone in this direction. However he did not mention this to fears to the others but as it happened at about quarter after four the haze cleared away the sky became more blue and the atmosphere quite transparent. Not a cloud was in the sky, and the heat of the late afternoon became more intolerable. Evans now felt no fears and only the little girls felt it was something else than an ordinary hot wave. They noticed the transparency of the atmosphere, with unspoken suspicion and to their impatient feelings caused by the sense of approaching danger it seemed as there was no end of the region as they never seemed to leave it. In fact they were going back toward the raging battle and they did not know it.

Evans seemed to notice the worried look on the faces of the little girls and said:

"What is the matter little girls of mine? You all look as if you were worried about something. Are you still fearing that your freedom from your enemies and everything else will be a failure?"

"No-o-o-o," said Violet as she suddenly noticed a rolling mass of air in cloud formation which in this country bears like a thunder moving up along the horizon where the terrible roar of the battle could be heard. "I fear we are heading again in the direction of the cyclonic storm of battle. It may go on with us if we are caught out in it among the open plains."

"The horizon skies are suspicious alright," Evans remarked glancing at the heavy smoke clouds. "It looks though from those yonder clouds that it is from the distant exploding shells but just the same though those shells make black and white smoke don't like the coloring of that thick mass of cirrus. And at other portions I see gray smoke clouds. And I know because I've seen it so often often. That is surely from the distant battle, and the worse part of that. But what of it many of these ruined houses out here, or a ravine is safe for us to dive into at the first moment we find ourselves or ourselves among the battle again. Evans knew that the battle was still raging and was bound to get out of the region before any of the retreating columns no matter what side would come upon them. It was well on toward half past four now and the whole distant horizon had become as gray as the skies are before the outbreak of a severe snowstorm. More like the Kansas grayness especially like the grayness mentioned before the outbreak of the cyclone in the Wizard of Oz. Even the far distant ruins of the city they had left behind seemed to be of a strange gray color which made them seem more desolate and terrific and when that been the meaning of the distant red flashes. A terrible typhoon of battle had tore along general Vivians still firmly holding lines, but fortunately did not devastate any more cities from the concussion, though three hundred and twenty two towns and villages had been wiped off the map with great loss of life.

THE VIOLENT CALVERINIAN THUNDER STORM

The clouds after all were not from any battle. A terrific Calverinian thunderstorm was approaching, and was already sweeping the southern parts of Calverinia and progressing southeastward with all the frightful fury it could assume. Violet and her sisters noticing the strange grayness of the sky began to have fears that it was already close upon them as the gray color was quite quick and freakish, even seeming to effect the far distant landscape and the atmosphere. As the sensation of sulphur was in the air, and Evans noticing it also believed that after all the cloud may have come from Mt. Vivian he declared that the volcano may be in eruption, though at a great distance from them.

"But why don't askes 'all' then Jack dear," said Violet. "And yet there is no breeze. That ought to be a real sign of a storm as you know now the old clouds are a storm. At Virginia is too far to be seen anyway. We can't get the effects of her eruption from here. She can destroy only at a distance of sixty miles. We are two hundred miles away from her now."

"But she can throw her sulphurous cloud this far," insisted Evans.

"Maybe that is so, but I noticed when these clouds first appeared they resembled storm clouds, and not from any eruption or not from the distant battle, and they are approaching with terrible swiftness."

"Well, maybe it is a distant typhoon then," said Evans exhibiting some alarm. "If she strikes here we will have a great time in saving out ourselves from its relentless fury. Violet, I hope your fears for the sake of you and your sisters are wrong after all."

"So do we wait," was their comment. "But Evans my dear you may be disappointed. My predictions are seldom wrong. Besides I can almost prove that we will soon have a severe thunderstorm."

"Oh, God, have mercy on us. Look at those black clouds. Evans! Black black as ink," gasped Alice.

Evans and all the rest looked and noticed ink dark threatening clouds spreading swiftly toward the zenith and along the north western horizon in many fantastic shapes at its advancing edges, and advancing with amazing animation while a stiff breeze was starting to rise cool and chilly. The ponderous glober avalanches of clouds grew darker and blacker, which though real purple in hue at first had not become the color of ink, or exactly looked like smoke.

Nevertheless they hardly yet believed it was a thunderstorm. Thunderstorm, thunderstorm or a coming but in a few minutes from the straight not northwest there began a furious headlong race of amber cloud clouds and others black as real ink, others white and blue whole above their heads the swift canopy as black as a pit in a terrible treacherous cavern had already passed, the distant gray or greenish gray cloud was intermingled in quick secondary successions of sheet and shaft light lightning.

The whole distant ruins of the city of Fort Jones Anna Hogan was in death, like silence repose, and the houses appeared almost black in hue, while the foliage of the far distant trees, in the country regions, now visible in the distance plowed with a weird spectral green and spander in the growing darkness. Puffs of cool wind swept through the fields and isolated heavy rain drops so large as to make splashes the size of plates clattered against the windows. Watchers... watchers...

Indeed extra canopy of black approaching clouds spreading over the sky near the zenith with amazing rapidity resembled like the approach of the judgement day, and hell's immense clouds at the same time and far to the northwest the section of the cloud spreading there seemed to suddenly turn into a sheeted black line of streaks, the approaching thunder rolls seemed to roar in relentless rage, to defy even the heavenly bodies to stop it. It's indiscriminately wild progress. Evans and the rest believed they were going, but nevertheless they took caution enough to dive into an open valley called way of an old abandoned farm house not far away. Violet and her sisters with fright huddling around Evans in the darkness of a corner and he could actually hear the wild thumping of their pure little hearts, the little girls thinking it a wild typhoon typhoon coming. Evans stood near enough of the opening to survey the approach of the thunderstorm. And noticed from the action of the clouds that it was indeed one of those wild Calvinian thunderstorms that sweeps the country in May.

The immense cloud had already passed over the southern and eastern horizon, the darkest part having become of a crimson brown color the horizon being lit up by a sudden intense lurid glow from the distant town as that were burning which almost surrounded the ruins of the city of Pleasant Roseanna Hogan.!!!!

The whole ruins was the color of a strange red darkness. All of a sudden this red darkness increased then faded gradually away as it became lighter again while in the distance the battle still raging there seemed to be a terrible shrieking noise which seemed to echo high up into the sky even, resembling the far away howl of legions of demons. The rain falling was now so thick that nothing over fifty hundred yards could be seen unless it was revealed by the increasing incessant flashes of lightning which was now preceded by a constant cannonading of the heavens. It was growing dark.

Suddenly there blashed a blue bluish flash of lightning hurl burning the eyes of all behold it like pepper and terrible indeed was the detonation of the thundercrash whose concussion shook down scores of ruined buildings and made all the trees quiver. Then gradually the sky afire with lightning the thunder began to roar like a salvoes of violent cannonading all with surprising rapidity followed the vast columns of water precipitated from the sky.

The sound was now changing almost metallic in their ring then there was a rattling and a clanking and a terrific explosion of thunder that sounded like a million cannon in one long rolling report.

The earth trembled as if there was an earth quake the air though yet still grew cold cooler then all of a sudden there was a blinding flash of lightning proceeded by a thunder roar that seemed to rend the heavens and earth all simultaneously, and which again caused the ground to tremble severely and down fell the distant ruin everywhere echoing through the streets in response to the thunder thunder roll. Another flash followed a moment after its forked streaks seeming to blast and singe the air many of the streaks being like lanes of skyscrapers. Another thunder roll came with tenfold vehemence and from the shock of the concussion scores of half ruined ruined buildings utterly collapsed with a roar heard far and wide and reverberating through the streets in deafening cadence deafening cadence.

At every pause of the thunder crashes the dull howling roar of the distant battle could still be heard growing louder and louder at times, and now again a searing river of lightning which seemed to fill the black cloud with millions of streams seemed furiously to stab the darkness. The report of the thunder crash sounded like a million cannon once more going off in one long roll.

How long the tremendous uproar of the storm continued no one can say but during it all Evans and the rest were soon witnesses of the distant battle once more shells sending amid the storm of rain and thunder swirling on high into the air columns after columns of assaulting landelinians still going to pieces amid the worse ear-splitting roar of the battle which drowned out the noise of the severe thunderstorm. How long the tremendous uproar of the battle continued and the shrieks of the millions of injured left at the mercy of the wild storm it is hard to tell, but the crashes of a redoubled number of shells explosions as the christian cannon rended the landelinian armies to pieces actually made the ground tremble worse than the grashing thunder did, and within twenty minutes now nearly all of the landelinian columns within sight may have turned into a maelstrom of destruction of lives, but still the attack only redoubled in fury, but the tremendous counter onrush of the Angelinians was like a terrific typhoon clearing many of the plains of the landelinians by carrying all before them, and now it did not look to Evans or the little girls as if the christians were losing the battle, and indeed they were not losing, anything so far as that is concerned, the enemy not having won a single assault. The atmosphere was blinding with shooting clouds of wreckage mud, amid the explosions of shells which incessantly roared and crashed, drowning out the monstrous screaming howling roar of the christian yell itself.

In a second more the remaining landelinian column had increased the fury of their assault the whole battle being still the same roaring hell of destruction and not even the worse uproar of all the elements and volcanoes in eruption could be combined. All the landelinian columns that dared charge into that damanting inferno went to pieces or faced annihilation the air was still thickly clouded with debris and smoke, the battle raged on with redoubled fury in all that it shot torrents of pouring rain, and the yell of the landelinians became so fierce once more, that when it was added by the answering yell of the Angelinians it seemed that hell and all its damned began to possess the air once more and were venting their savage rage in the most horrible unearthly sounds even louder than the screaming of a million shrill whistles. Column after columns of the landelinians were rended to fragments so frequently now that they became confused the dust and clouds of smoke poured everywhere thicker than the rain the savage fury of the battle continued steadily in a paroxysm of rage that increased with tenfold vehemence the storm of battle now raging at its greatest fury.

A week had passed now since the battle of Francis-Atlanta, and the broken fragments of vanleys armies were still retreating in confusion.

"Phew but that was a narrow escape for the christian cause," said general Hanson that evening when he could find voice to speak to Evans.

"I thought we and the christian armies were goners. My how the enemy did throw their fury into us..."

"It was God who saved us," said Jennie. "It had been a terrible battle storm, and if it had not been for the brave holding out of the christian lines we would have all been killed without a chance of saving out ourselves."

"You little girls seemed mighty scared and sad for a while," said Evans. "And I told you your misery was all for nothing. Well the fact is, Hanson wants to camp here for to night. We can't go through this damned city of St. Francis in the dark."

Hanson however on account of his armies being far ahead by this time many miles away, decided not to after all declaring that he did not believe it wise to do so, that the pursuing armies had went on ahead, and he did not think it wise to cause any delay whatever, and as the little girls though tired and sleepy had the same opinion Evans thought it best too and the journey was continued in the dark, Evans having the little girls close closer to him than ever, guarding their every footstep.

footstep, though it seemed to him at times as if they were celestial children who were guarding him.

They had traveled on for an hour when they suddenly began to see the country again, and a good portion of a house near by which seemed good and entire.

"Let's stop here for a while," advised general Hanson. "A good rest may do us good after all. Any how as we have reached the outer limits of the ruined city we may as well have some sleep for the sake of the army which I know has halted."

Hanson was the first to enter and gave a cry of dismay. At his shout of horror Evans and the little girls followed quickly. They were horrified at what they saw. The whole ceiling was down and mingled with the wreckage on the floor, were several horribly mangled bodies of little children, two fair beautifully formed little girls, but stripped naked. General Hanson stepped inside and lifting a large beam drew out the armless and legless body of one of the poor little girls. Her body was rent and torn frightfully and besmeared with blood. Her head had been crushed and her eyes which were bulging were half out of their sockets, her neck was lacerated as by a butchers knife, and the windpipe was protruding.

"Gracious this is no place for us," Ecla exclaimed. "Those bodies look as if they had come through a number of butcher's shops. Some better in the open than here!"

As Violet and her sisters of course had not gone all the way in the they did not know what was up. As they saw general Hanson, Baldwin, and Evans emerge from the room with pale horrified faces, they realized they had witnessed some horror in the place and shuddered. Evans who had been with the two high generals refused to reveal what he saw as he did not want to distress and horrify them. They begged and pleaded, but he would not yield, so they gave it up but nevertheless he knew they suspected something dreadful as he saw the look of horror on their sweet faces.

"Burn the damn house," ordered Hanson to his nearest rank of solid soldiers examining an envelope he found in the same room. "Children have been murdered by the dirty rascals and hidden in the house. As intestines are dangling out of their bodies we cannot bear the time it takes to bury them."

Then opening the envelope drew out a sheet of paper which started him as he read the words:

"The joke is intensely on general Jack Evans of the dirty pig dogs called the Angelins. The general he shot and wounded was not Germania Vivian, but Germania Vivian, who resembles him a good deal. But Jack Evans's dastardly trick is known all over and he showed a sample what he will do to the Vivian girls when they are captured. His army did not arrive to join Stanley. It was Germania Vivian's army, as general Germania Vivian is still at Bremer Anderson. For that, Jack Evans had better beware for his doom is nigh. His men will get the dirty Vivian girls or we will know the reason why."

GOOD day Mr. Poodle-Dog who ever you are who finds this letter.
Sergeant John A. McKlin.

Hanson turning to Evans and handing him the note said: "Jack my boy you failed to get your man. I hope you better luck next time."

Evans was astonished but after reading the note he said: "I should worry what is said or what written in this damn note. They will have to kill me first before they can get the Vivian girls or save him from what is coming to him. I bet a million dollars that some day Germania will be facing me for his sent sentence."

They now proceeded onward into the open country Evans having Violet and Jennie by the hand on each side of him. He could not restrain from drawing them to him and kissing them. He had become more like a brother to them, than a mere friend or a guardian and the little girls seemed to realize it...

THE DESPERATE FIGHT BETWEEN JACK EVANS AND GERMAINE VIVIAN

They loved him as much as their tender hearts could show, and though they acted like dear little sisters to him he nevertheless always had that strange feeling of awe which frequently made him wonder. That night when all did find some shelter he lay awake for hours thinking of them, and with that same strange feeling of awe. Could they really be flesh and blood he often wondered? He vowedly swore that he would protect them in any way from Germanias assassins, would be as kind to them as his heart would permit and satisfy them in any way that was not injurious.

It was early in the night and he was still thinking when suddenly glancing sideways he noticed something white and tall stooping over him. Thinking at first it was Violet, he had the impulse to draw her suddenly within his loving embrace, then suddenly he noticed the size too tall for even a man as it seemed, and suddenly having the sense of impending danger he quickly drew his gun and blazed away.

In his excitement he missed his aim, and the form what ever it was sprang at him as he jumped out of bed, and at once the scene was one of the greatest confusion. At Evans first successful onset the intruder crashed several chairs through the windows in an endeavor to strike down his powerful assailant, but Evans charged furiously upsetting the table which stood in the middle of the room, which fell with a shocking crash, and landed a stinging blow on the fellow's jaw that sent him staggering against another table upsetting it with a resounding crash that shook the room, and brought down the chandelier and plaster of the ceiling.

Recovering quickly he strove frantically to stop Evans by brandishing the table in front of him but Evans sprang like a maddened bull striking a blow which sent the intruder sprawling head over heels, the table almost knocking Evans down as it crashed against the opposite wall. However he was not hurt in the least and springing forward again grappled with the intruder, the two wrestling like acrobats knocking down everything they crashed into with a resounding crash.

Flows were rained at each other like two fiercely combating prize-fighters, and generals Hanson and Baldwin having heard the shot and the crash of falling furniture, had been aroused at once, but the stranger had fastened the doors of their rooms with bolts and they failed to get out. However Hanson threw himself against the door of his room with terrific force sending the door crashing against the opposite wall. Baldwin also managed to kick the door of his room from its hinges and the two hurly generals instead of calling for assistance of the soldiers which generals always do when intruders enter their head quarters immediately pitched upon Evans powerful assailant, and overpowered him just as general Vivian came in from another doorway, the one to his room having been made of iron and couldn't be forced.

However the man was overpowered, the white sheet being torn from him while at the same time the fellow dropped a large sack to the floor which he had intended to hit Evans with.

Hanson though he did not recognize the mans face in the sombre pall of the room saw nevertheless that Jack's assailant was a man about Baldwins size and height, well formed and graceful in motion, but by the glare of his eyes they realized he was a scowling fiercely and pugnaciously and showed his teeth at Evans. So a seven little white robbed tobed figures at this moment appeared they being Violet and her sisters the little girls having been aroused also by the shot, and the confusion of the struggle.

"It's one of general Germaine Vivians assassins I presume disguising himself as a ghost." Said Baldwin with a grin. And he picked up the sack.

"No doubt he has stolen something here." Said Evans. "I'll look into the bag." lag.

"What had you any business here for anyway?" Said Hanson in a hoarse strange voice, and with a flash of his eyes. "To murder Violet and her sisters I presume!"

"It is those little girls whom you rascals are wishing to assassinate." Sneered the stranger.

"Oh is that so." Said general Baldwin with a deadly scowl which the intruder returned with the look of knives.

"General Hanson just look what is in this bag." Said Evans handed it over to him.

At this moment the intruder was about to make a break but Baldwin grabbed him rudely, general Vivian trying the mans arms and saying hoarsely:

"Don't dare make a sound and don't try to force your self free either as we are crackshots take a break and we will shoot you down like a dog."

Nevertheless while Hanson was examining the contents of the bag he did try frantically to free himself of the ropes but general Vivian had tied them too firmly and it was in vain.

"There is no getting away with you now." Said Baldwin with a sneer as Hanson was still examining the contents of the bag. Good for you general Evans for arousing us. No telling what he may have done. He would have cleaned us out of everything we had."

"Well I'll tell you one thing." Said Hanson cool coolly. "This fellow did clean me out alright that's a cinch. All these things in the bag belongs to me. It's lucky Evans was awake and saw him. How did you discover him my boy?"

"Why I did not sleep a wink to night as the Vivian girls again overawed me." Answered Evans. "Well I laid down for several hours thinking about them, thinkin' thinkin' what I would do for them and so on, and while my thoughts were at their height, I turned my head noticing a white figure standing beside my bed. At first I thought it was Violet, but suddenly realizing its size and height, had no sense of impending danger, and drawing my gun I fired and missing him he grappled with me, fighting hard to get him fearing he would get away at being discovered."

"We will have to turn him over to the soldiers." Said general Vivian. "As we can't keep him in here during the night for fear he will get away and do further mischief. But let's take a look at his face and see who he is. His shape is familiar. Get a light somebody."

A lighted candle was brought into the room and there was an exclamation from the generals, the little girls, Evans, and from the prisoner as recognition was the real result.

"Why if it ain't Germaine Vivian." Gasped Hanson and the others. "And if it ain't father, uncle and my long lost friends God can accuse me of lying." Said the would be prisoner. "I-I-I-I-I thought you were Glandelinian generals as I failed to make you out in the dark."

"By God I did not know you were here. I and my brothers were prisoners in the Glandelinian camp since captured at the battle of little Gloria Francisanna and only the day after the battle of Francis Atlanta broke up Manleys army I and my brother managed to escape, though despite the foehing worsted Glandelinians are roaming the regions looking for us. We separated in order to escape better, and reaching this place during the last hour entered your room, noise believing you and the others were Glandelinians took your weapons which I placed in the bag."

I locked his and Baldwin's door on leaving, and accidentally entering Jacks room in my disguise as a ghost, (As Glandelinians are fearful of the these imaginary creatures) saw him there and not recognizing him in the dark, bent over him to see what Glandelinian general I supposed supposed him to be. He of course fired then, and being bound to make my escape when discovered attacked him and almost had him at my mercy when you two generals came to his assistance. I'm sorry I created such an unnecessary disturbance but you know my nature when cornered by Glandelinians and even those whom I suspect as Glandelinians. If I had thought of my weapons and had you been real Glandelinians or not, it would have been the fine finish of all of you for you know what a crackshot I am. But I'm now glad that I did not get the chance to use my forty fours which I still have with me as you had not searched me as yet."

"My long lost son is back again!" Said the happy general Vivian, unfastening the cords and embracing him. "We all thought you were dead."

Indeed all were rapturous over his return especially Violet and her sisters who were embraced by him again and again. Evans and all the rest excited over his return and reassured that Jimmie Vivian was also safe somewhere else among the Christian lines could not sleep a bit more than that no night which was quite stormy and windward toward two o'clock. When morning dawned back and stormy, the generals seeing the condition of the weather did not feel like going but but stayed for a while but however toward nine o'clock the storm only grew worse and impatient with waiting they set out though they were fairly soaked by the rain which fell at intervals. Evans stayed by the little girls but talking to Germaine Vivian now and then on some subject and over the great scrap that night before, and then learned how he had escaped with his brother. He and his brother had been with Manleys army during the battle of Francis-Atlanta and taking advantage of the confused retreat after the battle was over, slipped away, though pursued for days even by blood hounds until reaching the Christian lines.

The day indeed was so dark and stormy and the wind so high that it was blowing with almost the vehemence of a hurricane. Hanson and the rest buffeted by the wind could hardly keep to their feet. Fields once filled with corn and wheat were exposed to their view all flooded. They were also dull and bare the retreating enemy desolating the country behind him. Not a cornstalk reared itself above the fields, not a sprig of green was anywhere, and the ground had the appearance of having been ploughed with some immense comb with which thrills of large teeth. The wheat fields had also been stripped of the grain but nevertheless was strewn with pieces of timber and other wreckage from farm houses and barns blown to pieces by the storm of shell fire. Violet and her sisters from their markings remembered these farms, because they had passed here sometime before the battle of little Gloria Francisanna. It indeed was a scene compared to what it looked then. The enemy in their retreat had devastated these fields with cruel fury as they had spared nothing whatever long rows of all kinds of fruit trees having also been cut down and even burned. Far in the distance through the driving rain Evans could see something blue mingled with long white moving lines and using his field glasses saw what it was.

"We are only a mile from the flood." He said to general Hanson. "I can see it here with my glasses. But it must have increased tremendously as I could not see the further side."

Hanson looked through his glasses and then laughed.

"Indeed it is a flood." He said. "It's a flood that covers many thousands of miles. It's the Angelinian sea. The ordinary flood in Germania is too far south of us, being in the middle of the country and that yonder is the sea."

As a matter of fact it was the Angelinian sea as Evans soon discovered. After they had traveled for several minutes Evans could dimly see the form of the tall fiery Vivian volcano which was about thirty miles as yet. After a quarters of an hour marching they came to the beach where Evans beholding the vast sea with awe. The sea was furiously rough as the high wind had only increased, it being a hurricane now. Long surges or breakers rolled in far up the mile wide beach with an incessant roar like cannonading, the waves appearing to be about thirty feet high. General Hanson however from fear of the hurricane breaking loose with full strength and catching them at an unhandy spot did not care to tarry long in this vicinity and so they started onward again following the tracks of the Angelinian railroad, which were clear at this point the armies marching swiftly past, and cherishing the little girls and the generals as they swept by in full time.

"These tracks leads to the vicinity of Mt Vivian." Said Violet. "Maybe we will have an opportunity to see down into the depths of the crater."

"And it maybe a long time before trains can run here again." Said Evans.

"I don't think so." Said little voice. "The tracks will have to be cleared as soon as possible so supply trains can run. You know all the people of the ruined cities wrecked by the concussion of the battle of little Gloria Francisanna cannot be removed to the east. There is no room it is not only the injured who were removed and there is peril too for there is no telling when another storm of battle would rage where they are while they are still without protection...." "If we could only secure a hand car we could make it quicker." Said Evangelina. "It is so slow to walk, especially so tiresome for us even when riding in carriages as we are doing now. The enemy must carried all of the hand came away. And it might take more than a week for the 'anleys to reform their armies, and there is no telling when our armies will be in sight of them again."

"So the forest fires are the main things to be tackled," said Evans. "And they are the main dangers to be avoided."

Evans indeed feared the approach of forest fires and he fancied he could see despite the shroud the rain made clouds of smoke in the sky toward the extreme southeast, for what he saw could not be read as a thunderhead of an approaching thunderstorm of a typhoon. But of course he was not absolutely sure and did not say anything to the little girls though he constantly kept his eyes peeled in that direction. It was already well on in the afternoon and all could noticed that the heavy clouds covered the sky as far as the zenith and as they watched it grew increasingly bulging in convoluted globular convolutions. Violet and her sisters noticing the approaching change became restless and the whole army fairly raced along, but they could see that the supposed storm was fast approaching and would catch them before they reached any shelter.

The wind blew furiously and presently a gust of wind almost threw general Vivian from his horse. The Christian armies were now cutting and plowing their way through fallen trees which lay as thick as straws which had been cut down by the enemy, Evans having a notion that it was the prospect of trees that were turning in the distance.

But how fast the confederate army was advancing he knew not yet his fears were needless. What appeared to be smoke of a forest fire to him and storm clouds to the others and even to the army of soldiers spreading in whitened masses against the blackening skies was only the vapor clouds of a far distant eruption for Mt Vivian was in action.

In truth there were forest fires raging far east of them so far that they could not be seen but nevertheless these fires were the main things to meet. The wind was blowing considerably not but there was a strong smell of sulphur in the air while there was continually a strange thundering sound in the direction of Mt Vivian which was withal a thin plain sight now as the rains had ceased. But only her bare or bare could be seen as all the rest of her was obscured in thick rolling clouds many with the shape of gigantic thunder heads spreading far across the sky. Indeed to state once more all were indeed glad to see general Germaine Vivian and the scenes of joy that had ensued can not be described. Germaine and Vivian had not died after all and before this advance had been resumed all had knelt down and offered a prayer of thanksgiving to God.

That day general Vivian and Hanson had made up their mind to pursue general Vanley and force him to retreat clean to Jatrava and during a halt near Mt Vivian spoke of this to all of their officers. Hanson however had refused to comply to the demands of one of the generals laughing at him and saying:

"Why sir just because we have been winning right along now you are getting overconfident. Don't be a fool. I've vowed myself that I would never allow any of the Vanleys to landelinnian before they surrendered, and as you say you want wanted me to go and besiege that Glandelinnian capt capitol right now! Why to besiege that Gibraltar with Vanleys armies defending it would be the same as if we turned into devils, and besieged God's home with hell's legions. And to capture Glandelinnian capt capitol with the Vanleys defending it would be just as easy for us to try and capture the moon."

CHAPTER. 12.

The maddest

THE FIGHT WITH A YOUNG BLENGLIOMENNA A SERPENT. II

THE MANY BATTLES RAGING IN THE WEST.

"Oh Poul," said the officer, "What are you afraid of. Don't act like a coward. God is always with us."

"Whose coward?" said Hanson vehemently. "I'll go where ever you go and that is all there is to it. And not go back unless you do. You may call me a coward or the whole world may call me a coward, but furthermore, suppose we press Vanley in a confused retreat all the way to the Glandelinnian capitol which is now our goal. It is attack it, and a few months later after all our progress, retreat out of Glandelinnia with a crushing defeat on our hands, and the Glandelinnians once more swarming into our country vast victor victo as you would it look to the eyes of the world. You my dear sir will be foolish to refuse my advice and plans. We are the winners now, and the sooner we bag Vanley the sooner we will end this most rabid raging of war. But him and his two sons we must get first and not the Glandelinnian capitol the city of Mc-Hallister."

"Well just as you say general," said the officer. "But how are we going to capture his army. I'd like to know!"

"Catch up to his army in a forced march and attack the fragments of his army before he can get larger forces to join it. I'm sure Vanley is no fool and would rather give up his sword now than see his remaining army ruthlessly slaughtered."

"Well I'll agree to the plan and so do so then," said general Glandelinnian. "We can catch up to him by tomorrow morning and attack him furiously. Will that do?"

"Sure," answered Hanson. So the matter was settled.....:!!!!

In the meantime Violet going out alone had a most thrilling experience. She had put on a grayed-out horse and uniform just for fun, and climbing a high pile of hardened lava near the base of Mt Vivian, probably from a recent lava flow to get a better view of the scenery when she was startled by a tremendous snarl and turning snarl she saw to her horror a young Glandelinnian serpent of Crimean type floundering vigorously alongside of another badly wounded by apparent gunshots probably done by attacking grayed-out brutes who strove to kill the unfortunate creature when it was down and out. Mistaking her for one of the rascals its rage was fearful to behold and hounding the Glandelinnian to earth with several sweeps of its wing the left one, it wheeled with a cry apparent of distress, and clawing first in the lava made a furious dash at her, but she avoided it by taking a dash down the side of the lava while as fast as she could screaming frantically for Evans. Her clear sweet childish voice, stopped the charge of the monster, it hesitated, whinned, with large tender droplets. Its eyes, which had been so touchingly distantly, and plainly, but again deceived by her false uniform, it now made for her with terrible fury, twining its tail around her throat in an effort to bring her down, but frantically she wrenched it loose screaming again, and Evans hearing her piteous shriek and seeing her danger yelled:

"Oh run Violet! It's a Grimecian! It's a Grimecian! It's your uniform that is making it attack you!" Off with it if you can.

Indeed poor Violet could not run very well yet and fell several times sprawling the monster making a headlong swoop but missed her in its rush though a terrific hit its right wing ripped the entire coat off in the back clean open, the remainder sticking to the skin. Violet lay prone for several minutes too scared to get up but when the monster again hesitated, she arose to her feet, and made for Evans slowly, the Grimecian once more resuming the attack, flying after her, rushing around her in a circle, trying to bang her with its wings, and raining a general commotion. Once it almost had her the wind of its brush cart carrying away her hat and revealing her long flowing golden hair. But did this did not convince the enraged Pteridomane that she was a only a harmless child, and it made for her with redoubled fury, the poor little girl making a dash for a high pile of loose rocks and stones, Evans fast behind her.

Evans noticing a good sized seal floe floating on the sea seized it quickly by the tail in a firm hold and taking wood and buried it with all his strength at the Grimecian. The seal landed a rainier the left wing of the pretty dragon beast and though it did not hurt him in the least it checked its furious attack on Violet. Recovering instantly it eyed Evans in a peculiar manner and refused to go for him on account of his purple uniform, but nevertheless it watched Violet closely and then seeing an opportunity made for her like a flash, and would have had her in a death grasp had not Evans vigorously scattered broken timbers about him, and seized an iron pipe, and stood his ground checking every charge the monster attempted on Violet, at the same time yelling to Violet to discard herself of the gray uniform for a moment. But it seemed as if she had not time to do even open a single button before it managed to pass Evans and attack her furiously, just missing her about an inch, as it bounded out at her with its right wing and tried to gore her with its basket-ornaments or horns. Once again it had its tail around her throat nearly strangling her, but Evans forced it loose.

"Look out for its wings by all means," yelled Evans. "If it hits you you are a goner." Violet made for the sea followed closely by the Grimecian, who circled around her again and again, descending and ascending at intervals, keeping up a most deafening clamor. Aroused by the tremendous volume of sound general Vivian and Hanson dashed toward the scene to see what was on.

"Gosh we will have to go to their rescue," shouted general Vivian. "We will have to stop its wild attack or she will be killed."

"killed. It's that gray uniform that deceives it," said general Vivian to one of the lieutenants who also came up. "Get them while we can, and general Hanson checks its course. Hurry."

And with these words they dashed to the rescue of poor Violet yelling for her to get at least the coat off, it ahead to tear it off altogether. Attacked now by three persons the Grimecian was still more infuriated; infuriated and now despite the uniforms made a dash at the three generals almost simultaneously, giving forth a tremendous barking roar, as it lunged furiously at general Vivian. General Vivian was knocked sprawling by the wind of its huge body as it passed within a few feet of him, one of the talons of the wing catching the general's long coat which was ripped off completely off from him, the whole coat remaining in the talons. Pouncing in its attack the monster plowed at them, rose once more into the air and made one terrific swoop, and if its dash had not been broken it would have borne them down in its path. At the same time it charged it sent forth a thunderous roar that was heard far and wide, and echoed for several minutes by many of the distant mountains, the dull thunders of its vivacious eruptions seeming to be hushed by the horrid sound. It now stopped its attack, but nevertheless remained motionless on the ground, watching every move and snarling furiously, and Evans suddenly grabbing Violet, hastily unbuttoned the coat, and tore it from her, throwing the trousers revealing to the monster astonished eyes, her natural condition.

which had been under the uniform she had on. During the entire time of the attack Violet how it came that the animal attacked her so suddenly. "I was observing the thing on the ship of lava and hearing a sudden noise and snarl turned in time to see what it was. Grimecians were attacking a wounded mate, and thinking I was one, made for me after laying the others low."

"I thought it very strange," said general Vivian. "The Grimecians alone would never attack even a Grimecian without serious reasons. It's a good fortune it was not the large one. Since our assailant has now fled away I believe we will go and investigate. Oh, I wonder what those Grimecians are doing, there now. I mean to see. Get a platoon of men and shoot them."

He quickly rushed toward the dune followed by Evans the general the soldiers and even Violet. Reaching the top they saw a score of rascally Grimecians trying to bayonet a wounded old Grimecian (which groaned and whined at the cruel treatment it received, while the same mate was circling overhead raising a great clamor of distress and giving forth signal roars).

"I laughed," Hanson. "The main one will never need to come to your assistance you poor beast. Boys shoot the dune down. Don't let a rascal escape, who caused all this harm. Fire!"

At the approach of the Grimecians the Grimecians had scattered, firing a random volley, but though some of the Grimecian soldiers dropped, the rest answered with a resounding volley, mowing down thirteen of the rascals at one time, and by various maneuvers and furious firing managed to capture the rest, and gived them the worse clouting they ever received. Then considering them severely they took the culprits along as prisoners, Hanson and the others turning their attention to the wounded Grimecian serpent.

"Can't we do anything for the poor thing," said Violet with tears in her eyes. "Then she added. 'I see why I was attacked. This was a mate and the other was defending her against the Grimecians, and thinking that I was one also, and meant it harm made for me. It had killed the others it had knocked down.'"

"Push to the ambulance and get some bandages and vasoline," said general Vivian to Evans. "Hurry quick."

Evans darted off like a flash and soon came back with the required articles. It was easy enough to find the wounds, discovering most of them badly disfigured and Hanson said:

"The poor beast is seriously wounded and may have lain here for a long time. But there are no accidental or natural injuries, but wounds inflicted by gray-coated scoundrels. The other wounds are from bullets and bayonets. I'm sorry indeed it was not one of the big fellows instead of the little ones. There is nothing that can injure the mightiest Pteridomane serpents, when in full growth, and had it been one of the large size they attacked, they would have been worse off than snuffed in the Vivian lava fires. We will have to do something to bring it to recovery."

General Vivian applied the vasoline and Hanson applied the bandages, while Violet leaned it her pretty head against its own, stroking it with loving hands and murmuring it by coaxing words. The poor Pteridomane groaned and groaned, as the wounds were bandaged, but it had a knowledge what was being done, and acted grateful, the mate now by being on the pile watching every move with grateful eyes, and look of forgiveness toward Violet who was dressing the injured serpents head lovingly and saying kind words.

"We will have to refuge it on a large farm flat wagon, and take it along with us until the big ones come for it," said Hanson bitterly. "I believe us three can carry it. The mate I'm sure won't object, what we do, when we only mean kindly kindness."

General Vivian attempted to lift it and Hanson and Evans helping found it quite easy. As the other one showed no signs of objection they lifted the injured one carefully and with the help of some of the soldiers soon had it on a large wagon covered thickly with hay and straw. Both Pteridomane seemed grateful and showed their gratitude especially the one who had attacked by rubbing its head against Violet's chest, and allowing her to caress it without fear.

"I wonder if the big one will come," asked general Vivian. "We had better wait and see. It is now dark and it is too late to have done to one of the young and will probably also show gratitude when it discovers the truth."

The whole morning of that day wore on, and at 11 no signs of the larger one. The colors of the two mates were exceedingly pretty, the wings themselves having the color and form of butterfly.

but when not in use were folded like birds. To the colors on their bodies were too many to be imagined here, but yellow and two different blues were the exceptional ones. However toward noon when orders came for the march to be resumed, those who had been out with Evans returned with the statement that there was the biggest Blanglomenian serpent within the lines that she had ever seen, one of them lying close to a large wagon where a wounded one was reclining among straw with limbs on one wagon wheels a wounded one was reclining among straw with limbs on one wagon wheels a wounded one was reclining among straw with limbs on one wagon wheels

It. She said that they at first resented her approach to the wagon and that she left for fear of arousing its anger. Every one approached the spot eagerly but cautiously, but seeing the purple coats with the almost celestial like children in the land, the men's appearance less disturbing and finally the wounded one was carried gently away one of the largest remaining.

CHAPTER THIRTEEN.

THE REWARD OF THE BLANGLOMENIANS.

Violet and her sisters noticed something familiar about the huge Blanglomenian which looked at them with steady eyes. There had they seen the beautiful creature before. Surely it must be the old time Blanglomenian friend called Rover. At least it looked like him for its features were the same, the wings were the same color and shape and its very head was of the cat like image. Nevertheless as it seemed to have a ferocious like aspect they dreaded to approach it though Violet called the name "Rover" timidly. At the word "Rover" it flinched and looked straight at Violet and her sisters and all approached almost motionlessly but without any intended harm. Hanson warned the little girls to be very careful, he not believing it to be Rover, who was in the Mt. Salverino region.

"I'm sure it's Rover but he does not recognize us," said Violet to Evans with fear. "His threatening aspect almost makes me feel like screaming with fright. We are not for the Blanglomenian savages, but before him we are utterly helpless if he gets angry at us." "Be careful then of what move or word you say," said Evans. "He may be the one you know, but so long has it been since he last saw you that he fails to recognize you."

Indeed the little girls did not know what to do. He kept his eyes steadily on them never moving appearing as just as a statue, then little Jennie screamed.

"He is never to know it by the mark on his two horns which I made to identify him with. He does not recognize us though for it is so long since the eruption of Mt. Salverino when we last seen his baby serpent."

They were all surprised to hear the Blanglomenian serpent give a grunt followed by utterance of wings which ended with their flapping back to their place once more. It gave Jennie a fascinating look, then suddenly let loose a deafening thunderous roar that appalled them all, and immediately five moderate sized Blanglomenians appeared and the little girls were at once surrounded.

At first some of the little girls were the object of this but nevertheless there was no impending harm for the little girls fell a mysterious rapture attending over them. Then suddenly every one of the serpents disappeared leaving the big one at its facing them. But nevertheless general Hanson picked up a parcel that rolled at his feet and opening it he saw within lettering which he could not read, but general Hanson was glancing at it in great amazement that he could read it so he took the offered roll in his own hands and intrinsically it read as follows:

"This is not Rover you are facing but one of the little serpents last seen during the eruption who has come to this business also. All failures of the Blanglomenians do to do harm to Violet and her sisters is on account of his secret protection. No more harm can come to them now and through the help of the 'angels' will come most their punishment, and no matter how often seen now there will soon come the moment when Blanglomenians will be in possession of the Blanglomenian themselves for the sake of their intervention in coming."

It was at general Hanson's orders that one of the serpents had been wounded by the wicked Blanglomenians for this serpent he learned was on its way to find the Blanglomenian girl who had been wounded. The next afternoon a man near to them, saw the attack and tried to defend the wounded man against three of the wicked Blanglomenians but was unsuccessful in stopping the cruel and sacrilegious. It was the gray boy scout uniform that deceived the serpent when it saw violet a approach and thinking her a Blanglomenian boy scout, the Blanglomenians worse enemies, unfortunately attacked her by mistake. Great was great gratefulness is shown by all the Blanglomenians serpents for this kind treatment of the wounded man and now for reward the Blanglomenian girls will be protected to the utmost by any of the Blanglomenian serpents and it will be seen also that their kind and loving guardian Jack Evans will settle with that one or brute general Hanson's Blanglomenian and from on no more suffering will be experienced by the Blanglomenian girls at the hands of the wily foe their protection will be tenfold and any rewards that try any more attempts on them hereafter will be shown by the power of his majesty our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. U

Baldwin then looked for the the serpent but he was still there there staring straight ahead of him and violet and her sisters feared feared him no more and were at the animals side in a moment.

At first general Hanson had expected it to be leaves but even when the arms were well on the march the serpent remained walking faster than the soldiers could run but halting every now and then to watch them go by. During the evening several rascally men managed to slip into the Christian lines without being detected, and also a into the sleeping quarters of Violet and her sisters Evans being with general Hanson just then. They found the little girls sound asleep in their beds and producing those horrible strangling instruments which Evans had taken from a same kind of rascal already previously told, which one slipped around a victim's neck slipped it around their necks and with quick left the place.

An hour later Evans returned and went to see the little beauties and found them all sitting up with a pair of Rosary beads in their possession.

"Where dear little girls where did you get those beautiful Rosary beads?" said Violet.

"On now Evans don't make off that you don't know," said Violet reproachfully. "It was you surely who slipped them around my neck or our necks when we were sleeping."

Evans was flabbergasted at those words. How did they suspect them of this kind deed.

"But my dear little Violet I'm really not fooling you at all," said Evans. "Why even your father could tell you that I was with him all this time."

"Well we were all as asleep," said Violet and felt someone putting something around our necks. It kind of tightened at first, and then, first awakening completely, found these on my neck, and saw my sisters with the same kind around their necks. If you did not give them to us then who did?"

"It's a mystery my dear," said Evans. "Maybe it was your brother."

"No," said Jennie. "He is sound asleep."

Evans looked at the little girls all so and then examined the Rosary beads. Never before had he seen anything like them, but was also astonished to find seven of those instruments resembling back collars, which had so horrified them, laying on the floor, only one which was whole, the other in fragments. Immediately he realized the truth as he had picked one of the good ones up. He examined it carefully and said to himself:

"I know the reason now. These were placed around their necks, by some sneaking enemies but on account of the firmer protection failed somehow to work the fragments being transformed into beautiful Rosaries. God has certainly worked a miracle. I'll remain here and wait for their return as I know they will expect to find them dead."

He bade the little girls good night, and pretended to leave the room, but nevertheless when the little girls laid down to sleep more he stole in softly and hid in the darkest corner. Three minutes later three strong men entered the room and hovered over Violet's bed. A low exclamation came from them.

"We did not put those beads there," said one. "How does it now failed?"

"Oh don't put those beads there," said another. "A strong knife may have cut those stranglers off. We can with our hands!"

Evans was almost blinded by something that looked like searchlight entering the bedroom window flashing full upon the rascals. At once Evans was among them, with leveled pistols at their heads.

"Who ever enters the bedroom of my best little girl friend friends without good intention never comes out a live." Said Evans enraged beyond endurance over the dastardly attempt. To that thought he attempted had failed. "You will go with me to general I--"

A loud barking thunderous roar that shook the building shook and aroused violet and her sisters and him also and glancing toward the window he saw the plengiglomenian serpent looking in his eyes lighting up the whole place with the glare.

"Oh I'll be relenting and allow you rascals to go free." Said Evans. "As I'm afraid you rascal rascals are too well protected, by the evil ones. No not by this door. By that window."

"B For goodness sake boy you are cruel." Cried one of the rascals. "To turn us over to that monster. Let us out by that door and we will reward you."

"Don't try any of that reward stuff on me." Hissed Evans, and don't boy me. "You attempted in the most cowardly manner to strangle the little girls and failed. I found the torn up instruments on the floor and know it was no human power who did it and trans formed some of the dangerous instruments into serpents. I laid in wait for the return of you rascals and got you now. It's either that window you three will go or my pistols will do what the plengiglomenians most dig delights. There is no escape from your punishment even if I let you out the door. Go out the door if you like. I'll allow you to go. ONE or so if you are really brave men as you try to make believe its the door or the window you will go through."

The rascals first strode toward the door and then the window but could not summon the courage to leap out for the monster. By the window and another by the door. They finally decided to risk the pistols than the fearsome creatures outside, and strode toward another doorway only to find Evans gone and their path blocked by another serpent which strove to thrust its head in at them, without breaking the room down. The rascals screamed shrilly with fright the monsters set up a terrific clamor, which awoke the little girls once more. The men saw the little girls sit up, and at once confessed to them what they had tried to do, imploring that they forgive them and save them from the plengiglomenians, and that they would never molest them then again, and lead better lives here after. At first the little girls were bewildered and seeing Evans, standing by their bed, wondered what it was all about. Evans told plainly what the rascals had attempted, declaring that probably their promises were only to get themselves free from the punishment, and that they did not mean all they said. Violet and her sisters knew that all glandelinian rascals hated like poison plengiglomenians, and that they would rather die than do so, and decided to put their promises to a test, for if the glandelinians were not sincere they themselves could not under any conditions save them from the peril they were in.

First violet asked:

"Who sent you men to assassinate us?"

"Germania vivian did." Was the hasty answer.

"We were forced to do it or lose our heads." Said the second one.

"What are you going to do then?" Asked violet. "You are placed between three fires. Two of my serpent friends want's you men for your attempt to strangle us, and Germania will put you to death for your failure. Who would you rather face? Germania or the plengiglomenian serpents?"

"I would rather face him." They yelled. "Oh please hasten."

"Well there is one thing that you glandelinians hates to do even to save your lives." Said Violet. "You know us well enough though. You only heard of us, and saw us only this once. There is only one chance than can save you three men, as we ourselves cannot do it under any conditions, as we have not the power to do so. And that is love us from your hearts, not merely from the lips, or because we are so pretty."

"No matter who they are I always forgive their wicked deeds, even Germania but if just punishments await them, and they are unrepenting I cannot save them then and neither can my sisters, though we forgive. Embrace us and kiss us in our hearts and you are safe from the wraiths of the monsters. Remember not merely doing this just to save yourselves yourselves for it won't work that way as the serpents can read every feeling on our faces, and they know whether it is sincere or not. It must be from true love. Otherwise so please to us in vain to save you."

And she stretched her beautiful arms toward one of the glandelinians. They at first hesitated, but nevertheless they had really been sent on the errand much against their will, had been glad that the instruments did not work, and though at first threatening to choke them with their hands the three men nevertheless and after having put the instruments on they had left, because they had been unable the horrible scene they expected would ensue. To them then violet standing on the bed with her arms outstretched looked like a small guardian angel beckoning the wicked sinner to repentance. They were intensely touched and picking up the scattered fragments of the things on the floor and taking from their possession others they had, they hurled them into the fire on the grate contemptuously and in a moment more had the little girls in a fond embrace. This scene touched Evans and he put away his pistols and noticing darkness found the most monsters gone. But even this relief did not change the repentant glandelinians who fairly embraced the little girls like loving parents and held them fast for a long time begging Evans to also forgive, then promising with a faithful vow that instead of going back to Germania they would help him to get the rascals and Germania and put him out of the way. Still holding the little girls closely two at a time, the glandelinians told him all about Germania, who he was where he was, how strong his army was, and of the easiest way to get the rascals. They also stated that if unrelenting armies were once cornered they could easily be captured or destroyed. How long they held the happy little girls in their true loving embrace it could not be told but Evans noticed that they were deep in the land of dream, and telling the men they placed the children on the bed and went out with Evans now friends for good. Three days had passed since this occurrence but the men were dead having given up their lives in the unsuccessful attempt of helping Evans get Germania. The rascal was not injured and his whole army during a frightful battle at Gromer Andean had been victorious.

CHAPTER FOUR

THE DISASTEROUS BATTLE OF GROMER ANDREAN, AND THE ROUT.

June 4th 1915.

Section 4 1917

At Gromer Andean general Jack Evans had been the main adversary against Germania vivian, general Robert Vivian having sent back Evans with a force larger than Germania's ten times his size with instructions to attack the foe and give no quarter until Germania was either killed or a prisoner. Violet and her sisters had accompanied him with general Vivian's permission. It had been a long march but never before general Jack Evans army arrived in the morning, and discovered that the main body of the German forces were at the lower portions of the village of Etrecia the advance guard being ten miles away on the west of the Gromer Andean junction, while to the east of the junction beyond Gromer Andean stood a spacious or orphan asylum built of wood, while opposite the orphan asylum in a field lay a strong concealed battery of over ten thousand machine guns. According to the plan of attack general Jack Evans main brigades, forty divisions under general Francis Wayne and reserve corps under general Joseph Sterling, were to march down the main axis and attack Germania left wing with the force of an avalanche, while simultaneously general Francis Armstrong with forty other divisions was to pass down the McColloster Run roads and capture the two villages falling upon the enemy's left and rear, general Francis with Stephen and McConwell with thirty divisions and a hundred squadrons of cavalry to attack the main right wing of the glandelinians, while generals Smallwood and Maryland and Francis German brigades were to make a circuit and attack the enemy in his main rear. The attack was to begin at all quarters at daybreak, many of the brigades having three days and nights march of it over rough roads to reach the scene of action, and when it began the smoke of firing was so fierce and thick that it resembled a heavy fog, which was only partly dispelled by the sun. The first attack fell upon the concealed batteries, Evans brigade with cavalry forces holding a good position and supported by Francis Wayne's divisions repulsed two general onslaughts of the enemy, and made a fruitful counter charge, Wayne attacking the foe's main wing, cutting it up, throwing it into confusion, and driving them back in panic.

They rallied, recoiled, rallied, and counter attacked, though the gallant christianians assaulted them with great fury resisting with ferocious gallantry, but at last again gave way and retreated, pursued hotly by general Francis Wayne. It was a terrible noise, the fog of smoke together with terrible explosions, and the crash of cannons and musketry making it almost as dark as night. Wayne pushing on for ten miles the whole of the enemy's advance being driven from its camping grounds leaving all their tents standing with all the baggage, the air becoming thicker and thicker with the smoke, scores of thousands of cannon roaring, musketry crashing like a million cannon, while the shouts of the soldiers, the swish of hundreds of thousands of sabres, the crack of multitudes of pistol shots, and the roar of mighty explosions helped to swell the tumult.

General Jack Evans was at the head of his main forces, cheering cheering them forward, the christian cavaliers being in the thickest of the hot bloody fight, germania appearing and urging his horse, full speed at Evans, their two swords coming together with a clash, ringing together with a tumult followed by a shower of sparks. Germania was nearly unseated, Evans having a wrist of iron, keeping his seat as though pinned to it. Evans recognized his assailant, and seemed to determine to get him now, the mishap of the poor little girls at Brigano, still rankling in his breast, and thirsting for more revenge, he quickly wheeled his horse making for germania once more their swords ring ringing together again and again, sending out showers of sparks, and with a clever turn of the wrist, he sent the villain's sabre flying out of his hand, and would have cut his enemy down in another instant before he had been able to draw his pistol but a rush of cavaliers accidentally intervened and in the melee germania escaped once again. In the meantime nothing could stand the impetuosity of the christian chivalry charge, the christian cavaliers dashing on slashing right and left, firing volleys, and keeping straight ahead, the enemy breaking into greater confusion and fleeing.

Nothing could stand that fierce onslaught the doughty general Black at the head of forty divisions of infantry three times tried with the fury of desperation to stop the wild progress of the christians but his army was annihilated, the others were scattered like chaff, forty other Glandelinian divisions were cut to pieces, and scattered, and the veteran general deeply chagrined found himself undone and his army caught in a trap, and so he was compelled to surrender. Above the hideous din of frightful battle, arose the triumphant war cries of the christians, wherever their banners waved, wherever their cries were heard, there the enemy fled in confusion the christians dashing on in their magnificent charge.

But just what happens to turn, what would have been a victory, into a disastrous defeat will perhaps never be known, as accounts always differ, and all the causes that were given were conflicting, but nevertheless such things always happen in war when a blunder occurs.

The charge of general Evans's army was most brilliant, the impetuosity of the great attack made by the various divisions, had in the beginning a great effect upon the wicked enemies of God, who had wavered and fled in sudden confusion, and through the fury of the battle, and the thickness of the smoke, and bewildered by the horrible din, strange misunderstandings ensued, a singular panic seeming to seize nearly the entire of general Evans's army, and at the very moment when victory seemed certain it was turned to rout and defeat.

In the first place general Musgraveton, fleeing before the victorious Abheannians had taken refuge in the abandoned orphan asylum barricading the doors and windows, a portion of the right grand division coming along, Musgraveton's Glandelinians at once opening fire upon them. Some of the christian officers were for pushing on and ignoring Musgraveton, but general Brothia upon objecting however, had a flag of truce sent to the orphan asylum with a summons to surrender, but the flag bearer was fired upon, and received a mortal wound, which made the christians furious and who cannons did the house, but being of both wood and stone it withstood the assault, and an attempt made to fire the basement at the same time was frustrated the soldiers being shot dead. A whole hour was spent in vain, and at last a division was left to guard the orphan asylum while the remainder of the force pressed forward, this delay however having disconcerted the attack, the division being separated into many quarters, and from each other, by the skirmishing attack upon the orphan asylum could not be reunited, the fog of smoke preventing anything being seen at a distance of thirty yards, and one part of the army mistaking the movements of the other, friends being mistaken for enemies, and a perfect panic ensued large numbers being shot down by their own comrades by mistake. Francis Wayne's division which had done noble work, became alarmed at the approach of a large body of Glandelinians which it mistook for foes in the haze of thick enemy smoke, and fell back in frightful confusion, in defiance of every effort to rally it everybody seeming to lose their heads, and the enemy recovering from its first surprise surprise had now advanced, general Grey bringing up the left wing, and pressing upon the christians as they receded, the whole christian army actually fleeing from its own victory. The reader who who has followed Evans's career in this bloody war certainly must know how chagrined he must have felt when he was compelled to sound the retreat. He did not really know the cause of the sudden defeat neither could he understand it any more than many others, but was obliged to yield to the force of overwhelming circumstances. General Wayne now rested upon his arms and turning his cannon upon the enemy committed great slaughter, the enemy being brought to a standstill at the same time that general Greenburg was keeping up a general running fight with them, and now for nearly five miles the retreat was continued while it continued. At other points to a distance of nearly twenty miles before most of the far scattered divisions were rallied. None of them could be rallied until they regathered until three days after the battle.

"What is the matter Evans what does it mean?" Asked Violet.

"I don't know I'm sure Violet, I cannot understand it."

"I'm sure I'm not supported and that now we could not contend with one half of the opposing army."

As far as it went up to now the losses had been inconceivably severe on both sides but the christian losses were twice heavier. Two of the christian generals Wayne and Green had been killed. Green had been severely wounded, and though now Evans was able to check the wild onrush of the victorious foe but there was no possibility of winning a victor victory now. Even after this severe defeat at Gromer and a general Jack Evans and his army had been attacking and harassing the foe, only to be forced again to attack in general before he wished to do so, owing to the fact that strong reinforcements were coming, for the sadly depleted Glandelinians the result being another severe and crushing defeat, but nevertheless learning from scouts that Vanley was moving toward him with his main forces Evans seeing his danger intended to head his new enemy off if possible, and bring about a general battle with him, as he was sure he had an army large enough to cope with Vanley, but in order to make sure in doing this and to bring Vanley to speedy terms he realized it would be advisable to secure the co-operation of general Hanson and Vivian his superior superiors, and Evans had written a letter of Mayford ordering him to get around and head Vanley's army off and get Rudolph Maro Marionia to help him and he asked a volunteer who would carry the letter and deliver it to general Mayford. The scouts who had brought the news regarding Vanley's army had said that the country all around was swarming with Glandelinian boyscouts, that it would be hard and dangerous work to get through them, as they were thicker than fleas on a dog's back and so now when a general asked for a volunteer to carry the letter there was no response, the men looking at one another inquiringly and as no one spoke, or offered to volunteer for the dangerous service, general Evans looked a little around him inquiringly, and still as no one spoke or seemed all eager to offer their services he looked disappointed.

"Men!" He said "I know that this is a dangerous service, that I wish done, and for that reason I exceedingly desire to select any man and order him to do the work. And therefore I have asked for a volunteer as I trust that this letter should be placed in Mayford's hands at the earliest moment."

Still there was no response the soldiers only looking at one another but no one seemed willing to offer his services. The greater number looked somewhat shamefaced, but it was evident that not one cared to undertake such dangerous service, evidently being more willing to take their chances of being chosen by lot than to offer their services freely. Again, and again Evans swept the faces of his men who still remained silent, and in a disappointed tone of voice he asked: "Will no one volunteer?" The soldiers remained silent.

"I exceedingly dislike to do such a thing," said Evans gravely. "But if no one does not wish to volunteer it shall be under the necessity of appointing the vivian girls who would shame you all!" There was no response.

"Very well," Grinly. "I was only fooling about the vivian girls. I shall at once proceed to select one of you lieutenants by lot. You—"

"Wait Evans." Spoke spoke up Violet suddenly entering. "If you are willing I shall be glad to carry the letter to general Mayford."

Evans whirled toward the open doorway staring at her in amazement her eyes shining with eagerness and excitement. Indeed Evans was pleased with his little girl, but though he hated to take the responsibility of sending her and her sisters on such a dangerous journey nevertheless the letter must be delivered to general Mayford, if such a thing was possible and since none of his men were willing to undertake the dangerous task, he was inclined to accept her offer, knowing it was more perilous for the foe, to tackle the wily Vivian girls as it was for them to tackle the enemy. After pondering a few moments he said:

"My dear little Violet, you and your sisters are brave little noble hearted girls, and while I dislike to dispose of you and your sisters to such dangers, as will be your position when you go on this journey I think I shall have to accept your offer with thanks. But for fear you little girls may be taken prisoner on the way though I know you could escape with your clever ways, I shall tell you the contents of this letter, and then in case you should be captured or threatened with death you can destroy this letter, and keep it from falling into the enemy's hands, and also to blow this whistle which I will give you three times. It will surely insure your safety. I'll bring you an amount of longionsan serpents you want."

Then he told Violet the contents of the letter, and she said she would remember it and if the need arose would destroy the letter or blow the whistle. She placed the whistle in her breast pocket and the message in the bosom of her dress and with a cheery good bye to all she and her sisters rode away. Nevertheless the little girls had vague feelings that danger was threatening the moment they were far from the Christian lines. Violet felt of the letter in the bosom of her dress and decided that if the need arose she would manage to destroy the tell tale document. Presently they came to a dry swamp through which the road ran where undergrowth and bushes were thick, and the little girls felt that if there were any Glandelinians boyscouts in the vicinity, here was where they might expect to meet them. Closer and closer the little girls drew to the crossroads, and deeper grew the feeling that some danger threatened and they prayed.

But nevertheless Violet and her sisters were sensible little girls and they shrugged their shoulders and tried to dismiss the feeling, but still it clung to them and they could not shake it off. They spoke to their horses occasionally for they wanted to hear their voices in the swamp, as this swamp seemed to be a very lonesome place indeed. Then Violet hummed the air of some song, that her mother used to sing to her, and though this seemed to divert her mind a bit, the feeling of depression remained with her.

Presently Violet and her sisters caught sight of a house standing over on the edge of what looked like a large river, while they also saw that there was another road crossing the one they were traversing. And just as they noticed this fact, six gray coated soldiers instead of boy boyscouts leaped out from behind some bushes, followed by some others, surrounding the little girls and stopping their horses. Violet realizing that they might get the letter written by Evans tore it into bits, swallowing the fragments of paper in her desperation, and when the men made them dismount and search them they found no evidence, and then suddenly the little girls broke away from their captors mounted their horses and tried to escape but the soldiers made a rush to stop them but the little girls fired a volley without much expectation of hitting the Glandelinians but they were successful in bringing down every man that was nearest the survivors rushing for shelter.

None of those shot were killed, however, and terrible groans of pain went up from the wounded men as the little girls dashed on.

A few minutes later when the little girls had gone on for about half a mile another gang of graycoats leaped out in front of them stopped their horses, and jerked the little girls out of the saddles making them prisoners in a jiffy, though the little girls struggled as fiercely as possible biting and kicking, but with two men each having hold of them the little girls were powerless and had to give in the rascals hustling the little girls along through the timber one of their number bringing up the rear leading the horses, and half an hour of this brought them to a large Glandelinian camp which stood on the bank of the same stream a low house being close to the water's edge and here the child prisoners were brought the little girls being told to sit down. The little girls did so surveying the men with interest, and deciding that they were as about rough mannered Glandelinians as they had seen in a long time. They surrounded little Jennie in particular after having taken Violet's whistle from her, glancing at little Jennie nervously. The leader who was a blue lieutenant shaking his finger at Jennie and saying:

"You have got to answer a few nagging questions."

"Ask your questions and then I'll see about answering them." Said Jennie.

"All right but don't get snappy young kid." I want you to know where general Vivian's army is?"

"I couldn't tell you."

"You mean to say you don't know?"

"Yes."

"Bah you simply have made up your mind that you are not going to tell but you had better, or you'll wish you had."

Jennie said nothing.

"Is general Vivian and his army coming down toward Crosser Andean to help general Jack Evans worse Germania or capture him there?"

Jennie shook her head.

"I can't tell you a word." She said.

"You mean that you won't say?"

"Yes you can have it that way if you want to, for it does no good for me to say anything for I see you have made up your minds to assassinate us the moment I or my sisters spoke up."

"And with good reason you little gutter snipe. But whether we kill you or not, you have got to tell me all you know, about general Vivian or his army or we will pull your entrails out of you alive."

"I have nothing to tell."

You mean it?"

"Yes."

"You had better think it over a while before deciding positively you little fool and centepede."

"I don't need to do that. I shall tell you assassins nothing."

"You'd better."

"NO."

The lieutenant turned to his companion giving an order, one bringing a rope the leader rigging a noose in one end and placing it over Jennie's head the other little girls making no attempt to keep him from doing so so or Jennie either, as they knew they were helpless, and it would be folly to try and offer resistance to the others' actions.

"That is sensible to sit quiet and make no fuss." Said the Glandelinian officer apparently and approvingly and as he threw the loose end of the rope over a beam that extended across the room, and handing it to some of the men told them to pull it taut and stand ready to haul the little girls into the air when he gave the word and they pulled the rope taut.

"Stand up kid I want to see your neck." Said the ruffian to Jennie.

Poor Jennie obeyed.

"Are you going to tell me what us Glandelinians want to know?"

Jennie shook her head.

"I have nothing to tell." She said quietly.

The ruffianly graycoat glared at her.

"Maybe because you think because you got the guardian angles to protect you we don't mean what we say." He growled. "Maybe you think we don't dare to hang you, hey you little snakes and centepedes!"

"I have no doubt but what you are capable of an alone at almost anything unless the angles help me, and they can if they want to or are ordered to. You may hang me and my sisters because I won't tell you but though I don't want to die that way, I must say again that I have nothing to tell you."

The ruffian gave utterance to an exclamation of rage and vexation.

"Pull the little centepede onto her toes." He commanded to his companions. "Give her a taste of how the rope feels, when it's chok checking the breath out of her body."

The ruffianly Glandelinians pulled slowly and steadily, dear drawing Jennie onto her tip toes, and only when he made a gesture did the ruffianly Glandelinians stop pulling.

"Can you talk?" Asked the lieutenant.

"A little." Replied Jennie in a rather choked voice.

"Are you ready to tell us Glandelinians what we want to know?"

"I have told you several times already, that I have nothing to tell."

An angry exclamation escaped the lieutenant's lips.

"You are about as stubborn a kid as I have ever run across in a long long time. "He cried. "Pull her clean off from her feet about ten feet off the floor. "He cried to his men. "But soon if a good chocking will make her open up and talk some."

The ruffians pulled poor Jennie clean off the floor to the height of ten feet and she hung there a few seconds, gasping and struggling the sense of strangulation being upon her, and it was a terrible one indeed. A gesture from their leader, and the men lowered Jennie till her groupin feet touched. She was still coughing and gasping however, and the head ruffian stepped forward and loosened the rope, so Jennie was able to recover her breath....there being a dark red spot or streak around her little neck it being the imprint of the rope.

"Will you tell us now?" Asked the lieutenant.

"No!" Screamed Jennie as she saw the distressed look of her sisters.

"Do your worse you cowardly scoundrels. And let me tell you something you devils. You will be hunted down and killed like like dogs for this murder. I and my sisters have friends and comrades who think much of us and only the lives of every one of you devils will satisfy them."

"Bah you centepedes can't scare us." Sneered the lieutenant. "We ain't afraid of your friends or comrades and never will be. If we were afraid what do you expect to see us in the army for. Ho the very god in heaven you worship has our defiance. And he has no power to save you centepedes, and if you ain't going to tell us what we want to know then it's up you will go again with your beastly sisters also, and this time to stay. Quick are you not going to tell us especially where you and the other little girls were going when we nabbed you?"

"NO."

YOU ARE NOT!"

"I SAID NO!"

"UP WITH HER BOYS." Yelled the ruffianly lieutenant.

Chapter 15

God CAN SAVE VIOLET AND HER SISTERS.

But just as the scoundrels were about to surge down on the rope and pull little Jennie up into the air, there came a terrible roaring of wind outside there came a sudden quivering of the cabin, as even to the floor of the earth, and then with a suddenness that was bewildering, as if it was terrifying, the cabin floor of earth, and all were sent tumbling, sliding, grinding, crashing down into the whirling waters of the Eryine, un u niver, a few yells of consternation coming from the Glandelinians as they struck the water and went under, their cries being promptly smothered. Jennie went down with the others, she of course being in much worse condition than they for the reason that her arms were bound together behind her back, her sisters as the house went to fragments being carried and rolled into a ravine by the cyclone, which blew all the tents of the camp away, scattering the contents, cannons and soldiers, killing thousands, and wounding scores of thousands. Jennie with the rope around her neck went into the water up to her waist at the crumbling dirt pouring all around her holding her there fast embedded in dirt to her arm pits while on either side of her, were logs which had also failed to float away only a portion of them being in the water.

2 Amid the deafening uproar of the screaming tempest which was hurling the trees down by the thousands per second, came gasping purlin gurling cries for help, while suddenly as a tree fell near her, the thrashing her severe ly with its wildly writhing and squirming branches, swishing back and forth, and vibrating like wires, in the force of the hurricane, Jennie felt as pull at the rope which was still around her neck, the pull tightening the rope and choking her somewhat. A feeling of horror came over her. Was she to be choked to death after all and in the midst of this shrieking screaming hurricane? She even wondered if a human being had grabbed hold of the rope or whether a log had got got wrapped up in its folds. Harder and harder came the pull on the rope, and so tight grew the noose around her neck that she found it hard to draw her breath. Suddenly a bright flash of lightning enabled her to see that two of the ruffians had hold of the rope and who were struggling with each other over who should retain hold of the life line, and both lost their hold locked in each others embrace struggling fiercely and they went floating down the stream. Slowly the time rolled on, the hurricane increasing so wildly that the din almost deafened her. One, two, three, four, five, and six hours passed. The storm was a screaming fury it was raining and hailing in torrents and then an unpleasant surprise aroused her for the water of this treacherous stream was rising, it having been first up to her waist, but now it was nearly up to her arm pits. It was only rising slowly, but slowly surely. Jennie saw, and at the rate it was coming up that it would be over her head in about three hours. The horrors of her situation struck her with full force and for a few minutes she was almost paralyzed and though she struggled fiercely to work herself loose, it was to no avail-----she could-----not do it-----and even to dull for help was useless for who could hear her---amid the screaming of the wild screaming of the hurricane raging about her and now at its worst?

And indeed it would be a terrible death to be forced to die. Buried in up to her nupts in dirt and water, with her arms bound together behind her back and a rope around her neck, it would be a death far removed from any she would have chosen. Had she known she really had to die. Death in battle or in any other way would not be so bad. But this kind of death was something terrible.

Despite the thought that she couldn't be heard, she was like a drowning man clutching at a straw, and she screamed loudly again and again for help. But only the lashing of the water, the crash of falling trees, and the screaming of the wind was all that she heard. Slowly the waters crept higher being now almost up to Jennie's shoulders. She frantically kept working her body back and forth, in the hope that the water would soften the dirt and make it possible to extricate herself but to no avail. And again and again since the storm was abating now, she called for help her voice ringing out loudly, but then she realized that no one even if they heard could stand up to face that screaming gale, and realized that all was surely lost this time. Jennie as well as her sisters had been in many tight places before, and she was not disposed to give up all hope even now, when the chances of her being rescued were so slim as to be scarcely worthy of consideration. The storm was almost a lull by this time and again she lifted up her voice and called out:

"For God's sake, have pity on me someone. Help! Help! Help!"

Then she listened intently eagerly but there was no response and she realized that at this hour when the storm had committed such devastation, that there was not one chance in ten thousand that any one even a Glandelinian would be abroad, the Glandelinians evidently having been all drowned, or else having been carried far down the stream and had not thought it worth while to return in the face of such a screaming gale now past, knowing anyhow anyway that the cabin had been destroyed, and the camp with all its contents swept away by the wind.

Jennie had about made up her mind that she was doomed but with the tenacity of desperation she would hang onto HOPE, to the last moment, and again she called out loudly desperately:

"HELP. HELP. HELP."

Suddenly her heart gave a great leap, and then stood still a moment to go churning along again immediately afterwards with renewed vigor, for standing on the bank were her dear sisters on their horses, one of the little girls having a rope in her hands.

Jennie shouted aloud with joy:

"Thank Heaven." She cried. "I'm to be saved by my own dear sisters."

"Look out sisters she." She called out. "That bank is crumbling, and you will slide down into the river."

"All right we will look out." Cried Violet in answer. "Are you in quicksand?"

"No I'm imbedded in dirt and water up to my shoulders, and as my hands are tied I can't dig myself out, and the water is rising fast."

Violet and Joyce came carefully down the loose dirt straight toward Jennie, and soon all of her sisters were tearing away at the dirt in an effort to get their sisters arms free. They kept tearing a way, telling where the wind had thrown them, and soon their combined efforts had the dirt dug out and was able to pull Jennie. Jennie's arms up and then untying it and taking off the rope from her neck and arms began to tug and pull, Jennie her arms free helping all she could, and they soon had the satisfaction of knowing that they had gotten her body pretty well loosened, the little girls standing with their feet on a couple of the logs that had not been washed away, and having Jennie under the arms, and as Jennie helped all she could they soon had better success her body coming up several inches. Again and again they exerted all their strength and thistle her body came up a foot or more, and as the little girls pulled and tugged with all their might night again, Jennie succeeded in getting free, and proceeded to climb slowly and wearily up the sloping embankment of loose dry dirt, the little girls going with her until they reached the level ground and then Jennie got on her horse almost exhausted, and covered with mud and slime and once more they resumed their way still undaunted by their second experience.

Joice had been the one who removed the noose from Jennie's neck. After traveling over debris strewn roads for about a mile or so, the little girls suddenly heard the sound of footsteps and whirled to find themselves almost in the clutches of a regiment of Mandelinians mostly German scouts who had been close at hand, and who had rushed forward on hearing the sound of tramping horses.

"Surrender yet me hands." yelled the leader of the graycoats. But the little girls were not of the surrendering kind, and they wheeled their horses quick as a flash, and dashed away the Mandelinians suddenly fell delivering a ringing volley that brought down every one of the horses the little girls were riding on one of the bullets whistling so close to Violet's ear that she felt the wind, and heard the whistle of the ball and the Mandelinians yelling triumphantly being almost upon the little girls, who leaped in among the foliage darting from tree to tree, the Mandelinians firing continually but in vain.

Then in the pause the little girls took aim at the nearest approaching graycoats, their aim being straight to the mark and seven of the graycoats dropped. Frightful volleys were fired by the Mandelinians in return, and hundreds of bullets slipped, and thudded in the vicinity of the little girls one bullet hitting the tree behind which Jennie stood. Then in the next lull of the firing the little girls dropped on their hands and knees and made all haste possible and when they had gone about thirty yards they arose and darted away, on the run hoping that their retreat would not be discovered for a few moments, but their hopes were not as yet realized, for sudden yells and firing was heard, and glancing back saw them coming.

The little girls ran as fast as they could but the pursuers were not close enough to do any damage with their muskets and pistols and after the chase went on for several minutes, the Mandelinians were amazed to find themselves losing ground on mere children, and finally becoming winded they dropped back the little girls having escaped the Mandelinians a third time. For the rest of their journey Violet and her sisters met no more disturbances, the Mandelinian boyscouts knowing them well, and not daring to interfere with their journey and toward evening of the next day after traveling and all day they came within sight of general Mayford's lines.

The sentries never saw these human celestial beings, one of which was covered with dried mud, and at first mistook them for their own guardian angels in disguise, but learning soon that they were the Vivian girls they were so welcomed so heartily and requested that they remain over night.

The little girls were brought before general Mayford, who of course did not know them, though not mistaking them for celestial children, as the sentries did. Nevertheless he received them warmly, thinking they were little child refugees fleeing from the enemy but Violet said:

"We were sent by general Evans to tell you that the Manleys, have escaped general Vivian's armies, and are moving upon Gromer Andream to reinforce the besieged Mandelinians there. He wishes you to intercept the three Manleys, if possible until general Vivian can come to give battle, and keep them from reaching Gromer Andream."

The great general marvelled. He couldn't conceive how mere little girls could expose themselves to such peril when it was known on all over that the Mandelinians would butcher little children on sight.

He even wondered how they even managed to reach his lines safely when the foe were scouring the whole region, in an endeavor to capture or slay the little girls called the Vivian girls, and not knowing that they were the Vivian girls who stood before him he said:

"You little children must have indiscriminate nerve to go through all the peril you did. And were you not afraid? And did you see any of the foe?"

"We were captured once but not away from them." Answered Joice.

My name is Joice Vivian, and there are my sisters. We are known known as the Vivian girls. S. S. Girls."

General Mayford gave an exclamation of pure surprise. It was the first time he had ever seen the Vivian girls though he had heard lots about them. He felt awed in their presence, but nevertheless he learned from all them all they had experienced, and told them that if he could help it, the Manleys would never reach Gromer Andream. Early the next morning the little girls under a strong escort of soldiers left the camp to go back to general Vivian's army, which was now rejoined in the morning after having been unsuccessful against Germania. The little girls finding Jack Evans, and then heard from him the whole story how the battle of Gromer Andream which had started on May 10th had raged so long. In the meantime the thirty first of May was drawing near, and hearing of a great procession that was to be held among the Christian camps on that day in honor of the Blessed Virgin Mother Violet and her sisters decided to join. Violet being the one to crown the head of the statue of the Mother of God. Violet was happy when she was appointed, and though the next day was to be the last of May she felt that day would never come. Many Manleys had in the meantime arrived within the location of Gromer Andream with his greatly reinforced army of what had been once his and depleted army, and though finding himself between three fires, Manley was not the one to run and thirsting for revenge over his bitter success of defeat at the battle of Francis-Atlanta he decided to harness his way out of the trap he had run into, and hearing of the May Day procession that was to be held Manley decided to see to it that the Blessed Virgin should never be crowned by any of Violet and her sisters or the Christian dog as he called them, and also to wait until the procession was at their height, kill all in the procession, with his far reaching guns slay the Vivian girls and priest if possible the latter which may be of offering Benediction at the time, destroy the statue of the Blessed Virgin, and launch a sweeping assault while confusion reigned over the tragedy. He knew that it would be wiser to attack simultaneously for he knew the sacrilege would enrage the Christian generals to the highest pitch, and so terribly that he would have no show if they went on the rap rampant first.

Jack Evans went out scouting that afternoon and was discovered by the Mandelinians and chased for twenty miles, without the slightest success in even gaining within pistol range of him, and suffering heavy loss in the bargain at the hands of the general who shot them down one by one with a musket he had with him at the time.

WAS EVANS A HUMAN FIEND TO THE MANDELINIANS, OR WAS HE TOO MUCH OF A GUY FOR THEM.

They never saw such a desperate fugitive before, even Violet and her sisters were not like him, and though they chased him over bridges, roads, and even hills, and through a town, they finally managed to overtake him, only to find themselves prisoners in his hands instead, the general suddenly surprising them, and making prisoners of all of them, single handed, and marching them back to his own camp under cover of the two thrifty forty fours.

"You are what they call a Christian dog, but nevertheless you are more daring than the Vivian girls and deserve my friendship hereafter for your cleverness and bravery." Said one of the lieutenant lieutenants with admiration. "Here we are thirty to your one, and yet you capture us when only a fugitive at our hands. We certainly call that bravery and no mistake. This shows that God really protects you faithful servant of his and hereafter if we are free again and see any of our comrades pursuing the Vivian girls we will save them if we have to assassinate the brutes to do so."

Evans knowing the character of this man from these words and his face at once set him free, for reward, praising him for his bravery and perseverance in trying to catch him but the others were so scared and so as they only scowled and threatened he marched them hastily into camp.

It was during the same afternoon after two o'clock when Evans again went out scouting undaunted by his first experience, but having a party of men with him this time, and hearing such suspicious sounds like horses approaching, Evans hearing being most acute, he ordered his his men to draw up, under under the tree s of the road, the order being quickly obeyed. The men keeping themselves back far enough so as not to be observed and yet close enough as to be able to make a sudden dash when the body of horsemen advancing should appear, and they drew back until they were pretty near hidden, so that any body of men coming along at a rapid pace would not be a pt to see them. If they came at a moderate pace however, they would likely to discover them. Having disposed his men in this manner, Jack Evans rode ahead cautiously, presently beholding a column of Glandelinian (Gargolians), approaching at a fair speed, there being more than two thousand of them on horseback, under general Mc-Federalson.

He rode back and reporting what he had seen, decided to capture the entire lot, and took his place beside Captain Dick Slater and lieutenant Estrabrook. The tramp of the horses was soon plainly heard, and soon in a few minutes the flash of their brass and golden golden accoutrements could be readily seen, the hooded Glandelinians riding in a solid body four abreast, making a good appearance, and having no suspicion of the danger that lurked so near them, they came on entering the two lines of the Alliance cavarly.

"FORWARD," cried Evans.

The christian soldiers immediately advanced, till they were in plain sight of the Gargolians, the two lines extending ahead of and behind the graycoats.

"HALT!" cried Evans.

The two lines paused.

"Take aim in the rear and front."

Three thousand three score of muskets were leveled at the astonished Glandelinians, while across the road in front of them were three hundred other christian horsemen in red uniforms, these being the same number as those blocking the road in the rear, the graycoats halting suddenly with curses.

"By jove we must cut our way out," cried lieutenant general Nolan Stanek in charge of the cavarly division.

"HALT!" cried Evans. "I'm general Jack Evans of the twenty fourth cavarly and infantry divisions of Conscientians. I suppose you have heard of me. So if you are unwise enough to make a move you will all be cut down. Us Conscientians don't fo' fool with you child butchers."

Then Jack Evans advanced.

"By jove you christians are daring fellows," said the lieutenant general.

"Don't you know truth truthfully that there is a force of one hundred one hundred fifteen thousand more not a quarter of a mile away, on another road coming the toward us?"

"Ho," said Evans. "Neither do I believe it. Up with your hands every one of you! I don't think you want to be slaughtered."

Up went every hand in the troop and every man was quickly disarmed.

"Ready," said Evans. "Two abreast general. Close in on both flanks. Forward quick march."

The graycoats rode between a closed line of Allianceans, with a solid body before and behind, the whole troop dashing on, taking the captured Gargolians the fiercest of all the Glandelinians with them. The capture of the Gargolians had been very cleverly managed, having taken a very little time in its accomplishment, being altogether a wonderful affair, for not a shot had been fired, and not a blow had been struck, the surprise having been complete.

EVANS MEETS THE HANLETS AND CLASHES WITH THEM FACE TO FACE TO FACE.

Stopping for a moment to enter a tavern Evans was suddenly confronted by general John Manet, and his father and son, who tried to capture him, but Evans seized a heavy rocking chair in one hand and smashing out one of the windows, and then hurling the chair from him toward the door where the three general generals stood, and down went the Glandelinians chieftains on confusion and in a confused heap, upon the floor. At the same time the door was thrown open, and in hurried five other generals, including Mc-Whither with them, only to be accidentally overthrown by the christian officers as they slipped.

floor Evans having escaped from the front of the broken window and fell onto his horse and leading away Francis column, a party of Glandelinians on the other side of the house, seeing him and dashing swiftly toward him. They were sure they would speedily overtake him, the Glandelinians urging their horses to their utmost, resolving not to let him escape, but suddenly his men saw them coming and then all at once the overconfident Glandelinians found themselves opposed by a force three times their numbers, and were thrown into confusion in the melee, some of their horses dashing straight on, some swerving to the right or to the left, and went jumping into the ditches or over the fence. The others were gotten under control and away flew the astonished Glandelinians now doing their best to save themselves instead of trying to capture Evans. The enemy were in such haste to escape that Evans actually pursued them for half a mile alone before they discovered it. Then he paused, and then as he wheeled and started back he laughed until he nearly fell from his saddle. The house was surrounded by the party of christians, but the general officers had also gone so they all went back toward the camp. For a time now nothing else happened and Evans's column with their ten thousand prisoners, rode on at a hurried pace, with nothing to worry them, but just as they reached the top of a hill lieutenant art said suddenly with a salute:

"Look there general Evans. That looks like a large detachment of Omarian gurdies."

"So it does," said lieutenant art.

At the foot of the hill a road intersected the one they were on and riding along this road but still at some distance of the crossing was a troop of Glandelinian horsemen nearly twenty thousand in number, their peculiar green uniforms which was easily seen at that distance showed them to be Omarian gurdies under general Francis Ferner.

"Forward all of you, and guard to the prisoners in the inner column!" shouted Evans. "We must reach the crossing ahead of those desperate Omarian gurdies by all means."

Down the hill charged the whole christian column their steeds snorting with excitement, and the Glandelinians seeing them coming, and knowing it to be a triumph to head off the christians, dashed for the crossing, urging their horses to the utmost. Evans calculated the distance with his eye and saw that the graycoats were somewhat nearer to the crossing than he was, but nevertheless his men were going at a faster pace.

"Forward faster he shouted."

Down the hill they raced, the Glandelinians doing their best to reach the crossing first, so as to cut them off, and if they reached the crossing, even if they did not stop there, they might do some mischief as the christian troops swept by, and now it began to look as if the two parties would come together.

"V Charge," cried Evans. "Fire as you pass them."

The Glandelinians were now drawing their sabres evidently intending to charge upon the christians, the two detachments dashing on, each column reaching the crossing as at the same moment.

"Fire," roared Evans.

As they swept by each cavarly man swung half around on his saddle, and discharging his piece, the volley being a tremendous one, every man hitting his mark, and three thousand saddles were emptied, simultaneously scores of others wavering in their saddles. The Glandelinians had evidently not expected that the christian troopers could fire while dashing on at such a terrific speed, and before the surviving Glandelinians recovered themselves, the Angelinians were gone, the graycoats having been unable to make their charge as they expected.

They followed on behind the christian troopers hoping to do some execution to pay for the blow received, but as Evans did not care to engage in a struggle at that time especially on account of all the prisoners he had with him who would escape during the melee, and being satisfied at having escaped so well without a single loss he resumed his retreat, and soon all that the graycoats could see of them was the dust they left behind, and abandoned the pursuit. Evans, nick Slater, lieutenant Patrabrook, and Captain Gero George riding far ahead of the main column, leaving them about a few hundred yards behind, suddenly turned a bend in the road and came upon four Glandelinian generals riding along leisurely, the two parties halting in front of each other.

"You are out scouting no doubt!" said Evans.

"I do not discuss my affairs too christian down," said the leader of the party so curtly.

"But the christian does as you pleased to call us, may I take you prisoners if you are not more civil?" Said Evans.

"What an equal number of christian dogs capture a party of Glandelinian soldiers! Impassible. Why you would need ten times as many."

"Well we have more than that not far away." Said Evans. "And if you will wait a few minutes we will accommodate you."

The Glandelinian generals looked greatly surprised, and Evans at once knew that this was all of the party.

"You will have to catch us first." Said the Glandelinian officer.

"Halt." Cried Evans as the officer started to wheel his horse.... the other christian officers drawing their pistols in an instant. Lieutenant Estrabrook and the rest knew just what Evans would do and the instant he spoke they drew their pistols.

"Make another move and you are dead men." Said Evans. "I will show you that half of us, or one of us even can capture your whole band."

The faces of the four generals turned sickly yellow as they found themselves looking into the muzzle of the four pistols.

"Put up your pistols boys."

The christian officers obeyed.

"Get off your horses." Evans said to the Glandelinian officers. He being able to hit at least two of them at once, and none of them knew which one it might be, and obeyed promptly.

"Come out here and throw down your pistols."

The command was given in a tone that demanded instant obedience. The Glandelinian generals threw down their weapons.

"Now go and stand at the side of the road, and if one of you runs he will get a bullet into him."

The order was obeyed.

"Take the reins of the four horses captian later." Said Evans.

He then whistled sharply and in a minute the party with the prisoners came up.

"Here are four Glandelinian generals whom I have taken boys." He said. "Do we want them?"

"No." Was the universal answer.

"You see we have no use for you generals, as we have too many prisoners already." Said Evans. "Next time you will have a better opinion of christian soldiers, if you can get rid of your overwhelming conceit. You may go but we will retain your horses. Forward boys."

Fifteen minutes later the christian force reached the main line with their prisoners, Evans turning them over to general Vivian. That evening Jack Evans learning that the Glandelinians had erected a line of fortifications within plain sight, for some suspicious reasons, was alarmed over threatening danger hovering over the vivian girls and decided to capture them before they were half finished. He led forward a large force of christians about 40,000 in number and his assailing parties were well upon the outworks before they were discovered by general Moltes Glandelinians. There was a fierce skirmish with the pikets for a while, then the Angelinians charged with the bayonet driving everything before them, the pickets discharging their muskets and arousing the garrison, there being a terrific uproar in an instant and a battle equal to the battle of Bull Run in the Civil war raged. The works were manned very hastily for there was no time to be lost, hundreds of great cannons began to thunder, and the musketry to crash and roar, as the christians advanced charging with the bayonet. Though thousands were mowed down in killed and wounded, the survivor only rushed on with great impatience, carrying everything before them, surmounting every obstacle, nothing seeming to be able to hold them back. At the inner abatis where the firing upon the Glandelinian position was unspenkably terrific and deadly, general Evansville Wayne who was with the right column received a mortal wound, Jack Evans himself received a contusion on the head from a spent ball, and Captain Glaser was killed. At the same moment general Flattery entered and struck the Glandelinian flag, and fell headlong with a bullet in his hand.

Genr General Honey sprang to the ramparts and as he shouted

"Hurrah the fort is ours." Fell mortally wounded. The desperate attack received a bloody repulse, ten thousand christians having fallen within one hour and a number were the best officers. This is known as the battle of Fort Molten. Though General Jack Evans was injured, his injuries however was no not severe enough to hinder him and that evening he was with the little girls again, with a bandage around his head.

At their inquiries Evans told them about the engagement at the fortifications, that were being erected within sight of the christian lines, and though they felt saddened over the failure, they quickly overcame their sadness and turned their attentions on the more OVERCAME their remorse and turned their attentions on the more morrow. It was from this fortification that the morrows horrible sacrelege was committed by the Glandelinians.

"I hardly can't wait until to morrow morning." Said Violet nestling her head against his breast. "I think it will be the happiest moment in our lives."

Evans felt the same and decided that they had best retire early and go to sleep and that would make the day come closer.

..... Chapter THE HORRIBLE SACRELEGE! l.k.

Morning dawned, bright, calm, and sultry. There was a peaceful stillness in the air, a stillness unlike anything before, not a cloud was in the sky, and the scenery of the green meadow, the blossoms on the blossoms on the trees, and in the fields made it seem as if there was no war raging at all. It was May the Thirty First, and the morning the procession was to be held as there would be no time for it in the evening.

Everything had been placed in readiness, the statue of Our Blessed Mother had been put in the desired location, and several rude altars had been hastily erected. Violet and her sisters waited almost impatiently for the approach of the hour it was to start. They looked for Jack Evans that morning at four o'clock finding him with general Hanson who had come from his lines to see his brother about the situation at Cromer. And at their approach Evans bowed himself from the presence of the two great generals, and walked with the little girls down a road having Violet and Catherine by the hand.

"Who is going to carry the banner during the procession?" Asked Catherine.

"I was requested to." Said Evans. "But if one of you little girls would like to--"

"Oh that's all right." Said Jennie. "We wanted you to carry it. We are going to do the singing with the sisters and other children that will be in the procession. We just wanted to know, for if you did not carry the banner we would wonder who would be doing it."

"And who is going to do the crowning?" He asked.

"Violet is." Said Catherine. "We voted that she should."

"Won't that be grand?" Said Evans. "I'll be present to witness it."

They continued their stroll until they reached the heart of the christians line and then coming to a long log they all sat down, Evans in the center. Violet herself was sitting next to Evans and said:

"I heard you were chased by a party of Glandelinians yesterday, and captured those who chased you single handed. Is that true?"

"I am sure I'll have to say yes." Laughed Jack Evans. "Besides recaptured a whole division of ten thousand Gargolians with my three thousand three score of men, dashed past a division of Gargolian Cavalry who tried to reach ahead of me to intercept me and made four Glandelinian generals give up their pistols and horses single handed also. I also had a brush with the three Glandelinian leaders. And I mean they won't forget me in a hurry. I knocked them down with a heavy club."

"You had better look out for them or they will get you yet." Said Joice with a warning look. "Those three Glandelinian chiefs mean business when aroused."

"I would have mean business myself if a troop had not pursued me from around the house." Answered Evans. "I would have taken the Manlyes along with me and then their armies being leaderless would have to give in."

"I believe you are too reckless." Sighed Violet. "You are doing it all on account of us no doubt. We are nothing but mere children children and besides--"

"You are more than mere children." Said Evans grabbing her in his arms. "With your pure hearts, and beauty you little girls imitate the blessed Virgin herself. So why shouldn't I do it for you little girls?"

"Do what?" Asked Violet.

"Just what you mentioned."

"But that honor is your and not ours." Said Violet. "We did not do it." Evans laughed.

"You don't get what I mean." He said. "I meant what I did. Capturing the troops, felling the pursuers, and taking things away from the wicked Glandelinian generals."

"But why did n you not capture the Manleys?" Asked Daisy. "You had your squadron with you, and could have captured those persons."

"I was leaving the house alone at the time during the excitement itself," Said Evans. "My squadron at the time was quite a distance away and when a hundred of me my men surrounded the house my birds birds had flown the coop."

"Maybe papa will capture them or make them surrender," Said Pettie. "But I hope they will soon see the error of their wickedness and repent. I don't doubt about poor general John Manley of course, but I do despise his brother and father whom I almost know are far beyond beyond repentance." Federal is the worse enemy you little girls have and if he is gone out of the war all will be all right," Said Evans. "He is your main persecutor and soon God may withdraw him out of your way."

"We can feel a sorry for the poor man anyway," Said violet. "He was once a good man, but turned against God when his wife and little girl were killed by a tornado. Then I for revenge revenge he did all he could. We may be freed from him only a short while but just the same Germania and the other generals and the wicked Manleys are more powerful than he was, and we have them yet." And we have braggard, and the tamerlines, and their men to look out for too," She added.

"That is right," Said Joice. "They may not be as wicked as the Tamerlines or the Manleys I mean but just the same they would be glad to put us out of the way if they could," Said Evangeline. "They themselves will be put out of the way before they know it," Said Evans. "They have me to reckon with."

They sat there for quite a while then finally as it was approaching close to breakfast time they decided to return to general Vivian's headquarters. It was now quite hot the rising torrid sun making the temperature fairly sizzling, but they seemed as unconcerned over the heat as if it was only a cool day, and reached the place after a brisk walk.

"General Viv Evans," Called general Vivian when Evans approached the main veranda with the little girls.

"Yes sir your excellency."

"Come into my room I want to see you alone."

Violet and her sisters waited on the veranda for nearly half an hour for him after he went in, and when he appeared he looked sober. "What is the matter dear?" Asked Joice. "Have you done something out of the way?" He was kind of rough when he spoke. "Oh I'm all right," He said furiously. "But Hanson had told him while I was gone that old old Manly intends to break up the procession, and commit a horrible sacrilege in the Bargian. He intends to have the procession held at another location, but I cannot bear the banner for your sakes. I'm under instructions to watch out for the would be sacrilege committers, and if they attempt to do anything out of the way to shoot them down like dogs."

"Oh Evans don't let them do it by all means," Said Violet with a sob. "It's our doing and not any concerns of theirs. I don't want to see why they want to break up the procession, and if Manley succeeds in the attempt I'll hate him." "The attempt won't succeed if I can help it," Said Evans. "I'll shoot the first fellow who tries to fire at the blessed Sacrament. I'll be hidden in a thickly foliated tree, and I'll shoot to kill."

The very officers were all talking over what Hanson through his spies had learned and all eyes were generally directed toward the fir fortifications, which had held out against the attack the day before after an all day battle with Evans. They realized that if any attempt would be made it would come from there, that it was the purpose of the Glandelinians of building it, and so long range guns carefully hidden in foliage were trained upon those fortifications, the gunners having the instructions to blow the fortifications to smithereens and meantime if any shots interfering with the procession or services proceeded from there. Toward seven o'clock everything was in readiness. A crowd of soldiers gathered to attend the services, and to watch the Procession and the crowning of the blessed Virgin. At seven thirty the time appointed, a flock of pretty children came from the rear by twos, little girls with white clothes, and wreaths of flowers on their heads, and little boys dressed in their best, all formed into line by squads. One of the little girls was detailed to carry the banner, Jennie being chosen by lot amongst all the children, and the rest with the children to do the singing while they marched. Violet was to crown the blessed virgin and to lead the singing chorus. Thousands of boys and girls volunteered to join, besides large numbers of soldiers and officers, even some generals. J Knocing of Evans intentions to attend they were surprised when he did not appear, but no one said anything, and the little girls did not want to tell the reason for fear of causing alarm.

Violet and her sisters were dressed as little Virgins with white veils covering their heads, and hanging about them with wreaths of lovely red and white roses on their heads, heavenly beautifully colored bands on their shoulders, and with flowers in their hands. Violet had the crown of beautiful flowers she was to place on the head of the Blessed Virgin, and she also appointing Jennie to carry the banner who was to lead the May Procession.

General V Hanson and Vivian rode back and forth among their lines and among the crowds, anxious of the following proceedings, detailing thousands of soldiers to swarm every road lane and field the procession would pass on its march toward the status, and to bring down any sneaking sniper they would see without mercy.

"If they think they can break up the procession then I can cannot commit a mortal sin and escape Hell," Besides. "He blessed. I I don't threaten this horrible sacrilege. Well anyhow Evans will do some sniping of his own. I depend upon his sniping."

The sight of all the children gathered for the procession, was the prettiest Evans had ever seen from the time he was sheltered in, with his long range rifle, and as the priest came carrying the Blessed Sacrament, he shuddered when he thought of what might happen.

He saw the prettiest sight of all, violet and her sisters, in the lead, Violet with two wreaths on her head, and Jennie with the banner held firmly in her pearl white hands. The sight made his heart leap. What if the rascally snipers would aim at them? Oh God let it not be so that they will snipe at all. If they were shot and killed and the blessed Sacrament insulted, he would kill Manley like a dog if it cost his life for it. Indeed the little girls and boys made the prettiest sight he had ever seen to look off and from his perch Evans watched with great admiration, and feeling of danger at the same time.

The procession started slowly, followed on two sides by swarms of soldiers and the singing of hymns, salutes of officers, and prayers from the troops. Jennie and Violet were in the lead of the procession, but nevertheless a squad of soldiers were on each side of her, while a troop of conscription men were several yards in front. Liked as all the other children were strongly guarded, and it indeed seemed impossible that anything could happen to them. The procession made its way up the road at a slow pace, and almost nearing the destination, the village of the soldiers grew strikers. But as yet nothing happened, though from where they were those treacherous fortifications, were in plain sight.

"Watch those fortifications," Said general Vivian to a leader of a force of Dragoon Dragoons. "If there is any attempt to be made on checking this procession, I'm sure it will be from those fortifications and not from any snipers, who are too cowardly to get too close to my army. If anything happens be ready to me."

Then he rode on with the procession his distant hands playing "ON THIS DAY O BEAUTIFUL MOTHER, and other May Hymns. As the procession continued general Hanson came riding up.

He had just issued orders to have the fortifications watched also.

"There is suspicious movements among Manley's lines," He said as he rode up. "I have already instructed the officers to keep watch. I'm suspicious of an attack."

"Is that so?" From general Vivian. "I see it all now. The wily rascal intends to commit a sacrilege, by having the Blessed Sacrament fired upon, and during the confusion launch an attack upon our lines. Well for once I'll frustrate him. It's from those fortifications that I expect the incident to come, but let them try it and they will be all buried into in eternity."

"I know what you mean," Said Hanson. "I have given the very same orders myself. So if the sacrilege is committed by any one in that line of fortifications, there will be no trace of their site afterwards."

The two generals watched the procession for several minutes, and then dreading that the attack would soon come, Hanson rode back to his lines to watch the movements of Manley's big armies. In fact he was really wishing that Manley would make an onslaught, for if he did he had a good chance to crush his whole line, of assault to fragments, and hurl his whole army back toward Groser's army. AND when it is before it is recovered from the shock.

His wish was granted at right, a good sign of God's vengeance for the sacrilege he did succeed in committing.

The procession at this time had halted at the foot of the statue of the Blessed Virgin, and at once the virgin girls struck up the pretty May hymn "Bring flowers of the forest." The wording of the hymn sang by Violet and her sisters, and chorused by the other children were as follows:;

1

Bring flowers of the forest, bring flowers of the fairest;
From garden, and woodland, and hillside, and vale;
Our full hearts are swelling, our glad voices telling,
The praise of the loveliest rose of the Dale.

2

Our voices are ending, in harmony, blending/
Oh thus may our hearts turn dear mother to thee,
Oh thus shall we prove thy love, how truly we love thee;
How dark without Mary, life's journey would be.

3

Oh Virgin most tender, our homage we render;
Thy love and protection, sweet Mother to win;
In danger defend us, in sorrow befriend us,
And shield our fond hearts from contagion of sin.

4

Oh Mothers the Dearest, Oh wilt thou be near rent;
When life with temptation is darkly replete;
Forsake us oh never, Our hearts be they ever
As pure as the lilies we lay at thy feet.

CHORUS

Oh Mary we crown thee with blossoms to day,
Queen of the angels, queen of the May;
Oh Mary we crown thee with blossoms to day,
Queen of the angels, queen of the May.

The sound of the voices of the virgin girls, with all of the rest of the children singing in unison, with the chorus was like the very angels singing. When the chorus started after the fourth verse was sung, Violet ascended the stepladder placed at the right hand of our Blessed Mother, and placed the crown of roses on her head, while Jennie strew her feet with the choicest lilies.

At it was at this moment that there came a series of frightful crashes, violet and Jennie were hurled sixty feet by the concussion, and a wall of rolling smoke clouds enshrouded the region for several minutes. The statue of the Blessed Virgin was blown to bits, over one hundred of the children were frightfully mangled, the Priest was killed, the blessed sacrament was picked up in fragments under general Vivian's mangled horse, twenty of the soldiers were killed, and over sixty wounded. Violet and Jennie escaped uninjured, but were heartbroken and angry besides. This had occurred before Hanson had reached his lines, and hearing the frightful crash he wheeled his horse and came back in time to see a hundred mangled bodies of children laid in rows, with their grief-stricken parents almost prostrate beside them. The other children were terrified, enraged, or ran addled, the soldiers were wild with fury, and cried for vengeance. The fortifications had been blown up but the rascally runners had escaped.

"So-so," cried general Vivian, flourishing his sabre and riding among the excited crowds. "General Manley shall pay very dearly for this bloodcurdling assassination of little children, right under my very eyes. He not only committed a double sacrilege, but murder as well."

Hanson at this moment rode up with a ashen face meeting his angry brother.

"Well it's done general Vivian," he said. "Anyway will make the attack now I'm sure and if God don't repent this offense then I'm useless unless before him myself. This is certainly terrible. I know of the sacrilege, but this assassination of children was unexpected. And two hundred of the children are even now washed in blood from where did the shells come from?"

"From the fortifications," thundered general Vivian. "The devils escaped before we had blasted the fortifications into the air."

"How soon will the assault be made?" asked general Vivian.

"The sooner the better," answered general Hanson grimly. "When it comes they will receive hell and no mistake at that."

He was forced to leave the harrowing scene, Benediction had to be abandoned, and violet and her sisters were grief-stricken. They however tried to control the wild grief of the poor parents, the fathers of whom though civilians grasp grasping guns and rushing to the works to kill every Glandelinian they could see, when the assault should come.

THE RESULT OF THE SACRILEGE MANLEY'S FRIGHTFUL DEFEAT AT THE BATTLE OF LATRUVA.

Indeed the Glandelinians did make the long expected assault, and a frightful one at that. The assault made by the Glandelinian forces started about eight fifteen, general Manley having taken advantage of the sacrilege, and believing a good portion of the Christians to be in confusion, launched the heaviest forces forward, in a headlong driving attack of the greatest violence. Manley was confident of winning the battle though the Christian forces outnumbered his two to one, confident of cutting his way through one of the three Christian armies overlapping his, and of saving his from the capture it was threatened with.

He was also bound to prove that he could see to it, that neither general Hanson or Vivian could revenge the sacrilege committed, or either atone it, and also he was bound to prevent general Vivian and Hanson from moving toward Gloria.

Indeed the frightful attack led by general John Manley in person had the same effects as the great tidal wave did upon sweeping upon the city of Angeline during the Mt. Calverine eruption, the whole Christian line in that location was crushed to fragments, but their assailants there were dislodged, other surviving columns of the foe were thrown into confusion, thousands upon thousands of guns roared and rattled in salvos of wild cannonading, the succeeding vast columns of the Glandelinians precipitating themselves against the Christians while the sound of clashing bayonets became an almost mete'ndin their ring. Everywhere the solid "landelinian surges were horribly gapped, and torn, columns columns halted, and fired, finding it impossible to make their way in the face of this volcano of flame and din, the earth shook as if there was a succession of earthquakes as the terrific explosions of millions of muskets all along the whole christian lines increased to their fullest fully, these columns also dissolved, the main line halted, and returned a fire which roared and crashed and reverberated far above the din of the christian fire, the flash the flashes of guns turning their eyes like pepper then the surges moved forward again through that sea of smoke and fire, and then it with a yell of fury the opposing lines closed and grappled, and the way the assault was going, Hanson knew that it would fail to strike general Vivians line in time to make it a success. And when the surges did strike general Vivians line, armies after armies in gray went to scattered pieces, general Vivians line was in a blinding ear-splitting uproar that shocked all who heard it and within twenty five minutes the whole scene was like a destructive hell, the landelinian surge was gapped hundreds of times, the whole stretch of woods became a meadow of wreckage from the great storm of shell explosions, and still double lines of reserves swept to the assault in redoubled fury, the whole scene being a chaotic destruction being as if the judgement day and hell's immense fury had been broken loose simultaneously, and ten times Manley's hundreds of shattered columns, reeled back appalled at the frightful slaughter. But Manley only hurried fresh forces to the assault under cover of hundreds of thousands of cannon these columns going at it with no might and main, their yells of relentless rage seeming to defy anybody, else even heaven and its inhabitants, the din a pain wounding as if a hundred million demons, had possessed themselves of the air, mingled with all the damned and were again venting their savage rage in the most horrible unearthly sounds, even louder than the screaming of a hundred million steam whistles and again and again, and still again the blinding flash of musketry, streamed along general Vivians' whole christian line in a thundering roll like legions of cannon, seeming to rend the heavens and earth simultaneously, causing the ground to tremble more severely, and still the yelling and firing of the landelinians echoed through the air in response to the christian fire, shell bursts seemed to blast and singe the air, the firing swelled and broke to full fury and the battle was fearful.

The tremendous onrush of one great gray wave after another, cleared many portions of the christian works all along the line, but the firmer firmer purple lines went to pieces so slowly that time was given until until reinforcements could arrive to crush back these scores of human waves in indiscriminate slaughter, the atmosphere seemed blinding from the frightful storm of firing, and thousands of explosions per second, blizzards of wreckage at times being hurled about by the hurricane of explosions, which showered the assaulting columns. But amid the crash and uproar, the onslaught was only resumed with still more more redoubled fury, the scene again being a roaring hell of destruction, the savage fury of the landelinian onslaught continuing on and on, the assault raging at its greatest force.

At the point of Hanson's line the landelinian assault was first repulsed. Indeed no matter what general John Manley tried it was all in vain. His whole front line of assault nearly forty miles in extent and ten million strong, suffered a frightful and terrific dissolution, his main line suffered indiscriminate losses, and as the christian line was still firm, the surviving assault assailants finally withdrew in confusion, John Manley receiving a serious wound, just as the retreat commenced.

This desperate assault had raged over four hours, John Manley having thrown a whole force of thirty million against the christian line, and within those four hours, after he had withdrawn, he left over two quarters and a half of this splendid force, in the fields dead, wounded, or dying. The wooded regions hovering along the christian lines resembled the desolation caused by some terrific typhoon, and the scene of slaughter had been frightful. The fathers who had suffered the loss of their little children killed, by a sacrilegious explosion, killed every landelinian they had the chance to shoot, and escaped without a scratch.

The christian losses were also unspeakably terrific, but not near so heavy as the enemy suffered, and no generals of any rank on the christian side had fallen, while ten on the side of the foe had been killed, and forty wounded. It can hardly be ascertained that they had ever before since Francis Atlanta seen such slaughter, in such a short time especially among the enemy, the christian loss being over seventeen million in killed and wounded along no one being taken prisoner this time, not even landelinians were taken as the enraged Angolians, when terrified or unarmed landelinians held up their hands in token of surrender, shot them down. This was to repay for the murder of children, and the sacrileges that were enacted within their very lines by Manley's guns. The frightful carnage had raged within sight of the very children, who had survived the tragedy, the little children looking on in wonder and awe at the appalling attack, some terrified by the terrible clamor, and others hoping for the christians to win, and clapping their hands and yelling with glee, when the enemy were finally vanquished. Evans had also been in the thickest of the fight, and it was he who had severely wounded general Manley inflicting a bad bullet wound in his arm. Evans had also shot ten of the forty generals down, wounding wounding three of the fatally.

He also killed general Johann Me-Wollsterand mortally wounded general Francis Phellinia Tamerline, who had been leading an appalling attack at the time. Evans also proved his marksmanship by bringing down three colonels, five captains, and six sergeants, in a very short time, and spared general Me-Indon to death in a desperate sabre duel. Evans was also handy in almost mortally wounding general Johann Manley who was also in the fighting, and if the wound was not mortal it was a shot right between the heart and the left lung. Evans having intended to kill him outright, and cursed the luck when he saw that he had only dangerously wounded him.

Who Violet and her sisters heard of the officers that were shot by State. The little girls did not know what to make of it, and they flatterly tormented him with questions, but he answered every one like a politician, and told of the special officers he had put out of the service for a while anyway. He had never had to fire two shots to bring down his man, and not a scratch was on him, though his uniform coat had been torn by the branch of a fallen tree as it struck him.

In half an hour Evans had brought down fifteen landelinian generals, and fourteen officers of lower rank, making twenty nine officers altogether. It had been general Johnston Manley's plans to have the whole of general Vivians, and Hanson's army attacked simultaneously and in full force, and had it worked it would have been a great success in spite of the sacrilege. But the assault along general Vivians line had been a whole hour late, and though the battle raged the hardest here, it was only a small portion of Hanson's line which had been crushed, but nevertheless the assailants that crushed this portion had met anihilation, at the same time, and general Vivian had smote the enemy so ruthlessly that Hanson's army was saved from disaster, and the enemy's whole line was rolled up in confusion from the field, the assault having been a disastrous bloody failure on the landelinian side, and Manley had been badly outwitted.

But nevertheless this defeat was only temporary. Manley as yet did not count himself beaten severely wounded as he was, and decided to have his father give general Hanson full knowledge of the fact within another hour or so. He was aching to repay general Hanson and Vivian for the frightful slaughter suffered among his lines during that four hours attack, and for the wounding of himself, and his brother, at the hands of Jack Evans, which enraged him. At first he did not know that it was the guardian of Violet and her sisters who had shot him and his brother, but many of the landelinians who were eye witnesses to the fact, told him about it, and his rage knew no bounds.

He vowed that the Vivian girls must be destroyed, and that their guardian must be captured dead or alive, and if captured, to be crucified for the shooting of his brother, and himself. He decided to renew the assault as soon as he could get the fresh forces ready, but also to concentrate the heaviest fury of the assault, upon the christian line, where the Vivian girls and their guardian was supposed to be, Johann van Johnston Manley and Johann Greenburg Me-Huge to lead at this point.

Greenburg was instructed to have many of his men hidden in the trees near the christian lines, and when the opportunity came to shoot the Vivian girls down on the spot during the confused chaos of the battle. He was also instructed to have many of the best cavalry men watch out for colonel Jack Evans as he thought he was a colonel, but just the same to capture him at all hazards.

THE SECOND OUTBURST OF THE TERRIFIC CONFLICT.
THE RESULT..

Chapter 17.

But man imposes, and God disposes. It happened to be when the terrific onslaught was on, Evans and the Vivian girls were at another point of the main Christian line, far to the extreme rear, and though under orders Evans finally was within the firing lines he always managed to get the sharpshooters, before they shot the little girls, bringing them down one by one, his gunners shelling the trees, and preventing their dandastardly intentions. The assault was general all along the line, but general Greenburg was driving his wedge with might and main, reeled back twenty times, and then only came forward once more and it seemed likely indeed that the Christian position would soon be forced.

Evans when not in action watched the appalling attack at a safe distance with violet and her six sisters, and Violet noticing that the foe seemed to be getting the better of the Christians suddenly thought of a plan to outwit the wily Greenburg. She told the plan to Evans asking him to carry it out while he had the chance. The battle by this time was terrific in fury, the whole of Manley's army attacking in full strength, and Evans pondering on the plan saw by close examination of the shape of the battle line, that it could be carried out with disastrous consequences to the enemy. To carry out the plan Evans would have to act temporarily as a general for scores of the Christian generals had fallen in that fiery storm of battle. He rode along the rear of the roaring battle line, examining every formation closely and then riding along general Hanson's extreme right gave the command:

"Right grand division, recoil. Left center advance and buckle too!"

This was obeyed he doing likewise to the other commands, to Hanson's greatest amazement, and wit within half an hour general Greenburg's whole command was almost surrounded, by a blasting inferno of musketry and cannon, his men going down in thick numbers than there could be fleas on a multitude of dogs. The slaughter was terrible Greenburg being shot dead by Evans himself, the Glandelinians were thrown into panic and confusion, and though columns after columns for a time renewed the assault with terrifying fury, they finally broke and fled from that fierce conflagration, being in the wildest stampede the victorious Christians pursued pouring after them like a tidal wave cutting them down and routing the survivors on to the way to the main line, even carrying a good portion of the Glandelinian position, where all attempts to retake it were disillusioned in a horrible manner. Evans explained the movement to Hanson. Every division that recoiled under his orders, was only a withdrawal, withdrawal in a newly arranged direction, in the shelter of thick woods, this movement being made obliquely at all points, tending to cause the formation of three quarters of an extensive circle in Hanson's extreme right, which closing on Greenburg's assaulting columns mowed them down terribly and cut off using the frightful rout. At first Hanson was going to congratulate general Evans, but he said:

"This honor belongs to the Vivian girls and not me. They thought of this plan explained it to me and I executed it. The honor goes to them. They won the field not me."

"That's true too," exclaimed Hanson. "But you had the same cause for honor as they did. They planned it. You executed it. So you all deserve the honor. You and the little girls won the battle and not us."

"But --"

"Not buts about it. In --" Laughed Hanson. "There are the little saints!"

"They are somewhere near," said Evans. "I'll go and find them!" In the meantime the Glandelinian onslaught on the rest of the Christian line was indescribable in violence. There was such a concentration of Glandelinians that it seemed that all the guns mowed upon them, and even the severest musketry ever poured in any battle whatever for that space of time, could not stop their wild onrush.

General Vivian was everywhere along his lines encouraging his men and begging them to stick it out to the last. The uproar of cannon was so terrific that it seemed as three hundred million tons of dynamite were exploding continually, the roar of hundreds of thousands of shell explosions shook the earth again, and the crash of musketry was the worse of all.

The furious second battle of Gromer Andean had centered toward the truce with indiscriminate ferocity, the heavy Glandelinian columns surging on in monstrous human waves, and then though cut to pieces, and driven back they only recovered, and added by fresh forces, resumed the frightful onslaught, again, and again, giving vent to their famous "DEVIL YEA" "DEVIL YEA!"

So violent was the assault that it seemed as if general Vivian's lines would be finally forced. Manley's extreme right wing however, had been disillusioned, the main line was suffering from frightful losses, and Hanson concentrating parts of his force against general Vivian's assailants, shattered Manley's main line of assault frightfully, causing the whole line now, while horribly gaping and tearing it again and again, to reel in utmost confusion and panic.

Manley suffered horribly from his losses, and being outflanked by general Evans, whose troops poured upon his rear from the direction of Gromer Andean, after capturing the nine million besieged Glandelinians there, the Glandelinian's general seeing, general Vivian's forces pouring after him, with the other armies under Vivian's closing on his left, Manley rallied his command, and showed furious resistance for five more hours, causing the Christians frightful losses, mowing down the waves in purple as fast as they came on, but his rear was so horribly hammered to pieces by general Evans and Vivian that he was compelled to resume his retreat abandoning many of his batteries, and ammunition stores, and retreating toward Gromer Andean in a perfect rout. The Glandelinian losses were terrible over 30,000,000 having fallen in dead and wounded, making a total in 47,000,000 in all that fell in the whole nine hours battle. Indeed general John Manley and Johnston Jackson Manley and his son were stung beyond endurance by their second bitter defeat at the truce or Gromer Andean, and by the failure to destroy or cause the destruction of the Vivian girls. Yet he did not know what to do. One quarter of his army was so frightfully disillusioned by the recent frightful battle of Anna Maria and Francis Atlanta, and this one, already raged, was now more frightfully depleted despite the reinforcements he had received, before he fought. Other Glandelinian armies were the next month, retiring like a stily into southern California and one of his own under Leonia Meldonia Nicknell was partially surrounded by the army of Abbeasians under general Leonia Meldonia Nicknell.

His terrible misdeeds had been his undoing and he now realized it. That night his armies had shown more sterner resistance, south of Gromer Andean on June 19th, south of Gromer Andean, and even all the rest of the next day inflicting untold losses upon the Christians assaulting him, but the overwhelming onrush of the Christians forcing forward like the floods did upon Jamestown, caused the surrender of a part of general John Manley under James Nicknell that doughty general however escaping by hiding under a wood pile.

The slaughter of the Glandelinian columns was terrific, the armies under general Cordial being crushed to fragments, the survivors were even disillusioned, two of the remaining remnants surrendered their commands,annonia and the others escaped, but their commands suffered an annihilation also.

It was after this great battle that Manley found his remaining armies in this thickish position. Federal was half surrounded by the Christian army under general Maurice Costello, with the Christian guns pounding him night and day, with Gromer Andean and the truce in flames, and forests of trees burning along his only avenue of retreat, Federal being in the worse situation. Yet this general who was recovering from his wound received at Francis Atlanta, determined to show that it would take more than St. Michael and all his host to make him surrender. He decided to cut his way through the Christian line, for though his own losses had been unspeakably, unspeakably terrific he still was confident of victory though general Vivian outnumbered two to one. This time he decided to fight with the fury of desperation, to throw all the vehemence in the attack, under cover of a spasmodic artillery fire of all his batteries. He determined to use all his most desperate efforts to cause the destruction and of the Vivian girls where the Manleys had failed and that evening after the firing of the first two days of the third battle of Grover Andreas had lured or fourth battle mean, general Federal sent scouts out everywhere to find out the location of the Vivian girls whom he now suspected were in rapture instead of misery and sorrow, as he wished them to be. As it happened to be general Vivian had sent scouts out also in numerous columns at that, and Evans was leading a scouting force himself. He came upon a large squadron of Omurian cavalry, who were about to raid an orphan asylum filled with children, and had within a very short time brought these Glandelinians to the lines as prisoners, and stationed a hundred thousand men armed with batteries of cannon to protect the orphan asylum from the assassins.

Evans had also discovered the many scouting parties, and he managed by threatening intolerable torture to force out of one of his prisoners the reason of it.

"So they want to discover the whereabouts of the Vivian girls and destroy them?" He hissed. "Well, why hunt them down like dogs? Why not me first? With me in the way he has just as much chance to destroy even their happiness as he would when I would be the very guardian angel himself. If the intentions of the Manleys during the one day battle of Latruva failed. What they failed to do Federal also will fail to do."

He reported to general Vivian that numerous scouting parties were out spying on his lines to locate the Vivian girls, also reported about the affair at the orphan asylum, and of the capture he made. General Vivian was surprised at his discovery, and set out with a large force of cavalry, to find out the situation himself. He saw many squadrons of the Glandelinian cavalry at separate locations, maneuvering about and decided to surprise the Glandelinians by dominating the region with a sudden storm of shell fire. He returned to his lines after a sharp brush with three parties of scouting Glandelinians, had his batteries drawn up into position, and let loose a terrific hail of shells, killing scores of the scouts, and sent the rest scurrying for shelter. The men who were captured were shot as spies at midnight. The next morning the attack was resumed almost unexpectedly at that, being delivered with the most tremendous fury, and force ever imagined. Parts of the Christian line was driven into confusion by the suddenness of the violent attack, but general Vivian happened to come up just in the nick of time, and tore general Federal's whole line of assault to pieces delivering such a violent counter attack that the Glandelinians along this point fell back in panic, the Angelinians shooting the fleeing fugitives down in tens of thousands, captured hundreds of thousands of prisoners, and fairly crushed the surviving columns back all the way to the main line. Federal's Federal's extreme left though driving against general Vivian's main right with might and main was equally unsuccessful. The fire along general Francis Schmidt's Christian line was terrific, tearing column after column to pieces, the whole right was cut up and thrown into confusion, and finally the Christian forces dashed upon them precipitately, the Glandelinian forces gave way and retired in confusion. At no point of the field was Federal successful.

Though one half the size of general Hanson's army before, Federal was now outnumbered five to one, so frightful had been his losses. Many Manley himself was really in a desperate situation, and the little child rescued by friends before Francis-Atlanta whose name was Francis Smith, had unfortunately in for the first time in her young life, witnessed the great battle of Latruva, and this one now raging, having seen with horrible during the battle with Federal's, the frightful onslaughts of the Glandelinian army, which though repulsed in general as it was, was resumed with redoubled violence half an hour later, and the fury of the struggle was still more fearful. If a hundred gigantic thrashing machines, was thrashing wheat in a large field of grain, at one time, it could not do all this as fast as the Christian fire was mowing down the Glandelinian soldiers. Though falling faster than raindrops in a thunder storm, the Angelinians nevertheless struck to their position, their lines flanked north their most destructive volleys. General Crowley's divisions of 300,000 300,000 Glandelinians assaulting the Christians with a host of poor little Francis but suffered annihilation, Crowley was killed, and the main line of assault coming up afterward under general Harper, Johnston and Scholander Francis, melted to fragments, and recoiled appalled at the horrible sea of dead and wounded. The noise of the battle was now ear-splitting, the Glandelinians all along the whole line assaulting with the fury of desperation, and columns of men in gray thick enough to fairly crowd the piers of Lincoln Park came swarming upon general Hanson's left wing, only to go back in few fragments, which were left to tell the horrible tale of the massacre.

Trer Treas were crashing down everywhere, cannons still roared like millions of tons of dynamite exploding continually, and still the assault continued with horrible fury. Manley's main center was shredded and torn, his main left was gapped with ragged ragged avonuses, but despite his awful loss, he was bound to fight his way out of the ring if possible. The burst of high explosives made cumulous clouds of smoke, rolling in sky, over plains, and among woods, woods shattering thousands of trees, and make a making a terrible racket.

The time the assault was delivered with utmost desperation and so many made the assault each time that it seemed as if the whole population of Chicago, men, women and children, together, were rushing rushing forward in eagerness to be slain for the fun of it, and though each time the shattered lines recoiled in horror, at the blasphemous slaughter, they were driven forward again by their generals, and reinforcements, and Hanson witnessing the assault, and knowing what a determined general Manley was, doubted whether the Christian line could hold out against this raging hell, of screaming, yelling, shrieking, cursing demons, much longer. It was almost another Francis-Atlanta, or Anna-Maria. General Vivian himself was appalled at the frightful attack, and though all his reserves were thrown in it seemed as if his whole line must yield at last. His two sons in command of new forces had the opinion, and so did Jack Evans who was in the thick of the attention action.

"Curse on the luck!" He muttered as he shot general Kramer from his horse. "I'd give anything if that dog of a general Jon John Manley would show himself to me just once again. Then I bet I'd end this terrible battle in a hurry. I'm just aching to shoot him."

Fearing that something would happen to Violet and her sisters, he left the line ordering the men to fire from the foliage of trees, and went in search of them going across a field in plain sight of the frightful battle, he suddenly came upon little Francis Smith looking on with eyes dilated in horror. He immediately checked his widely galloping horse, and halting along side of her said:

"So I see the way you look you don't think much of our shooting do you?"

"I think it is awful." As she gasped raising her pretty face to his. "When will the gray coats stop?"

"Not at all I think." Said Evans. "All my superior generals think that we will have to fall back pretty soon. And I think you had better go somewhere else for safety. Do you know where my friends the Vivian girls are? I'm looking for them."

"Yes I can take you to where they are." She cried.

She led him to a glen and there he found them in a tree, watching the battle from the highest point. Hearing the approach of a horse and the familiar voice of a child talking, they looked down and seeing Evans approaching hastily also climbed to the ground. "I'm afraid the onemys going to win." Said Ronnie. "It's too bad and we almost have him too."

"It looks that way." Said Evans. "But fate may favor us yet. Their losses are heavy and we may throw them off yet. The final crisis of a battle can't be won at once."

"Why don't general Hanson flank the assailants?" Asked Violet. "From the tree we saw he would have an easy chance if he would only do it. The whole region is open to him."

Evans climbed the tree, and examined the situation. Then he descended. "A flank attack is what will do it." He said stepping along side of little Francis. "Somebody will have to notify him."

"I'll go." Said Violet.

"Go where?" Asked Evans.

"To tell Hanson."

"And get killed. Nothing doing my little fairy. Why the bullets are flying about like snowflakes in a blizzard from the enemy's masonry fire and our comrades and fir friends are going down faster, than you could count by the thousands. I'll go myself. I can do it too without getting hurt."

"All right Jack," said Violet. "But remember you will break our hearts if it isn't a success."

"I know it will be a success," challenged Evans. "It will be a success if I have to lead the flank attack myself."

Evans was gone for nearly an hour, and still the assault was continuing. But Violet who had climbed the trees, or once more, came down more hurt and wildly with a scream of joy.

"We are winning!" She shrieked dancing around and clapping her hands gleefully. "The glandelinians are going back!"

As quick as monkeys her sisters climbed the tree, and saw that it was true. The enemy was giving way at all points, the assault was over and the christian waves, were pressing forward in a solid mass, and a lot of the little girls were rapturous when they saw this, and Francis herself though not so excited showed her joy nevertheless.

They waited patiently for Evans but it was not until they started to look for him, did he come racing up to them.

"I don't want to be much of a braggard," he said hastily; "But nevertheless it was I who led the flank attack. A sudden assault as I could not get near Hanson's lines to tell him of the chance. I acted as his general Hanson himself, drew a considerable number of divisions from general Francis Schmidt's army and marching clean clear around struck the enemy on the flank. The result was instant confusion, and no doubt the main line seeing the commotion pressed upon their assailants and drove them back. The battle is still raging but just now Vanley's and Federal's armies are the ones being assailed."

"And he won't be able to hold out long," said Violet. "At least I hope so. I want to see the end of this war."

"I too," said Evans. "It will end sometime. It cannot last forever."

"I know it," said Violet and her sisters.....

The morning of July 4th dawned dark and stormy. All was still between the hostile lines now concentrated near Glandelinia, and all the christian generals wondered what would come next. They expected the glandelinians to make another attack or start another battle since the great one at Cromer Anderson's on June the 15th but nothing happened except that the work in burying the dead and wounded being carried on had continued since the series of great battles had started since Francis-Atlanta. The army concentrated before general Vivian now was general Franklin the Vanleys being far away near Aronburg's guns.

Late in the day of July 4th general Vivian went out scouting to see what was going on, but the darkness and rain made him unable to discover anything. All that long time Evans was with Violet and her sisters, and during the time while all was quite since the last great battle, he took advantage of the months lull, and did all he possibly could to "keep up the happiness of Violet and her sisters....."

Meanwhile during the month of July affairs were going still better for the christians elsewhere. In eastern Calvernia, general Thomas Francis Vivian after raging a battle from May 4th till now to July 4th defeated general Thomas Francis Vivian Crittenden at little Gloria. Francis-Atlanta capturing his whole army, and the other glandelinian generals as well. A local brigadier general Phelina Frederickson Fredrickson observed on July 11th that the enemy were in strong force at Geraldson gun and the Zaneustophilian forces the strongest positions ever held by Glandelinians, both impregnable and being less able to resist the temptation than commanders of a stronger self restraint.

Fredrickson went without orders, and after a series of frightful battles, about twenty, took those places with an informality varying upon rudeness, forcing the glandelinian armies at these locations, with their commanders to surrender. This battle had also started in May on the same date and ending July. Soon a general Francis Smith drove nearly all the glandelinian forces after ten desperate battles from the region of Ansell in April, followed them further southward, toward Geraldson, and defeated them after a four day four days battle beginning on June first at Davidson ridge. On almost the same date the nations fighting in the balance for good since the beginning of the last twenty eight weeks of the war.

Already the horrors of Francis Atlanta, Ziegler's gun have already passed, with the proceeding battles of Cromer Anderson and Letruvavor glandern. It was apparent that at the war had reached its highest fur. General Viviananna had already won his tremendous battle at Anna Maria, Evans and Vivian had captured Anderson and Vanley had been defeated at Letruva and Julio Gallio and Vivian Wickey was already open for the advance of the three mightiest christian armies that had ever been mastered. Viviananna moved westward while Constantinian Aronburg and others moved up from the south and general Hanson realized that he was going to receive aid at last which would result in the speedy fall of the city. While the three armies were marching on toward Vivian Wickey stirring events had been happening in the water courses of the Mic-Holleston and other big rivers running through Vivian Wickey. Near the mouth of the Horns Run River on the time that the big battle of Letruva was raging an enormous glandelinian merchantman trying to run through the christian blockade, a vessel of over 21,567 tons and valued at 10,150,000 dollars was on her way from a port of Glandelinia to Vivian Wickey in perfect ballast, commanded by Captain Andorn, with a large number of officers and crew a 11 told two thousand one hundred and twenty men. In Wickey Bay and in latitude 49. 6. north, longitude 9. 52. West she was brought to by the Abbeismian battleship, PANDORA, and boarded by officers and three boats crew who took the crew of the Glandelinian blockade runner on board the Pandora took everything from the vessel of value, and provisions also, and then blew it up the explosions setting fire to the vessel, the commander Turner Hanson, watching her destruction from his own deck with scorn.

However in some instances it was not always an easy matter to capture blockade runners. Ships even tried to blun the noses that were of other nations but this cannot hold as any excuse if they happened to have provisions for the glandelinians. An incident of this kind was an engagement between the Mormonian blockade runner Veronia, Commander Evanton, and the Abbeismian citizen gun ship Sacramento, and the gunboat St John. The captain of the Mormonian ship finding that the big Abbeismian ram was going to run into him when he would not stop put his steamship which was armed in such a position that in being damaged he could spray it to the Abbeismian ship with interest. On came the gigantic ram all clad with iron about the bow and tops like a floating breastwork and hit the Mormonian ship straight in the port waist, cutting and crushing in her side. She immediately dropped alongside as the steamer let go broadside, and though badly damaged by the Mormonian fire cleared out to butt the ship again. She hit the Veronia a second time with dreadful effect, and while in a sick sinking condition the Veronia poured her nine inch shells into her so fast that the Abbeismian ram was shattered and driven on shore. The gunboat then attacked and brought the Steamer to lower its flag and run up a white one. The captain was taken prisoner with his crew but later on released. He complained to his government later but received little sympathy the Authorities of Mormonia saying that he had no right whatever to sent or take provisions to a wicked enemy like Glandelinia who also is an enemy of Mormonia and therefore it was his own fault and no one else.

CHAPTER 18

MANY INCIDENTS DURING SIEGE BY WATER. MANY DISASTERS TO BLOCKADE RUNNERS. EXPLOSIONS OF MINES UNDER CHRISTIAN SHIPS. BIG BATTLES AND ARTILLERY DUELS.

At the time the blockade runners were trying desperately to get through the blockade to give provisions to the enemy a perfect field of infernal machines were discovered by Captain Jancinia of the Warship Abbie-Ann and which was believed to have been designed to blow up the besieging christian fleets and which had been set adrift near the mouth of the Sumbroon Stream. The following description sent to Mansion was:

"10,000 large eight hundred gallon oil and T.M.T.M. T.N.T. casks, perfectly water tight, acting and looking as harmless as buoys, connected by twenty five thousand fathoms of three to four and a half inch electric wiring and cabled ropes buoyed with large things looked like large squares of cork but which were cushion caps, every two feet secured to large casks by iron handles. Heavy bombs of boiler iron, and big mines wrought and large fitted with strong knots and brass taps, and filled with T.N.T. was suspended to the cask casks six feet under water or much less. On top of each large cask were iron things like boxes also filled with explosives with fuses in long lines. In the centre of what looked to be corks were platforms with great lengths of what looked to be fuses coiled away occupying the middle of each cask but when these were examined it was discovered that they lead out in long lines toward the shore where Glandelinian electric batteries were hidden. By means of the fire of several warships these machines were blown up with the result that mountains of water were thrown thousands of feet into the air, and resulted in wave action that tossed and rocked the ships of siege as if there was a typhoon. If they had not been discovered in time any number of ships could have run into them and had been blown into the air."

Usually soldiers and marines from the besieging ships would even land on the shore to go out on scouting tours which always resulted in a scene of short but bloody and sanguinary skirmishes in which many of the scouting parties suffered great losses in killed or wounded or captured. During many of these scenes so many christian ships had occurred that for both sides thousands were killed at different times, by thus venturing into dangerous places near the rebel shores. Great forages also occurred made by the enemy and the forages in many cases were always successful bringing back with them all kinds of plunder secured from the christian lines, such as cattle, pigs, chickens, and provisions, and sometimes capturing wagons full of ammunition. To help press the siege on land many long Angelinian railroad batteries had been constructed each armoured car being built of six inch boiler iron and was proof against the best rebel cannons and musketry at any distance. The sides had fifty cannon turrets, and one thousand rifle holes and at one end was a gigantic ten ton pounder cannon, which moved on a gigantic pivot with a gun carriage complete. Each car could accommodate nearly six thousand men without crowding it, and was over six hundred feet long. The cars were built usually to assist working men and Angelinian engineers to rebuild bridges across the rivers near the city, and also used as a bombarding car in time of necessity. It took five engines of big locomotive sizes to pull a long train of eleven armoured coaches.

The Glandelinians at Julio Gallic during the siege were making great efforts to prevent the Angelinians from capturing any of their provisions.

At the failure of General Manley's army to prevent the capture of Letruva works the Glandelinians were forced to abandon an immense arsenal containing a large quantity of war machinery, and guns and munitions. It was garrisoned by quite a large force of Glandelinians but having received the news of the approach of a large overwhelming army of the big force of besiegers under instructions from General Manley to seize the arsenal the commander General Hooker Handenia, to prevent its falling into the hands of the Abbieannian Nationals or Federals, set fire to the thousands of buildings which were not only made of flames, but looked like hundreds of volcanoes exploding as the ammunition blew up. The rebel commander led his men in flight across the norma gun into Vivian, Wiky and reached Julio Gallic safely about eight o'clock at night while the sky was red for miles from the conflagration he had made. The Glandelinian government at Vivian Wiky highly commended the general for his judicious conduct, and promoted him to the rank of captain general.

One of the hardest fortifications for any fleet of ships to assault was the fortress of Gertrude Angelina on St Martins Island in the mouth of the Mic-Holleston river. This fortress was made of heavy concrete with an addition of enormous amount of seasoned work of the first class. Its walls were about sixty feet high, by twelve feet in thickness and was six six hundred feet wide and a mile long.

It was embossed of many tiers of enormous guns which were placed under bomb proof cases or enormous strength. The many thousands of guns from the work radiated from every point on the river and of every point of the horizon, with deadly destructive flank and infiltrating fire at every angle of approach, and also was able to infiltrate a good part of the shore of the river. The fortress was erected by the Abbieannians in 1843, and finished in 1896, at the cost of nearly one billion dollars. Now it garrisoned over one million two hundred thousand Glandelinians and from the total armament of the work, consisting of 10,000 guns, six thousand six hundred three of which were centennials made it almost impossible to approach at short range. Thus why three attacks made on it was a bloody and destructive failure. Even during the time the fleet had been attempting to storm it it also became evident from some of the Angelinians on the south shore of Mic-Holleston river mouth that it became evident from the magnitude of military actions going on of the enemy elsewhere and other indications coupled with great significant threats in the Vivian Wiky Glandelinian Convention and out of it than a forced occupation of the south land side of the river by strong force of Goodler Glandelinians was mediated. The general in command there then decided to anticipate the Glandelinians of Goodler in their contemplated manoeuvre. Accordingly on the night when the battle of Francis Atlanta had just closed three hundred miles south of Vivian Wiky with a christian victory, and at the very time the Glandelinian Commissioners had arrived in Angelina Azath to demand the withdrawal of withdrawal of the besieging christian armies from Vivian Wiky, the Angelinians on the south river shore evacuated the fortified works after spiking the hundreds of guns and providing for the destruction of their carriages and blowing up the ammunition dumps and arsenal works and other materials by fire, and after a all this storm of volcano of flame and din and big fires, with the aid of three warships and six transports near by successfully transferred their numbers to fortress St Elbun.

It was decided by Admiral Jimmermann to establish a large naval rendezvous where vessels of christian ships on the way or to blockading squadrons could coal and take refuge from Glandelinian fleet as it was therefore decided by the Angelinian authorities to capture the entrance to Port Mic-Whirther at all costs whatever, this place being situated south of norma gun. A large expedition of ships from the main besieging fleet was therefore sent out, and after a heavy bombardment of sixteen hours, in which the roar of sixteen thousand guns shook the air like Mt Kratoa in eruption, signal was given that the rebel fortified works and six forts near by had been abandoned. As strong bodies of Angelinian troops from the transports landed, but as they rushed forward expecting to gain the forts and works easily they were met by a fire from unseen sources that cut their ranks down by the hundreds. Three charges were made however in which the last was successful and when the rebels were driven off the Angelinians found awful numbers of Glandelinians dead and dying amid dismounted guns in all directions, and sixteen army horse ital buildings of the Glandelinians shot through and through in hundreds of places, and filled with groaning gazing dead and wounded. The loss of the fleet was eight hundred and eighty eight killed and twenty three thousand wounded and ten ships lost. The loss of the infantry in killed and wounded was nearly three hundred three hundred thousand.

Indeed also at Vivian wickey no one probably could make a perfect sketch of so many of the loyal christian inhabitants of many parts of Vivian wickey who had succeeded in fleeing from the relentless barbarity of the Glandelinian Condemned Confederates or make a more appalling picture of the horrors of the seizure--the misery and destitution of those hundreds of thousands of survivors unhappy people of all ages, from the white haired old man to the infant, from the besieged town to the shelter under ground or in cellars from the shelter of the besieged town to the ferocity of Glandelinian soldiery. In the very first short season of the enemy possession of the city men and women of all substance had been stripped of all their hard earnings, and belongings, their household goods, their little children, and everything trampled in the dust, their houses and barns, their sons and daughters young or grown, murdered in a way too horrible to describe for the sake of humanity, and women and men outraged. The track of Glandelinian cavalry was not told by its victories, defeats or desperate battles, but by its wanton horrible devastation throughout the whole of Galverinia. No Jacknawright ever had the means to roll through any land with a more pitiless tread than that of a destructive Glandelinian army which unfolded upon its wicked lying banner, that they were fighting for their own alters homes and for freedom, and for the hopes of maintaining the children slaves in denier of being set free by the Angelinian federal governments. And worse of all nothing had a more fitting description than any picture which could ever give of the distribution of the clothing and uniforms of captured Angelinian soldiers among the Glandelinian murderers, robbers and criminals of all sorts. As one of the members of the Angelinian Authorities said "This is adding insult to God and man. You first induce child slaves to destruction, induce our once loyal Galverinians to oppose us whom we fight for, and then you clothe your worse criminals and vandals in the glorious uniforms of Angelinia." It is needless to add that no insult was intended. It was simply intended as a blasphemy against Heaven and humanity combined. The activity of the Glandelinians on the mouth of the Rio-Mic-Hollester and Norma Run rivers and their confluence rivers was almost incredible. During the seizure it would have been that in one single night some point hitherto defenseless was made to bristle with hundreds of cannons, and the first intimation of its locality was a leaden messenger at storm winging their way on to their mission of death and destruction. A part of Angelinian troops while out scouting through a small but dense woods would always suddenly come upon such a point and there behold the Glandelinians at work upon an almost completed river battery which had sprung up indeed with magical rapidity.

This battery was protected by sand banks erected of sandbags and plametto logs. Work on the river front was determined a strong lunette and mounted hundreds of guns. To the right and left of this lunette were small salients mounting fifteen guns each, and elsewhere a small line of works like a redan mounting two hundred guns please. Also discovered in the works were large magazines which when discovered by these scouting parties contained five hundred thousand rounds of fixed ammunition, and in the wet ditches before the works were large quantities of small water mines, put there by the Glandelinians in an endeavor to blow up while lines of christian troops should they scale the walls of the works. The scouts discovered that these fortified works were about five miles long, extending from Turner Hill to Turner Run and to the Mic-Hollester and Pandora Railroad, but the scouts saw that they were much stronger than any one would have supposed though they could probably have been carried by storm if the assaulting force was supported by heavy artillery.

At the time that the great engagement at Logan Zoo Ras Run was raging, one of the nearest battles near Vivian wickey an enormous Angelinian motor fleet and six hundred big guns boats, merrimacs, rams and thirty seven dread-naughts and nine big transports moved forward with the motive of bombarding Fort Gertrude Angeline Again. This fleet was accompanied by three hundred big boats. On the approach of night they all circled the fort at apparently a safe distance and then every ship opened a simultaneous fire, which instantly was returned by the batteries of the fortress. This contest continued for several days and nights without a moment's abatement and from the volleys of cannon of both sides it was certainly peculiar both the clouds or volumes of smoke rolled and freque frequently split out when the shells passed. The shells could be seen easily at night during their entire flight, their fuses having the appearance of huge skyrockets, which appeared and disappeared when the shells rolled through the air, very like the twinkling and reappearing of immense celestial orbs. The explosions of so many of these dreadful shells were a magnificent and most fearful sight, sending glows of surpassing brightness like lightning or as if some thousands of worlds of combustible light had burst one after another. The fortresses however. Outside within the christian lines the many Glandelinian prisoners who lounged about in their internment camps presented a state of haggard wretched misery which indeed for them seemed to have taken all the romance out of rebellion and made it seem the horrible thing it really was. Many of the prisoners had the double aspect of wretchedness, that of their sullen countenance and of the garb, many being in ragged uniforms, on in trousers too large for them, or clothed in literal bad clothing, blankets pieces of carpet and even had shi sheets and pieces of pillow slips and ticks from mattresses. They were dressed in this fashion in the efforts of the Angelinians to prevent their escaping.

About three o'clock in the same day but on the land side the Angelinians were seen advancing in large forces across the Sun Br Beam Creek near the Mic-Hollester and Pandora Railroad station near Norma's Bridge close to Julio Gallo, where general Federalist divisions of Glandelinians were stationed. Placing their immense lines of artillery and trying to place them in the rear of the Glandelinians the Angelinians opened a fierce and most steady fire to which the Glandelinians replied from a good length of the Norma Run from the vicinity of the railroad station to Norma's and Norma's Bridges, and soon the uproar of so many cannons seemed deafening for twenty miles. For three hours and a half a fierce artillery duel and infantry fight raged and simultaneously with the greatest fierceness the Angelinians attempting a great flank movement, and hurling big bodies upon the bridge, but which assault was defeated with great loss. Toward eight o'clock in the evening general Mortine division arrived on the ground, and marched straight forward on the Angelinians in spite of the storm of hot shell and grape, and musketry poured upon them along a line of two miles.

As soon as general Pilsonia of the christian side could bring up his own batteries of guns to repel the Glandelinian wave of assault they were unlimbered on either portion of the battle line and opened upon the Glandelinian batteries and assaulting columns combined. Beyond the Norma Run river straits had a broad plain the further end of which sloped gradually into an irregular embience toward the enemy's main positions, and along which the enemy had planted its longest line of artillery on its further side, and in the neighborhood woods its main assaulting troops were being engaged with the christians north of that location, but out of range of the fire of artillery of both sides, and with the big river were safe as they supposed. It was soon found by the Angelinian commander that the distance here was too great for the guns. General Averale who was in advance and scouting the position with a soldier's eye saw that the river had a bend toward half a mile beyond the Norma Bridge, and sent one of the strongest batteries to a high rise of ground on this side, which soon flanked the assaulting columns of Glandelinians with a galling fire, and at once forced them to withdraw to their more secure position.

This desperate battle so close to the region of Norma's Bridge again between the Glandelinians on one hand and the divisions of general Franklina of the Angelinians on the other was fought more fiercely and in general on the following morning at Emersons Creek a little stream between the Norma Run river, and Gloria's Bend where later in the same day another and more fierce fight raged the fierce storm of combat being closed in the evening by the deadly but drawn battle of Turner Ridge. At Emersons Creek it resulted in the defeat and withdrawal of the christian forces to their former positions.

The engagement at Gloria's Bend was dreadful to behold. At seven o'clock in the early morning, each christian division brigade, regiment gun and everything else was in place. Some were in the dense broad open fields, and others under cover of the woods. The day itself was intensely warm, and many of the poor soldiers worn out by their previous day's hardest fighting, lack of sleep, and toilsome marching back and forth, had already thrown themselves upon the ground in this locality, and were ending in a very short slumber, when a sharp storm of volleys and a roar of thousands of cannon announced that the glandelinians had immediately opened the fight to drive them further from the vicinity of Norma's Bridge which Hansons army had captured not long before. The shelling storm was fierce that the bombshells and grape burst in front of a farmhouse in which the general in command of the christians here had made his headquarters and he and all of his officers in the building were killed when it caved in. The long lines of christian batteries after some delay, replied with vigor, and for three hours this artillery duel and the shelling of the woods plains and fields continued with dreadful violence. It was not until eleven o'clock in the noon, that the big engagement of Gloria's Bend became general, and then the battle raged all the rest of the day with unexampled ferocity. The enemy in that one afternoon threw forward heaviest columns to the charge and were repulsed with dreadful loss. However as though by common consent or otherwise there would be a pause once in a while but it did not last long, for for every repulse the enemy received heavy reinforcements, and the whole christian line extended across Gloria's Bend was reattacked with vigor that showed that the glandelinians who made it every time were fresh troops. To prevent defeat, general glanser of the Angelinians who took his main chiefs place, sent for reinforcements, for under the additional pressure of the enemys assaults the Angelinian troops were continually at every attack of the enemy to give way more and more. Fortunately general Glennens division came to his rescue, and with it generals, Mac-Gallens, Stanch and Beppe Evans of the Angelinians with their brigades and batteries and two divisions of cavalry were able to change the character of the desperate struggle. These gallant millions of fellows under these still more gallant generals, with coats off and sleeves rolled up, charged the enemy in the face of a dreadful fire and drove them back with great loss. General Ned Fred's men also went in with the greatest valor, and finally the glandelinians rolled back like a retreating wave broken in pieces by a breakwater. This was a close of the days fight at this junction. Toward the end the Angelinians had fifty four divisions on the field, numbering about thirty six million men. On the night a large force of christians crossed the Norma's Bridge now in their possession to assail this rebel position and of the one million nine hundred thousand men who crossed that stream that night, but a sad remnant retreated to the christian land side of the river on that awful night. In the engagement half of the force was destroyed, upward of fifty thousand were taken prisoners, more than one hundred thousand were drowned, nearly the same number were killed on the field or shot in the fatal retreat, and upward two hundred thousand were wounded. I must shrink from detailing all the horrible incidents of horror which marked this most disastrous action of that fatal night, and of the retreat. It was a most fearful blunder from the beginning to the end.

The exciting pursuit of a large force of the enemy commenced after the repulse of the bloody attack, when the first dreadful collision of the retreat and pursuing forces occurred near the entrance of the Norma Bridge, to which place the defeated Angelinian troops had fallen back upon hearing a glandelinian force was rushing forward to intercept them. In this retreat the most formidable and daring Colon Colonel Hendricks Ashby the "Marat" of the Angelinians, occupied the first post of danger during the retreat, dealing fiercely against the Glandelinian troops whenever they pressed the retreating christian too much. At eleven o'clock in the night before the bridge had been gained the first Gargoylian cavalry led by Heder, and the Angelinian soldiers under Ashby had a desperate and bloody skirmish, in which the Angelinians were driven back with considerable loss. General Banturn who was in charge of this remnant of troops now now on the retreat was compelled to halt his retreating army until it was reformed and then the retreat was resumed in which the glandelinian cavalry and Ashbys Angelinians had another dreadful and desperate skirmish in which artillery even was used. That night the enemy almost reached the entrance to the bridge before the retreating christians did but the christian batteries on shore prevented this. A close was the glandelinians advancing on the unfortunate retreating christian before they could reach Norma's Bridge. Entrance on the enemy shore side, that general Banturn bravely when they entered the first section of the bridge captured the Angelinian "Marat" Glandelinian provost marshal and three hundred Angelinians. After the army was safely passed from the bridge, general Ashby of the Angelinians by Hansons orders, after seeing the rear guard safely across the enormous bridge attempted to fire the wooden sections of the structures but these men were first on so fiercely by enemy snipers that it could not be done and parts that were enveloped in flames were put out by rebel bombs hurling hemicals. In this engagement general Hemo on the christian side was killed and general Larreter on the rebel side.

And also the reader cannot fail to faden one of the grand facts of a mad carnival at Livian, which one of the best ever held. It happened the same night, when general Robert Jowens divisions of general Hansons grand army corps was advancing from Gloria Bend to the support of the engaged troops there. The whole army train of wagons following was caught in mud of a bog near Sunbeam Gre Creek bottom and all desperate efforts were made to pull the cannon and wagon train through but the mud and quick sands were too deep, and the result was that in a few hours the whole region was filled with a jam of scores of thousands of wagons, mules, and cannons, hopelessly mired and were compelled to wait for more dry weather to be dug out.

At Turner Hodge the engagement was also fierce and raged with the assault of glandelinian forces, marines and rebel ships. While the battle raged on the land side between the opposing forces the rebel fleet steadily moved up and gradually closed in toward the christian batteries on the shore. The lower fortified works seemed to have been abandoned by the Angelinians, and a force of marines was dispatched to it, but the christian batteries soon opened upon them. The fire of the rebels was returned with great effect, the magsins of one of the ships exploding. Having proceeded to a extended line as far as the obstructions in the river would permit the signal was given to follow the movements of the flagship, and the whole fleet of rebel ships advanced in order, concentrating their fire on the fortified works of James-James Thompsons brigade. The works mounting seventeen big guns and fifty six rifle ten pounders and ninety machine guns, on which rested the christian land defenses, the army having gallantly driven them out of these defenses poured on then toward the main line of christian works.

It was now a desperate bayonet charge which soon drove back the Angelinian federals from these works, but the glandelinians were so exhausted with their losses and victory beforehand, the main movement was abandoned, and the captured guns of the front works were brought forward in advance to try their effect upon the main christian position before renewing the project of a general assault. The artillery fire of two hundred guns did not produce the lightest effect upon the main christian line of works, and as its storm of shot shell and grape bombarded the captured positions it rendered the rebel line very insecure and it became necessary indeed to recur again to the old plan of assault and reconnaissance at the same time, and to attempt to reduce and capture the main line of works by desperate assault. The glandelinians supported by the Mic-pollestinians, Zimmermanians, Gargoylian and Scodler infantry and the fire of artillery from the captured works rushed to the assault in most monstrous wedges. The glandelinians as they rushed forward were met by a murderous fire of grape, canister and shells that fogged their advancing wedges with smoke. Two brigades only reached the front, melted away, and the others much cut up pushed on, but the right of the assaulting column meeting an annihilating fire, broke and scattered, while the Scodlers and the Gargoylians did little better. The latter two however went far enough to capture a portion of the line and drove the gunners and the infantry from the guns and works, some brigades even mounted the long sedan like parapet, and some other brigades even penetrated the works, through a scene of inferno and like a Valley of Ten Thousand smokes, but the other columns of assault, there being others besides these named, not being able to rush up to their support on account of a force of christians counter attacking them, the remainder were obliged to retire after having really held the works for twenty seven minutes.

then Angelinian forces then advance to counter charge and at advanced rapidly in heavy force to make an effort to regain the works they had lost. Seeing the danger coming with the preparation for counter attack general Altorf was instructed to place all his men in the left of the position on the ground occupied by general Goldwells brigades, which had been thrown forward the previous morning to observe the movements of the christians. He however was directed not to advance beyond the point, and if attacked by the Angelinian Federals to defend his captured position, and send back timely notice that the Angelinians have counter attacked. The artillery of the Angelinians all along the line was opened a early in the afternoon but made no effect or advance or result untill nearly two-o'clock at which time a few opposing lines of great strength were thrown forward on each side under cover of the heavy clouds of smoke produced by cannon broadsides and the exploding of whole volleys of shells and brapnell and grapeshot. The Angelinians pushed forward a most strong force in the rear of the two other lines, and fiercely advanced to the attack. Soon the engagement was furious and unceasing. One of the glandelinian generals with a new brigade arrived on the scene half an hour later and found the action raging furiously for the extent of seven miles. The infantry fire and cannon fire of both sides was incessant severe and very destructive. The glandelinians however were holding the position they had taken early in the morning though their losses were very heavy. General Crickets divisions of Scoodlers was immediately pushed forward, and occupied the right of the heavily assaulted positions, the brigades of Caldwell and purchers being directed to change their own positions from the left and mass themselves in the centre. Before this great change could be accomplished however, it was quite frustrated by a general assault of the christians simultaneous all along the line, the artillery fire continuing at short range without intermission. The artillery fire of the rebels however was most destructive, and was readily observable in the tremendous numbers of dead men and horses, and broken gun carriages of the christian batteries, which had been advanced against it.

The christian attack however was renewed and pressed with great vigor, by the advance of a large wave of Abbieannians, extending quite lengthly across the whole country, with dense forces of cavarly on each flank. The glandelinians at once repelled the assault, while all the glandelinian signal officers on their several hastily erected stations waved their scout flags. The Angelinian Federal wave of assault, was formed with general Mic-Fern, of general Mansions left corps on the extreme right of the line of attack, generals Gansey and Gale took up the main centre, and on the right were the remnants of those who assaulted earlier. The whole line dashed forward within fifty yards of the enemy and opened a tremendous fire of musketry. Simultaneously the left of the line advanced, and all of the Angelinian troops behaved wonderfully, in facing the rebels boldly where ever he appeared, and pouring deadly volleys into him all the time. The assault finally ended with the recapture of the works and the glandelinians were finally forced to retreat, and by eight-o'clock in the evening, they had crossed Wonderland Bridge and Red over the Snow White and Rose Red Creek after destroying the bridge and warding off the repeated fierce attacks to which they were subjected throughout the evening. After crossing the creek and the bridges the glandelinians had been quickly formed into a new line of battle, general Peacocks forces being on the extreme left wing, while general Panzel Gornor occupied the main left, and Francis Hansons the intervening spaces. The successful advance of the christians was temporarily checked by the destruction of the bridges, and when the troops reached the two creeks, Snow White and Rose Red they found all the approaches well defended by art artillery. The Angelinians with their own artillery opened upon general Peacocks forces and made repeated and most desperate efforts to rebuild the bridges under cover of heavy artillery fire, but were every time repulsed.

While this was going on general No Horner and Siller had come upon a portion of the vast glandelinian force at a juncture two mile miles and a half away, called the Colonelly Farms gun. Here stood the divisions of Geeser, Lester De Pester and general Jiggs on the extreme right, Georges Calls somewhat in the advance toward the main centre, and general black Brooks on the extreme left. When general giller found this big force of glandelinians arrayed against him he waited for reinforcements to come up, and it was nine o'clock when he commenced the attack. Georges Calls left was first assailed by general Henry Scoodlers brigades, which was met by the Gargoylian and Scoodler reserves under general giganore, who after a most bitter fight drove the Angelinians back into the woods with a loss of two hundred and fifty thousand killed and wounded, and about twenty thousand prisoners. Fresh troops then enabled the glandelinians to resume the attack and finally drive back the glandelinians, who in turn lost heavily. General giller and Horner now pressed on, and the conflict became a most severe severe one along the entire front. One point after another was vainly tried in the desperate and determined effort to break the rebel line. At length general Wilcoxers Abbieannian division consisting of four big brigades rushed across an open field upon Calls left, directly against general Handallers glandelinian glandelinian battery, which poured upon the Angelinian assailants a most galling and destructive fire. Nothing daunted by their wholesale losses in killed and wounded they moved on even more fiercely and finally engaging in a most desperate hand to hand fight first captured Handallers battery, and afterwards Herdrude Jensens Scoodler battery, which also had been doing such terrible execution. A charge was then ordered by the glandelinian leaders for the recapture of the guns. The Angelinians bravely met all the severe attacks that now followed. A still more desperate and final hand to hand struggle took place for the possession of the lost batteries and works, which were finally recaptured after both sides suffered dreadful losses. By dark the Angelinians had retired into the woods, and the glandelinians remained on that position and that portion of the field, which they had lost earlier in the action. In these three battles raging ten miles apart from each other, and on the very same day, the glandelinian loss was about 11,800,000 in killed and wounded, while that of the Angelinians was over 22,000,000. All of the commanders all generals mentioned in this battle on both sides were both severely wounded, while on the enemy side general Georges Call was made a prisoner.

One of the saddest parts of the latter desperate battle was at Jennies Ford of the discovery of general Lotten Carricks who had been killed on the glandelinian side. After the Angelinians in one of their assaults had crossed the ford general Carrick had against an endra endeavored to rally his men when the Angelinians were capturing Handallers battery, the unfortunate general standing and waving his hand on a most exposed point near the river bank. Three rebels or Angelinians mean near by in a tree fired at the same time and the general and two companions he had ale with him by his side fell at the first round. The men then climbed down and fled and the glandelinians rushing forward and on turning the body discovered it was one of their best generals who had add the penalty to the Angelinians, he having been shot through the head.

Several of the rebel soldiers took care of the dead general, one of them closing his eyes reverently and then both carrying him to a grove near by the battle field, where they finally laid him down, taking care of his sword, two guns and some letters he had in his possession, to be sent with his body to his family down in glandelinia.

During the time the glandelinian fleet was covering this assault by water a fleet of Angelinian iron clad gunboats steamed up to drive away the glandelinian fleet. In ten minutes each opposing ship were alongside of each other, and the conflict commenced in earnest between twenty gunboats and iron clads. The glandelinian ships commenced with their big bow guns, each ship striking their christian her christian opponent with a rapidly rapidity and precision, which the enormous strength of the iron plating alone prevented taking immediate effect. The Angelinian ships in turn used their rifle and smooth bore guns with terrible effect on their enemy ships, some of the shots going straight through the rebel rams. However seeing the inability to cope with such rebel ships in this fashion the captains of each christian ship or gunboat ran alongside the rebel merrimacs, and grappled them.

The order borders away was instantly passed in each gunboat of the Angelinians, and the crews of the Angelinian menhans speedily mounted the decks of each adversary. However when there they found no foes to engage at all. The crew of each glandelinian ship had finally retired below, and as the iron hatches were closed and locked on the inside it was utterly impossible to go down and continue the action and so they returned to their own ships, tipped anchor, and slowly steamed back down the stream so strangely repulsed by an inferior rebel fleet.

At Jennie Bridge two miles further down the norma gun river near Mic-Whirther itself became the scene of a desperate fight between the Abbeaunian winkies and general Hollow Gargoylian and Wheeler Gary cavarly. When this rebel leader and his cavarly arrived to scout on the main christian lines on the west side of norma gun river on the same night of the battle of gloria Bend he found Lieutenant Colne colonel James Sanderton a brother of the general Sanderton, with a hastily gathered force ready to oppose his attempt to get across the bridge. The splendidly mounted Gargoylian force having the horses of the wheel wheeler glandelinians were however too much for him, and after making a most gallant defense for two hours the glandelinians forced their way across the big and long bridge, killed a large number of the Abbeaunians, and captured six cannon. The Angelinian colonel was killed, but forty of his arriving troops managed to make good their retreat to the main christian lines and fortified positions which were in a perfect panic at the nearness of this terrible glandelinian christian.

In the meantime during the siege the most perverse ingenuity which the glandelinians showed in obstructing many of the channels which led to their strongholds of the water courses was only exceeded by the persistent ingenuity with which the many Angelinian officers removed them while even under fire. The glandelinians in particular obstructed one of the channels of Jameson Island of the mouth of the mic-jollesster gun river by sinking one thousand big and small scoomers in a perfect long line, but under the superintendence of General Haydenia of the Abbeaunian and Pandora gulmarine engin engineering Co. Company they were all removed by continual blasting. The shocks of each blast was perceptibly felt for a large distance, and it was indeed some time before the water resumed its natural appearance.

A most disastrous action two days later happened at Whittington Dam. General Double Handons main brigades consisting of the Forty fifth Abyssinkilian Winkie corps were ordered to make a most strong reconnaissance on the rebel side of the stream. Crossing over at Whittington Dam which was about six miles northeast of Norma Bridge in a straight line from Latrava, and six miles south from Jennie Bridge, they had hardly landed, when a most murderous fire was opened upon them from a whole division of glandelinian Scoodler army, every volley of musketry and cannon of which told, as they had the Angelinians completely under range. The Angelinians made a most desperate resistance, but they were compelled to retire before superior numbers, and retreat in moderate order across the river.

At Ten o'clock in the morning the Angelinians being reinforced were determined to revenge this disaster. They therefore formed in front of the glandelinian rifle pits, and soon from the cover of the woods and abatis, the engagement recommenced by a rapid fire of musketry and cannon along a line of two miles. It was plainly seen that a great disposition of the men were being made by general Sanderton to repel the Angelinian attack on the main left, and thinking it a most favorable hour the glandelinians made a most desperate attack on the main right. This was made by an Abbeaunian Abyssinkilian brigade, and an Abbeaunian division. The assault was led by general Diamond Jack and he died for his daring daring. The general of the brigade was wounded, and the two other highest officers a both colonels were also wounded and taken prisoner. The newly formed right wing of the Angelinian line of assault rushed from the woods in the most most splendid order, with all their thousands of ranks apparently full when they appeared within a thousand yards of the rebel position their advance was a double quick, all pushed on with desperate courage, to meet resistance not the less furious and desperate.

With a torrent like storm of grape from the glandelinian artillery, and a tempest of balls from the musketry they were met and moved down in platoons for every volley, but the survivors never faltered, and it was only when they sprang on the breastworks and were met with two bayonet and a shower of grenades, that they fell back, the field for miles strewn in a short time with their dead and dying. After a momentary struggle on the breastworks the Angelinians the whole whole Angelinian force broke into disorder to and fled to the shelter of their own positions.

On the centre during the afternoon the Angelinians resumed the assault and finally carried a portion of the enemys works after an obstinate contest of four hours duration and a loss of about fifty five thousand in killed and wounded. The Abyssinkilian winkies then crossed the works at other points, and finding the enemy drawn up in new battle array under cover of their own main positions advanced in line of battle on their new position, about half a mile or a distant. The ground over which they were compelled to advance, was plowed and wheat fields, the latter very difficult and tiresome to march in owing to the furrows of the ground the ground caused by the exploding of many shells. The enemys guns at this point fourteen hundred in number kept up a terrible drum drum fire on the advancing christian line, which never wavered despite their losses, but slowly tolled along, receiving shelter however when they reached some hollows. They were then halted to rest a few minutes in the hollow nearest the enemys position, and then were ordered to charge. As they did so and came upon the enemys second line of positions they received a dreadful withering fire from a large force of infantry behind a wall of sandbags about one hundred feet in front of the enemys batteries. The while christian line of charge was dreadfully cut up and decimated, but the survivors pushed on and gave the rebels some dreadful volleys in return, and then went on with the bayonet. The glandelinians here did not stay long to contest the ground, and although three to one, broke and ran leaving their guns. No one can conceive however how at this battle a the nearest portion of the town of Mic-Whirther or that section of glandelinian wicket known as Mic-Whirther was terribly exposed, situated as it was almost between two fires, for however anxious the christian and enemy generals might be to spare that section of the town it was impossible to prevent many of the shot shell and even high explosives from falling into its midst. In the cellars of many houses were congregated women old men and helpless children all wellbound with horror and terror as they listened to the terrible thunder of the series of battles going on around and near all of glandelinian wicket day by day. They could tell by the horrible cyclone screams and the awful frequent explosions every now and then how near to them was the terrible work of destruction, and their terror rose many times to perfect agony when the shells exploded before one of the opening of their cellars and gave them a dim light and waste the chief means of ventilating their chambers of horrors. However against the enemys second line of positions the Angelinian movements were well executed and also admirably executed in the face of the well directed fire of the glandelinians, who for that time had the advantage of position position and could not contest almost every inch of their strong steep roden like positions, and almost every inch of the steep wooded and rocky approaches to it. By four o'clock the bloody engagement became more general as the rebels strove to retake what they lost, and the entire ground for ten miles was most vigorously contested until a portion of the works was regained, and darkness to put an end to the desperate fight. In this engagement the total losses on both sides in killed and wounded was nearly three million. General Jesse Morenio of the glandelinians was killed at the head of one of his commands, and was replaced by general Tamerine Jensen, generals Hatcher Eggton, and B. Bairdberry being severely wounded.

Elsewhere during the siege I could describe so many acts of daring which have raised the besieging Angelinian soldiers to the highest positions in any military world, that it could have filled a million volumes like these. At one time the Angelinian generals at the orders of Magnuson wished to secure possession of a small outpost town not far across the norma gun close to glandelinian wicket and pontoons had to be erected to cross the river at this point. The enemy immediately opened fire on those constructing the boat pontoon bridges from every house, and every place beyond. Artillery was concentrated upon these sharpshooters without effect. The officers had ordered a concentration of all the christian guns upon this small little town to batter it down and dislodge those tens of thousands of dangerous sharpshooters. The reader may believe indeed that they were not loathe to obey. The artillery of the left eighteen batteries was commanded by general gunners, and seven colonels, while on the right centre, they were consisting of eleven batteries, under many other officers, and left centre and right grand centre each seventeen batteries. In a few minutes these many batteries forming a total of one thousand one hundred and sixty five guns, ranging from Centimeters, ten pounder parrot guns, and 11.5 stone gun, posted along the convex side of the main circle formed by the bend of the big river, and the land opposite that town, opened upon the poor little doomed town. The effect was terrific beyond the extreme, and regarded however by the Angelinian officers as merely a part of the great phenomenon, and was among the most awfully grand and inconceivable.

Perhaps what will give us all the liveliest idea of its main effects in a succession, absolutely without intermission, of thousands of the very loudest thunder crashes. It lasted thus upward for three hours, six hundred and fifty rounds being fired from each gun, and no one could know how many tons of explosive shells and grape, and high explosives were thrown into the little town. The many congregated Angelinian generals were completely transfixed, mingled satisfaction, and awe indeed upon every face. But indeed what was very tantalizing, was though a great deal of thundering, booming, and banging, clanging noise, and tumult and uproar beyond description could be heard and felt like a volcano eruption and earthquake at the same time, nothing could be seen, the city being enveloped in the smoke of exploding shells. On y however pillars of denser smoke defined itself on the background of the smoke fog from bursting shells, indicated where the town of eleven thousand houses had been been fired by the hell shells of the Angelinian batteries. Soon another and another column of smoke showed itself, and they presently saw that many dozens of houses were on fire. Toward noon when the smoke was lifted by a sudden breeze of a wind spring up, they saw that it was indeed so. The town of Mic-Whirther Post inhabited by thousands of glandelinian sharpshooters was in a conflagration. Transcendental and inconceivable though this cannon firing had been, and terrific beyond describing though its effects obviously was on the town, it had not at all accomplished the main object needed. It was found utterly impossible by the many gunners to obtain a sufficient depression of their pieces to shell the front part of the small city, and the thousand thousands of glandelinian sharpshooters were still comparatively safe, behind the thick stone walls of the houses.

Finally when the fire from the enemy and their rifle pits in front of the houses, and from doors and windows of the very houses became a deadly that those making the pontoon bridges could not carry on their work, one of the christian generals was compelled to call for one thousand and sixty thousand volunteers to cross and dislodge, at the bayonet point, the many thousands of concealed glandelinian sharpshooters. Thousands more than ordered sprang forward, but however only the number required was chosen. These consisted of men from the Abyssinians, pondobians, Abissinians and Concaninians. With the utmost alacrity this gallant column, sprang into the boats, and on reaching the other side, drove the glandelinians from their posts at the point of the bayonet capturing three thousand three hundred and thirty seven prisoners. Six hundred men were killed and five thousand wounded in this most desperate of duties of the siege. However the bridges were soon finished, and a sufficient force passed over to hold the town until the main army would cross over.

Elsewhere down the river Lt. Lieutenant Harding commanding the Glandelinian warship Glandelinia, of the rebel fleet stationed near the mouth of the gun Br-Bum Creek learning that the Angelinians had fitted out six large schooners in Mic-Whirther Quimbia or Look Out Creek, and from the main army had collected a large or considerable body of troops to there with the intention of assaulting the bombarded town from the rear to dislodge the sharpshooters, determined that the vessels should be destroyed and the plot frustrated. He accordingly organized an expedition at once, and with one transport and two big merrimacs, he boldly entered the mouth of the little creek on the afternoon of the same day. The six schooners were discovered some distance up in charge of a large force of guards, who assailed fled after firing some volleys and gave the alarm. The six schooners were immediately boarded, and all set on fire, and when their destruction was rendered complete, these glandelinians under Lieutenant Harding returned to their boats and pulled again for their war crafts. Their position indeed was fully revealed by the light of the burning ships, and they were fired upon continuously from both banks of the narrow str stream, but not one of them was injured, though their uniforms in many places were perforated with bullets. The success of this daring enterprise was complete.

1493

One of the most peculiar occurrences of the same time was the destruction of one of the most famous river Angelinian Privateers called the Santa Mata in the same river not far from the town. This ship being of enormous size was observed by some of the rebel gunboats lying near the town under fire from the christian batteries, to be in motion above a christian battery known as Fort St. Peter. A dangerous but successful reconnaissance immediately made proved that the ship in moving up the river was engaging in trying to throw hell shells into the town by the rear. Believing that he could by approaching close to the nearest christian batteries, reach and destroy her the commander of one of the rebel gunboats, moved up at noon, accompanied by a fleet of rebel ships in these waters. By moving up as close to the obstructions as possible, he and his little fleet were enabled to although under heavy fire from two christian batteries, to approach the Angelinian Privateer, within the distance of fifteen hundred yards. A few broadsides of well directed fire bombs determined the range, and he and his glandelinians soon had the satisfaction in striking the ship, with eleven and fifteen inch fire bombs. The other gunboats and ships of the glandelinian fleet maintained a dreadful fire from an inflating position upon the two christian batteries, and the Angelinian Privateer at long range. Two glandelinian ships were torn to pieces by the fire of the batteries, and six more sunk, and disabled but the main commander had however the satisfaction of observing that the Angelinian Privateer Santa Mata had caught fire from the shells exploding in her in many places, and in less than half an hour or more, he was a mass of flames forward, aft and amidships. Simultaneously a large pivot gun mounted abaft her foremast struck by a shell exploded, her smoke chunnys went by the board, her big gun turrets blew up, and a little later her big magazine exploded with most terrific force, shattering her into smoking ruins. Nothing remained of her, and only through coolness and cleverness did the crew of her succeed in escaping to the christian side of the shore without a loss. The two batteries kept up a continuous fire upon the glandelinian ships, striking two others five times, but doing no damage whatever and soon having accomplished its purpose the rebel fleet withdrew.

During the great siege of giving wickey the greatest evils of the Angelinian army was the practice of straggling and hulking and so forth. This had however finally decreased under the elevating process of the greatest discipline, but many an Angelinian officer would agree in declaring that they had seen during battle at the siege, nearly one fourth of an Angelinian regiment, even including officers, drop dropping off one by one at convenient opportunities.

In many cases this may have proceeded from sheer exhaustion or severe wounds, but generally it was for the purpose of cooking their rations, taking a nap, or for shirking a battle. The discipline among the wicked glandelinians was very lax in this respect, and indeed more stringent regulations were imperatively demanded by the higher glandelinian authorities. The Angelinian generals knowing the seriousness of the wicked glandelinian cause and the stake the Angelinian nation was in, treated all kinds of stragglers without the slightest mercy, and thousands, nay scores of thousands of these miserable men during the whole siege were cut out or shot down by their own officers, or even comrades in their attempts to evade the stern necessities of battle. The result was that the Angelinian troops always fought with a desperate determination in any other kind of warfare. One officer from a hill at Mic-Whirther Post during the battle there with the rebel infantry after the town had been bombarded and captured, had a capital view of the tremendous battle and saw many instances in which some mounted Angelinian officers rode amid a body of stragglers, and forcibly with sword and pistol drove them back into the conflict. It seemed to be the most cruel of examples but was completely necessary on a situation like this.

While the Angelinians had pushed on into the village a grand skedaddle of the glandelinians ensued and the terror both in cutting small towns also was very great. Despite the fact that general Purgatorian had sent to this location thirty million troops, and whose many immense columns was stationed midway between the two outlying towns restless desire for the glandelinians there took possession of scores of thousands in no time, and for three days the roads to the interior toward Jivian wicker seventeen miles away were crowded with as miscellaneous a group of soldiers as that which may have marched into Noah's Ark. Wagons artillery and everything crowded the roads and such a jam could never be properly described. It was however called the "Norma Run skedaddle by the persuein Angelinians.

The Angelinians on the following morning met the rebels rallied under general Pemberton Federal with the whole glandelinian army of Purgatorians at Snow White Creek and after a sanguinary fight managed to defeat him with a loss of six hundred and twenty nine pieces of artillery and four million men in killed and wounded, and cutting his right wing off from all hopes of relief from Julio Gallio. Pressing rapidly on, the Angelinians overtook him not from from Jennie Bridge and in another battle the next day again defeated him with a loss of two million six hundred thousand thousand men, and seven hundred and seventeen guns. Purgatorian then retired into the city of Federal.

During this struggle, lieutenant Jennie of the Angelinians who served one of the guns which bombarded the town at the battle of Mic-Whirther Post hearing that a desperately bold glandelinian general and a colonel with a flag in hand endeavored to rally a glandelinian company resolved to capture him, riding up to the glandelinian officers in the face of their company of men, the gallant Jennie pointing a pistol at both of them, demanded their immediate surrender. A glance at the flying glandelinians convinced the General and his colonel that the day indeed was lost, and both gave up their swords to the brave Angelinian lieutenant. Six banners also were taken, one made of red yellow, green, and purple silk, elegantly fringed with this inscription: "When conquer the christian dogs or die, for our cause it is just" with "victory for glandelinia or death" in the centre. The other flag was of all red bunting, with the simple but horrible inscription: "Death to christian dogs." The name of the glandelinian general thus taken with his colonel was Avery Musheald, and the three hundred of his company were also captured at the same time.

The glandelinians though driven back as they were made a stand by a peculiar looking edge of rounded hill's each looking like a large crater, and also took positions relatively to the surrounding points. The glandelinians held it for firmly and the glandelinians unable to use artillery on account of the Angelinians bearing their own guns upon it, the glandelinians fought desperately until a general charge caused these works to be carried.

However no attack was made upon general Purgatorian's main position near Federal town until about half past four o'clock when at the order of the general the Angelinian forces began a most general advance against each flank of the glandelinian army, while fierce and strong demonstrations were being kept up against Purgatorian's main centre. Owing to the bigness of the christian forces and the nature of the ground the attacks were not made simultaneously as the Angelinian generals had intended they should be. General Gainesburg by sending general Planders force against Purgatorian's left, then held by general Warden, of Bernard G. Dunn's division, whose seventeen brigades extended their line from Little Mic-Whirther Post, across the Glendale Pike, to and beyond a large Apple Orchard along the Mic-Hollester and Pandor Pandora Railroad. This left wing of Purgatorian's army was driven back after a most bitter contest, and before general Hanson couldson who stood next in line with troops and artillery could give him or his troop any assistance. Upon turning general Bernard Dunn's left, these Angelinians fell upon the flanks and rear of general Hanson couldson leading part of their forces between that portion of the battle battlefield and Meldon's Hill Top, while general Law givers, with general Ralph Henderson's support, was assaulting general pond couldson's centre. The attack was made with such vigor that couldson called vehemently for reinforcements and general Joseph Burlington's brigades of Jennie Jaspers division as well as six brigades of Hanson Dunn's division under general Tillton Milton, and Abie Kahbble, were therefore sent him. A terrible struggle then followed, and the ground was contested bitterly at all points. At some point the Angelinian Angelinians made an attack with such overwhelming force as to force the glandelinian army back to the second line at the junction of the Seiden Railroad, the Glendale turnpike, and the railroad from Pandoras and A.B.C. Lines. The fighting here took place with great violence and though the rebel forces were routed from their positions and sent to the second line they were reinforced, and the attack of the Angelinians was finally repulsed by a consummate generalship and the not resolute bravery of the glandelinian troops.

7-4

At Purgatorian's left, after the Angelinians had carried the fortified works they pushed along the reach of the Mic-Hollester and Pandora Railroad lines in pursuit of the a slowly retreating glandelinians. However before it was expected the glandelinians managed to suddenly throw a fresh and more heavier force in their rear, cutting the christian force there off from the remainder at Mic-Whirther Post, and began to reassemble bigger forces of troops on their front and left flanks. Then rallying they counter attacked, and immense columns poured upon the surprised and apparently victorious Angelinians and pushed them back down the hill to the plains above the town and opposite Jennie Bridge, recieving at every point they attacked the Angelinians a dreadful fire from Angelinian artillery beyond the river of the main batteries which had bombarded the town. Unchecked by this however they rushed on general Herdrude Franklin's christian line, which however repeatedly repulsed them with great loss falling back however to Snow White Ford which they crossed by fording and wading and by small pontoons. At the same time a long line of works was retaken by the enemy elsewhere, and the glandelinians passing between them and the river in columns attacked general Turner's troops, which extending in a continuous line met the shock and drove it back.

During this time one of the most daring and desperate attacks on water occurred at the mouth of Maya river near Norma Catherine in battle with a glandelinian fleet under Admiral Turner Gruder and a portion of a blockading fleet under Westerner and Captain Aider. Sixteen Angelinian ships all big rams and merrimacs and one gigantic floating battery were attacked by only five glandelinian block blockade runners protected by double rows of bales of cotton and sandbags and loaded with provisions, troops and armed with rifles, cannons, muskets and so forth. It was backed by ten glandelinian warships of the dreadnaught type and each ship sixteen hundred feet long. The first Angelinian ship was blown up by an explosion of a shell or mine under her and another big ship was captured by boarding, after about all her one hundred officers, including two captains, and Lieutenant Commander Zimmermann and a crew of one thousand-one hundred and thirty had been killed by mucketry and artillery from the glandelinian block blockade runners. The other Angelinian ships were also fiercely engaged and managed to ram two rebel ships and sink them and set fire to another and then escaped the former losing no men and no wounded. The rebel fleet lost one thousand killed, and fifteen thousand wounded and drowned. Two big bark ships also loaded with provisions and fuel fell into the hands of the desperate blockade runners. Another Angelinian ship known as one of Zimmermann's flagships was not at the time engaged, being in another channel. Her crew were transported to other ships, and the captain in charge fearing she would fall into the hands of the Angelinian insurgents blew her up.

By some mismanagement however or accident the big explosion took place before a boat containing the captain, two lieutenants, first and second, and the boats crew got away, and they were blown up with the ship and the men killed. The glandelinian force was estimated at fifty five thousand, under the command of Admiral Graves. The Angelinian land force on the opposite sides of the river banks under the command of general Bur gueler did not exceed three hundred thousand men, the residue having not disembarked at the time of this river fight. The total christian christian loss was two thousand six hundred in killed, killed, and twelve thousand wounded, and six thousand taken prisoners. The Navy of this section suffered the most. The glandelinian loss was much greater, as the Angelinian guns were firing grape and canister continually in their midst.

Two weeks after these series of engagements mentioned a battle of terrible character occurred with the extreme main wing or left wing of one of Mansions main besieging armies near Julio Gallo White House on the outskirts of the works near the region of and hence by deep ravine which was studded on its tops with scores of thousands of peculiar ridge huts, intramurals and fortified works, burrowed in the earth here at the region of the Julio Gallo White House well riddled with Angelinian shells were at the time bivouacked general Leggoes Angelinian divisions of the Mansions main left wing of the advanced siege lines. To the left of the Julio Gallo White House an large opening in the banks showed the entrance to the main main covered way by which the Angelinian works could be approached. The attack of the enemy was fearful in force and fury and the odds against the Angelinians were terribly great, but in the face of the most heavy losses, they fought with a bravery and resolution never equaled before. After four hours of fierce efforts the glandelinians were finally beaten back from the face of the long line of christian siege works, but passing along the ravine, they penetrated between both the White House works and a section of a railroad line, thus flanking the Angelinians. The conflict therefore was renewed more bitterly and more desperately than before. The Angelinians along the front line fired so furiously that they not only torn tore the assaulting waves to pieces but exhausted their ammunition for artillery and musketry, but the bayonet as usual was once more made to play a most effective part so that after two hours more of it the glandelinian assailants had entirely withdrawn from the assault for the present. What general Graceina the main main christian commander here had deemed it to be, and what it really was at that juncture the most important outpost positions of the besieging lines had been successfully held and main maintained, though at a frightful cost of life. While a portion of general Purragatorians army was operating against this position near the ravine, general Emery Page made a fierce attempt to carry another section of the position at the centre, after opening upon it with heavy artillery of two thousand cannon from Brn grenonia hills. He however though he made six successive assaults was completely beaten back, and compelled to seek his main original position before darkness fairly set in.

At another section of this tremendous siege battle the fort fortified works under general Jacksona Indermann which position was known in military parlance as a star fortie fortie fortification, with four immense angles two on the river and two extending nearly to a morass was also heavily assaulted by rebel troops and a big glandelinian fleet simultaneously. In front of the immense eastern angle what was what looked to be a cluster of small houses, into which it was apparent the Angelinians may have thrown their large number of sharpshooters, and from which a most galling fire was poured upon the assaulting glandelinians under general Powder, which stormed them and carried them by assault. As soon as the apparent sharpshooters retreated from the cluster of small houses, houses there was a roar as if a mighty series of volcanoes suddenly erupted and all these glandelinians were blown to enterity by the mine traps set for them. However at other sections sections the assault was completely successful for the time being in spite of the fact that the glandelinians charged in the face of overwhelming numbers. At the signal given the many splendid brigades of glandelinians rushed on with their dreadful well known "Devil Yell", all of the hundreds of thousands now floundering like immense swarms of bearded horses in the morass, then pausing to dress their lines as if on parade, and anon charging forward again, regardless of the enormous storm of grape and shell, shot and canker and even high explosives, and exploding mines, that pitilessly tore huge gaps in their immense columns and killed and wounded men by the legion. For three to four long hours in that inferno of "Hell" they desperately fought ere the other small houses and outposts were finally carried and made a screen for a large number of the glandelinian troops. All that while from the port holes of the redan works and fortifications and from artillery and the main infantry line a dreadful fire was picking off the glandelinians like leaves blown down in an autumn storm, the Angelinians from their secure places of hiding and defenses picking off officers and men alike, while many in powder and other big cannons and Parrott guns were sending their broadside upon broadside of hissing mass messengers of death and destruction through the immense lines of the devoted glandelinians, crushing its bones, splattering its brains, and straining its path with countless mangled corpses and dying men. At last the long line of other out houses were gained through that seething storm, and occupied by the Winkle Glandelinians and ginkins which had with the Zimmermannians and Mic-Hollesstinians and Mic-Hollesstinians and Scoodlers had fought for them so gallantly and desperately.

But from the houses thus gained the situation could not be described, of the following but terrible and fruitless assault made upon the main line of fortified christian defenses. After the capturing of the line of houses, the rebels relieving reinforcements made a most tremendous assault on the grass and sand bag sandbag covered fortified works held by the Winkle and quadding Abyinkilians supported by the Abbeaminians and Angelinians. These works consisted of a chain of tremendously long forts or redans thirty feet high, about eight hundred yards apart and each half a mile long, and connected by deep intramurals and extending for seventeen miles or more entirely. General Lawless brigades rushed up in enormous lines from the houses in the face of a deadly cross fire, and with the heaviest loss planted their flags on the edge of some of the parapets, but the Angelinians gathered there like purple and red coated demons and hobgoblins so fierce they looked in their battle excitement and fury, and the glandelinians though fighting with superhuman strength were soon overpowered. General girtons brigades and ninth corps finally came to the relief, but were shot to pieces and scattered. General Purgatorian ordered up general Bentonla Barclay, and Baidenbrider on the extreme right. General Shoosmia Shoosmaucher and Heller gimmer ton also advanced and at point after point through that seemingly volcanic fissure eruption the glandelinian flags fluttered while over and on the works. On the extreme right general Shields divisions who had fought so desperately at Worma Run but now under general Gollerdrige, with plain Nightlinger gurners on his right, advanced furiously as the christian line still pouring in their deadliest fire fell steadily back, and like the others could only display the tremendous bravery of the men.

Governed by tremendous ravines filled with floodin water and mines, which intersected the ground, the glandelinian troops though falling as fast as men would rush up to see a fire would get near the works, and would make a most gallant rush onward, reach the parapet, yet when the edge of the redans were gained, the interior was swept by an inferno of fire from rifle pits in the rear and large partition partitions of breastworks made of boards, fences, and old wagons, and every device to think of, so that the glandelinians even when in the fortified works, were almost as far from victory on the so called "CHRISTIAN DOGS" as before.

In one case a brigade of Omarians led by general Griffithen Griffin took and held a long Redan, but all finally fell under the withering fire of their assailants except general Griffin, who with musket and revolver, captured fourteen Angelinian officers angle banded and nearly a hundred men, who had discarded discharged their pieces and brought them off. The hand to hand conflicts was most desperate and it looked for a while as if all the souls in Hades and the fiends were at war with each other in the everlasting fires so dreadful was the slaughter.

Closer were the lines drawn to the Angelinians, and many times the glandelinians and Angelinians at face to face used hand grenades, which they threw at each other as if playing baseball and catch, or rolled rolled down on the assaulting assaulting parties or columns in the ditch or clinging to the sides. Even ladders by the thousands were used, at at one time a hundred thousand men fought a bayonet duel at one single moment. Flags were torn to shreds by the storm of bullets, and many men were literally riddled. This dreadful day swept away millions of unfortunate glandelinians. It was apparent at last that no army could stand such losses. The big mines even began their work, and the fortifications were assailed from even beneath.

In this terrible assault of four hours duration the glandelinians lost six divisional generals, ten acting brigadier generals, who by a singular coincidence fell at the same time, and within a few feet of each other. In addition to these generals, they lost five other generals. One of which was killed while planting their glandelinian flag upon the parapet of the fortified works, from which the glandelinians were finally repulsed. This onslaught was on of most sanguinary in proportion to the numbers ever engaged, that occurred against the main line of siege, and as written before was contested on both sides, with great ferocity, valor and skill. The Angolins who held these works were generals Herdrus Ross, Amiel Motens, and Nic-Lobner Hanson.

At still other points the attack was pushed on with as great vigor but with not such good success at the beginning. The line of the enemy seven deep, and a three miles long moved over the low hills and out of the woods, in their fierce onset against the christian lines in a rocky pebble strewn field. The fire that met the glandelinian attack was so hot and deadly that the glandelinians at the left of their wing of advance forced them to waver and then make a quick recoil. Seeing this the christian generals ordered a general advance, in which the remainder of the christian force on this line of battle took part. After another dreadful contest the Angolins succeeded just after sunset in driving back the glandelinians, nearly up to their lines of reserves, and in retaking the guns and line of works, and the houses that had been previously captured. Thus ended the engagement on the left centre near or by the St. Star fortress. A new line of battle was then formed with the divisions of general Hanson Killjoy, and Robertson Crusoe, and by part of the Angolins Twelfth Corps, then under general William Schille Scheller who had taken general Irkones place, when the latter who had assumed command of the right wing of the works was wounded. Contrary to general Purgabrian's expectation, general Emory Page on the extreme glandelinian left did not advance his attack against the christians until quite a while, after the main attack had been made up upon the St. Star shaped fortress, and repulsed with such dreadful slaughter. General John Henry Gordons glandelinian force crossed S. Rose Red Creek and with his extreme right, moved against Wadsworth and Green Henryson Gale, the latter being the only Angolins brigade at the weakest point. But at no point however was the glandelinian assault successful.

One of the most interesting scenes of the battle that afternoon was the repulse and check of the glandelinian heeler cavalry of the glandelinian by the Abyssinkilian Winkie Regiment and the Abbeismian Company L. of conscription. They were only separated from the works of the glandelinians by a small stone fence, briar bushes, and a long straw and black berry patch just early grow. Indeed their daring and most heroic resistance against such forces yet yelling hooded gray demons was never surpassed in any battle field yet in this war, some of the men of the Abyssinkilians and Abbeismians even climbing the stone fence, or swarming a little beyond the berry patches to meet the headlong dash of the wheelers as they rushed madly down upon the little band of christian infantry. Not only this but they had the whole entire force of the main glandelinian cavalry and five big divisions of rebel infantry, of goodlers and artillery to fight, but not within standing this vast odds against them, they held their position and cut down the rebels by scores of hundreds per volley until big forces of reinforcements finally reached them and drove back the whole glandelinian tidal wave and storm. This little band of christian soldiers was composed of two colonels, both of whom were severely wounded, and they had all their other commanders down, and out of eight hundred and ninety men with which they went into battle, they had less than two hundred surviving in that half an hour's engagement.

General Pleania of the Angolins who made a counter charge with his troops drove the glandelinian infantry at this point back to their main works, and general Papercut with an Abyssinkilian force came upon general Hansens glandelinian battery of artillery of eighteen guns, which he charged three times, himself at the head, and the third time took the guns, limbers, horses and men combined. His horse happened to be killed by a round shot under him, which would the general in the leg badly, and killed three soldiers behind him.

On the following morning the battle was resumed with as much vigor as hitherto unparalleled in the great siege and war combined. By eight o'clock in the morning general Hansons glandelinian corps had pushed secretly and quietly up to the main christian rifle pits, and to within twenty or thirty yards of the long lines of bastions. By nine o'clock in the morning the attack was begun with great vigor, but the Angolins having found that cannon at such sudden and close range had become useless to repel the assault of the Zimmermannians threw a storm of lighted shells and grape shot over the line of parapets on the glandelinian forces and suddenly received in return twenty three thousand hand grenades in hand grenades, a lot of which exploded driving the christians out from that position of the works. The glandelinians then pushed the attack with still greater fury upon the main position of the christian lines, with the tremendous battle cry of "Charge and remember to hold your own way even unto hell" and at the advance of the enemy in three immense ten mile long lines was made with such impetuosity and ferocity, that in a short time the whole glandelinian surge was in full possession of the first line of works they had fought so desperately and in vain for the day before, and from which the Angolins had been finally driven from with dreadful loss. No time was lost in crowning that eminence of works and redans with all the heavy artillery available, and as soon as the captured artillery could be made to play with dreadful effect upon the christians, a charge of great strength was successively ordered upon the second line of positions held by generals Flanders, and Simmer both of whom were supported by the divisions of August Whillmans Darguin, and Whip Poor Tor. After a most severe struggle the glandelinians also succeeded in capturing the second line of works, where the Angolins had posted more artillery, and in a turning the latter upon the Angolins who soon had to fall back to their third line of works to prevent annihilation. The glandelinians like mobs of demons followed close upon them, shooting them down in tens of thousands, and then made charge after charge in order to capture the new positions, but without results, and when reinforcements arrived from general Hansons centre they were forced to abandon the attack and recoil to the lines of works they had retaken.

148

The Angolins then having thus received reinforcements made a most deliberate and desperate attack upon the rapidly increasing forces of the enemy to recapture their lost works. Two strong batteries of two thousand guns each which were in possession of the enemy committed damage beyond description among the christians charging christian columns mowing them down in whole lines nearly a mile long, and it was finally determined to send a force around secretly to assault them by the rear, also attack in front only waste cause annihilation of any number of assailants. After a long delay they were both retaken by the Abyssinkilian and Winkie Abbeismian divisions after a fierce hand to hand fight with the rear line of the Glandelinians and the whole rebel line then withdrew to the first line of works they had captured. These were assaulted by an enormous tidal wave of Angolins troops but the first three immense wedges of troops headed by three mile long lines of men, were all mowed down within half an hour, and the survivors coming on meeting such a fire that tore their lines to fragments they had to withdraw in confusion horrified at such awful slaughter. It was evident by such an annihilating fire that the Zimmermannians had received fresh reinforcements from general Purgabrian, and the want of main supports from Hansons line prevented even the works retaken of being held any length of time. The glandelinians screaming like a tornado charged in three double lines, ten miles long, and struck like a series of tidal waves gradually but surely all along the line, and after severe resistance the Angolins had to again withdraw, and remained under cover of the artillery still retained by them until joined by a part of general Glide Quindies division of conscription divisions commanded by general Marcellious Antoinis. Another advance was no longer ordered, and while the rebel right was thus engaged, general Zoe Rae Logannias divisions attacked the left. These other wedges and six lines of Abyssinkilian troops nearly eighty thousand strong were mowed down by a hurricane of grape and canister and musket balls and shells from the guns held by the enemy but the main line had pushed on like a cyclone up to the works and succeeded in flanking and forcing the rebels back in such a manner as to completely isolate for a while the whole of general Herdrus Johnston's Divisions of Goodlers which occupied the extreme glandelinian left in possession of the captured christian works. The attack of the christians was so fierce, that general Stevensons line of Zimmermannians became completely demoralized, and yielded in turn and by six noon the glandelinians were again in full retreat to the first line of captured works abandoning the second in confusion. Just then the other division of general Zoe Rae Logannias main ninth corps came up to the horrible scene, and a charge upon the other line of works was ordered. This third attack lasted for an hour, and though it resulted in the capture of many prisoners and arms the enemy still retained the works. The killed and wounded of the christians so far during these assaults was about four million, all in one morning.

Seeing that they had succeeded in repulsing the Christians the enemy after an hour's lull in the dreadful death struggle reattacked in greater force, but the long line of Christian batteries now kept them at bay supported by the long lines of musketry fire. A slight lull then again occurred, while a division of troops was sent to hold Glander bridge and a small bayou on the skirts of the woods near Norma Run. This they did, and at last by their generals' order advanced furiously until friend and foe were so mingled in strife that cannon could not be used, but finally an Abyssinikilian division, with a brigade of Concentinians, and an Abbaumman caviary force who came to its aid fell back, the many divisions losing every general and officer they had. So dreadful was the carnage. In this dreadful retrograde movement the enemy mounted Gargoylian wheeler infantry surrounded one of the Winkie Abyssinikilian divisions. Two other Christian brigades tried vainly to save them with a section of the Concentinian battery, but the glandelinians closed around them so that they had to spend their fire for fear of killing their own comrades, and the general of the Abyssinikilian division, and the commander of the artillery, with all their men were compelled to surrender to the enemy.

One of the greatest caviary conflicts at Jivian, the key was the big caviary engagement far to the right of the main battle line. General Concentinian Evans of the rebels was endeavoring to cut off the Angelinian trains of wagons from support to general Mansions but was attacked by the caviary forces of general Mayre Gordenia on and both these fine and daring caviary officers at first fought with their men dismounted, the glandelinians repulsing the Christian caviary forces, and capturing a large number of prisoners and wagons.

The exploits of the glandelinian caviary would fill a volume many times larger than these already written. Among the many gallant glandelinian caviary charges during the siege, there were always a few more brilliant than that of other battles already written in the war, where they rode with out drawing reins right over the Angelinian works, scattering all before them like a tornado does in sweeping a corn field. The caviary forces were not less than ten thousand at the most but they charged up the steep hill in the face of a terrific fire near Julio Ca. lillo White House and though they lost in killed and wounded nearly two thirds of their numbers, they captured almost the entire force of Christian soldiers they dashed again against with battle flags artillery and all.

The first worse kind of a caviary fight, and a stand up one at that on a large scale took place at Jemina's Ford near Julio Calilo White House on the early noon hour of the great battle on the second day. To the Angelinians general Mansion himself leading the caviary in person, and the daring glandelinian general Purgatorian belong to the chief honors of this brilliant though very bloody affair. Indeed the glandelinian caviary had strove to make a charge against general Mansions left wing in force of hundred hundreds of thousands all using the swift horses, the troopers of the enemy being, Gargoylian Kurde, the Hooded Woodlers, the dreaded Hammer heads, the Hooded Terror and Ku Klux Klans and the wheelers, supported by the fierce Zimmermannian and Mio-Hollensteinian caviary and dragoons. It was a perfect regular caviary fight on and fore for once during the war there was a fair and most desperate caviary fight. The forces opposed to each other were about equal in numbers and similarly appointed and equipped. The glandelinian generals made desperate by the news of the advance of Concentinian Aronburg with three immense armies toward Jivian Wiskey, and of the awful glandelinian defeats, at Jastruva, and Francis Atlanta, and also in alarm by the advance of general Mansions main line of siege batteries and upon the soil of Jivian Wiskey which they had sworn to defend with the last drop of blood, charged fiercely for the Christian works with the intention to carry it by storm and support the rebel in infantry to regain what the Christians had recaptured from them. To outwit them general Mansion took full charge of his own full caviary force and taking a short route met the glandelinian caviary right at Jemina's Ford and fighting like demons, the most desperate kind of sword, and pistol duels both sides disputed every root of ground. Again and again the glandelinians yelling like a storm charged upon the Christian lines, formed on echelon and as often were they repulsed in the most gallant manner. Horses and men dead or wounded strewn the ground like grain. When the Angelinians charged upon the enemy's lines it was done with such impetuosity that successful resistance against the onslaught was impossible.

Sword in hand they dashed wildly upon the Gargoylian and Zimmermannian foe, who after attempting to stand up against the first charges, doggedly retired before them. Later in the afternoon the last two lines of Christian works were finally captured by the strong glandelinian forces under general Purgatorian. The attacking forces issued from the works and the Angelinians being overwhelmed fled from the works on the approach of the immense swarms of glandelinians leaving considerable camp equipage, and large amounts of commissary stores. The glandelinians under general Purgatorian pushed forward to assault the fourth and last line of works where stronger fortifications had been erected, but instead of offering resistance here the Angelinians only continued the flight. As he camp up the Christians were hard pressed, and more fiercer engagements occurred, resulting in the capture of several thousand prisoners, and a small wagon train. When reorganizing themselves the whole force started for Mansions main line of works two miles distant hotly pursued by a Christian caviary force who hoped to save the works but the glandelinian column had the lead, and at four o'clock in the afternoon the glandelinian batteries opened upon these works, which replied most vigorously with three batteries of its heaviest guns. The desperate and loud cannonade continued for over two hours, when general Purgatorian coming up with the rest of the forces ordered the whole line to charge the Christian rifle pits, and redans there and to storm the fortifications. The whole line of insurgents then charged over the deep ditches, and poured through abatis two miles long in the face of a galling fire, and within twenty minutes after the order was given half of the left wing of the assaulting column was wiped out, general Purgatorian was mortally wounded, and general Francis Smith disabled by a cannon ball.

Simultaneously the glandelinian column under Swellian attacked general Warren's main Abyssinikilian brigades as he moved swiftly by the flank through the woods, and general Grantlin and Hoader's gunners, supposing this to be an attack of a simple rear guard and unsuspecting of the close presence of the main glandelinian columns. Near the main works ordered general Sigmore to come up and go to Warren's aid but before it could be accomplished the rebels under Swellian had inflicted a loss of three million upon the many corps of Warren. General Grantlin being ready to accept the enemy's headlong attack here, ordered Sigmore then to immediately join general Warren's right before it was annihilated and general Mansonia was summoned from the centre. On his arrival he promptly resisted the attack of general Grantlin's column and finally repulsed a portion of the rebel line. The glandelinians then determined to turn the main Christian left at this position and throw the main Christian line back upon the Eminis gun pier beyond. The glandelinians who had therefore assaulted assaulted Grantlin encountered the reinforcements under general Blacklin and therefore the counter attack of the Christians drove the rebels back over a mile down the ground they had won, where the rebels at this line of the assault stopped for an hour to rearrange themselves for a resumption of the attack. While thus pausing and awaiting the arrival of general Hibernia Streator, whom they wanted to place upon the left of the Christian line this same very general and his troops came up and the attack was resumed and with such suddenness that a good portion of the Christian line was driven back from all the ground won. Here the Angelinian generals rallied their men, and hearing of general Purgatorian being mortally wounded, the violence of the glandelinian attack finally began to subside. Late in the afternoon however the glandelinians again attacked the whole line of upper positions but were repulsed. The action however that day ended either as a draw or as nothing decided. The Angelinians in the two days battle already lost fifteen million men, and the glandelinian loss was over 80,000,000 in killed and wounded.

On the third day June 1864 the battle was again resumed. This time having gained four positions of works, the enemy now directed their intentions to take Julio Calilo Court House, and thus break the line of siege. The direct and only road route to Julio Calilo Court House was the railway right of way of the Mio-Hollister and Pandora.

19
 100000
 via Jennie Turner Tavern. On this road the main fifth and sixth corps of general Snider were ordered to take the advance, and by a rapid onslaught overwhelmed numbers to seize the Julio Gallo Courthouse. General Henderson's corps and other divisions were to follow on the same line, while general Siller, and James Turner were to move on a most exterior route by way of Jennie Bridge and Jennie's Ford. The vital interest of this big movement centred on the attack of general Snider to seize Julio Gallo Courthouse. These big corps advanced to the attack at 9 P.M. on the seventh of June. Reaching the vicinity of Jennie Turner Tavern he was delayed for two or three whole hours and a half by the fierce resistance of the big Abbaemidian force drawn up there to meet him under general Gander who blocked the way. He endeavored to push on and finally succeeded but at twelve o'clock noon he was again detained by the Abyssinians cavarly under general Jack Horner and other cavarly divisions of general Snider who engaged him in a frightful manner and blocking all advances of the railroad right of way, and barring further advance. He then after two hours of desperate but ineffectual effort gave way the troops falling back to general Siller who was advancing to clear his own path. He advanced divisions under general Robertson Crusoe were then deployed in long lines of battle, while the remainder of the forces followed in columns. At two o'clock these corps and columns emerged from the wooded region into a big clearing near the courthouse two miles north of it, the Angelinians in the meantime under general Jack Horner had arrived at the same place, and a sharp and bloody engagement of great violence soon ensued, when however the wooded region on both flanks of the glandelinians were soon cleared of the Angelinians. General Snider waited patiently for general Gander to come up with his reinforcements but they were of no avail and already in consequence of all these successions of bloody incidents general Jack Horner had managed to place himself against the path of the advance advancing glandelinian army, and having drawn upon the Julio Gallo ridge a long bulwark of defense, he was unable to hold the glandelinian army off of attack in check.

Indeed the writer must confess that the christian positions in these very locations were completely wild in looks and nature, where nature nature itself revels in producing the most fantastic forms, and piling rocks upon rocks, forming for the christian besiegers one of the mightiest and strongest positions around Vivian wick, and also wherever Vivian wick was one of the first scenes of the most sanguinary and extraordinary extraordinary battles in the war, a battle that later part of the day fought so wildly and furiously that the clouds of smoke from cannon and musketry rolled about like thunder clouds during a storm, and where the flash and the roar of cannon of thousands of guns sounded as if appearing to the other armies not engaged elsewhere that day, like the lightning and thunder of heaven when the world was coming to an end.

By six o'clock that evening the main glandelinian column in an endeavor to capture the Julio Gallo Courthouse by main force was moving up or toward the long redan works in long lines, and to the surprise of the Angelinians, a portion of this mighty surge of glandelinians disappeared in the wooded mouth of the left wing of the christian position, but here the glandelinian general filling his troops to the left, began the difficulty of the task of ascending toward the snail-like and redan from which guns flashed and roared like a volcano of flame and din as the head of the column having reached a long line of palisaded works held by the enemy went into full line of battle facing to the west and east, and with the right pouring against the palisades held by Dondon Donobians a straw stretched down toward Jennie's Ford. It was a fearful inferno of battle now and the fire of the whole christian line thundered like a million cannon but general girlchilde divisions which formed the main left of the glandelinian column and the main front, with Greeners brigades of Scodlers moving on the right charged up toward the works in full array.

With these were advancing general Gander who had succeeded the wounded general Purgatorius formed a second line of advance of the Abyssinian Abbaemidian divisions and of the brigades of the Mic-Hollanishian Fourth corps which he had sent to the front, placing general Gander's division on the right, and George Gross's on the left.

General Gander Rockerfeller formed a third line of battle, and held himself in readiness as he advanced, to add any part of the line which might need it. Thus covered the main line of a glandelinian troop were ordered forward, with one of the bravest lines of Abbaemidian ever seen in battle thrown out, and pushing onward and along the slopes of the christian redan, while a portion of the glandelinian were making a swing, managed to come upon a portion of the rear of the christian position, who were taken completely by surprise.

Before those at the foot of the works could comprehend the situation general Gander's big line of skirmishers had penetrated far toward the point of the christian position, and for the length of two miles of advance got in a heavy fire upon the Angelinians, who were making efforts to escape toward their main line of works little further up above, while a force of Ange glandelinians having gotten up from the rear poured down upon the Angelinians like a torrent from above. At the same time one of the glandelinian batteries of one of the enormous Mic-Hollanishian fortresses and those of the Angelinians along the fortified positions opened a terrific and most heavy fire upon each other and soon the contending position itself both sides was hidden from view by the cloud of smoke, which rose above and around them. The Angelinians made terrific resistance along the line, their small artillery and whole series of infantry lines.

For a long time keeping up a constant and deadly fire from behind their positions, jutting rocks, rocky ledges, trees and any advantageous objection of protection they could secure. Holding general Gander's right well against the palisaded works now captured, the main commander threw general Gander Rockerfeller forward on the main left, and he after having been reinforced by general Greeners forces, the christians on the point of their positions finally gave way, and fell back in some disorder to the main line of positions on the main line. General Gander Rockerfeller then swung around until his line of attack was parallel with that of the christian battle line, and again advanced, but now being met by well organized and well directed resistance for a time resisted. The christian army were now in their most strongest positions, Julio Gallo Courthouse being the centre of a long line of fortified breastworks or redan, but it seemed that they lacked numbers to man them, having lost heavily. They were also compelled to expose their right flank. General girlchilde then sent the main division of the Scodlers to hold all points across the five lines of positions already taken, and advanced in full force upon the christians, with Rockerfeller on the right, Gander, on the left, and the rest on the centre. General Rockerfeller managed to turn the christian left, as general Gander did their right, and then with one whole charge the whole glandelinian army was arrayed against the main christian positions. The struggle was now desperate and very sanguinary.

When news of the great glandelinian attack reached general Gander he sent to the support of his main left wing, the sixth corps of the Abbaemidians, that had so long battled during the whole siege, here and there. All the while the enemy were pressing to the attack, and one of the smaller sections of the christian position had finally been carried. A small brigade of giant glandelinian artillery having been brought forward it was massed upon a long line of dwellings and fortified works in front which was the shelter of scores of thousands of sharpshooters and which were preliminarily emptied of the Angelinians by shells, which set them on fire. When the glandelinian infantry at this section rose, and with a fan like spreading to the main right and left, dashed with yell and hurrahs of delight at the positions the Angelinians then slid out of their rifle pits, and leaped from behind their fences and trees, and raced for the main works to the rear. They foolishly foolishly did not stand for a single moment. A division of cavarly then issued out of a wood near by, seemingly Jennings to the support of the flying Angelinian infantry and sharpshooters. The glandelinians had halted to receive the charge of the troopers, fired a heavy volley into them at close quarters, checked, them, fired again, and kept firing. In half an hour neither christian cavarly nor infantry was in sight here. The glandelinians doubled quickened in line of battle over the crest of the redan, and disappeared in pursuit, with hurrahs and laughter laughter, on the other side, driving the Angelinian cavarly and infantry in headlong flight before them.

The first section of the main line of christian works on the left wing on the right was carried by general 1 girlchild g Corps who made a tremendous charge, capturing a fort, and taking fifty five guns, and nearly three thousand prisoners. They had also dismantled six guns of the Angelinians by the shells of their own batteries, and the other section of the works also were carried on the left after a most desperate fight, by the gargoylin eighteenth corps, of which they lost one third of their number. The glandelinians then pushed on, with rockefeller in the advance and again came up to with that portion of the fleeing enemy. Having driven the Angelinians from these sections of the works, rockefeller being without support upon his main right was forced to halt. General Fielders and Williams having arrived with the divisions and formed them in the open fields on the right of rockefeller's division ordered the line to continue the advance at all hazards. The lines of soldiers then moved forward again driving the Angelinians before them once more, halting now and then however for a few moments to dislodge some of the more stubborn Angelinians, who maintained their fire until almost under the feet of the advancing christian glandelinian foes.

General Rocker Fellers divisions were the first to encounter the advancing reinforcements sent by Mangion in strong force with one or two sharp volleys a mile long were exchanged with disastrous results for both sides, and then the Angelinians fell back to other strongly entrenched lines, from which they opened a most terrible fire. This was the commencement of the fiercest part of the desperate struggle. All along the line the christians responded the heaviest of rifle and cannon firing, resulting in repelling the attack of the glandelinian Confederates to break the main lines, and in this part of the struggle general rockefeller was shot down and mortally wounded and half of his command killed. Lines of artillery was also encountered along the christian lines which tore and crippled the attacking glandelinian waves and which continued to fire with the greatest intensity till after the glandelinians with one wild desperate charge managed to capture the batteries. When the Angelinians began to retreat and evacuate their works in front the glandelinians immediately pushed on.

The glandelinians now encountered other positions difficult of access with spurs on the flanks, and presenting indeed a most dignified appearance. General girlchild resolved to flank it if possible, and so at eight o'clock the corps which had pushed forward so gallantly advanced, the centre maintaining its position at the captured works and around and upon the base of the main line of redan works in the teeth of a very heavy artillery fire from the glandelinian batteries of other works still further up. The Thirtieth and the thirty seventh Zimmermanian or corps were wheeled on the left to hem in the Angelinians between the glandelinians advancing columns and a portion of the Mic-Holleston Pandora railroad. The fourteenth gargoylin corps met the Angelinians first, who charged furiously in series of waves to check this movement. General Shoemaker and Houser however were ready with their troops. They however in the desperate struggle were killed and their divisions hurled back, but general Williams managed to drive back the Angelinians with artillery alone, without the employment of a single musket. Batteries O. and L. of the First Mic-Holleston Corps in second position to boot which gave them a cross fire upon the Angelinians as they dared to advance over an open field, and it proved at entirely too hot for them. Again half an hour later, they made the same desperate attempt, and were driven back still more rapidly by a combined fire of artillery and musketry, which from the openness of the ground, had proved very destructive.

The charge made finally by the second and third divisions of the "inth glandelinian corps was made more bravely against the Angelinians, but from some faults from which it could not be explained valuable time had been lost, officers had fallen by hundreds, and the result was a most sad slaughter of men. The slaughter of men which the glandelinian country could not afford to lose. On arriving at one of the exploded forts along the christian line the glandelinians who carried that position found for miles a heterogeneous mass of loose earth, guns and gun carriages, dead and wounded gunners, and men, and many horses and burned wreckage of all sort. One of the glandelinian officers who led a right section of this section of assault assault noticing the earth moving near him as if a mole of gopher were at work underneath it, commenced digging vigorously and finally dug out an Angelinian officer who actually revived and was brought from the ground. Afterwards thousands of others were exhumed from their living graves and restored to consciousness. The Angelinians having been driven from these works the glandelinian troops to follow their advantage thus gained advanced nearly to a concealed position further to the rear but naturally drove the Angelinians from it and captured a large number of christians as prisoners. Shortly afterwards the Angelinians again advanced to counter attack, and were again driven back with the most heavy loss, and their third assault made at nine o'clock was attended with a result more thrilling and disastrous for the Angelinians. In the first three counter charges the Angelinians used no artillery whatever but later on they opened a most heavy and concentrated fire from six strong batteries poured a storm of shot shell grape and other missiles over the entire region including the region over which the enemy lines advanced.

7-407

After about an hour of this artillery firing the Angelinians again made their appearance in front of general Smiley's divisions, their assault being directed against his whole line but the main force of it against his center. Emerging in strong waves of humanity from the woods, they advanced in two long lines of battle. The glandelinian artillery and musketry greeted them as before, with a rapid destructive fire but without checking their progress. On they came with bayonets fixed and without firing a single shot. They approached the enemy lines, gained the outside of the former works and at some points a hand to hand conflict ensued over the tops of the breastworks, the glandelinians finally heaving back the Angelinian Angelinians, with their own bayonets as they attempted to climb over. But soon it was found that the rebel line was now broken broken near the centre, and the gap once made rapidly grew wider until nearly the entire line of the left wing of the rebel line was swept back, leaving the once captured works and artillery in the hands of the Angelinians once more. General Smiley with great coolness, set to work to rally the Glandelinians who were panic stricken, and in a short time succeeded in reforming a line with its main left resting against the breastworks. At the same time general Poudre ordered the second division to be faced entirely about, and cheering the cheering and urging the men forward by word and example led them in person on a charge at double quick. This charge which was made under a very heavy fire, was most gallantly executed, and in conjunction with the line rallied by Smiley instantly checked the Angelinians and again regained the christian intrenchments, for some distance further toward the right and left. After the christian counter charge had been checked in the centre and along that portion of the line against which they had chiefly directed the main force of their attack, the greater part of the Second Mic-Hollestonian division returned to their own intrenchments.

At this very moment at some point of the captured christian works a secret mine mine was sprung by a christian engineer and a dense cloud of black smoke immediately following the upheaval of earth was succeeded by a ponderous cloud of white smoke like the sudden eruption of a volcano, which entirely covered the scene for nearly a mile and concealed the results of the desperate scene to check the furious enemy advance by mines being exploded under ground. On rolling away the it revealed the earth settled back in its former position, but indented with a species of enormous crater, into which water from some unknown source ran. It had no result upon the assaulting glandelinian columns whatever.

The battle of Julio Callio Courthouse was indeed a most desperate struggle and the most brilliant dash of the many glandelinian columns had carried six successive works of the Angelinians the glandelinians having gained ten miles of ground in the three days. One of the most daring scenes was the dogged valor of an Angelinian general who refused to surrender one of his guns. A sharp death struggle ensued between him and a private glandelinian soldier, in which the unfortunate Angelinian got his brains dashed out with the butt end of a musket. The total defeat of the Angelinians at this point was very much attributed to the most brilliant charge of the enemy made upon the christian lines as already described by which the christian flank was attacked when the glandelinians entered the sixth position they had captured it was found that the retreating Angelinians had fired a large quantity of trees and bushes but the flames were however put out before all was destroyed.

The last of the action was when the glandelinians charged to carry the seventh and last line of works. These positions were very strong ones, being situated upon hilly ground, commanding all approaches to the glandelinian charging columns, and the preservation of the glandelinian general depended upon the men to drive the Angelinians out. General Hooper was equal to the emergency. The general ordered General Che Chester Gump to take his gallant brigades and carry that position. General Chester Gump placed himself at the head of his gallant command, and with drawn swords and deafening cheers charged directly in the face of a most destructive withering fire, capturing two hundred and twenty two pieces of artillery, upward to one hundred thousand prisoners, together with sixty cannons, a large amount of ammunition and six hundred horses, which he brought off in safety. It was without exception for the glandelinians a most gallant charge of the battle, and when it became known among the main line of the enemy cheer after cheer rent the air. The Angelinians retreated from all of their outer works behind their besiering fortifications and batteries, destroying in their flight many lines of wooden barricades and bridges. In the rear Colonel Helle's brigade of the Second Division, under General Smithers was hotly engaged with an Angelinian cavalry force under General Gaidner. General Smithers sent word to General Snider that the Christian Cavalry were driving him slowly back. The general then replied that he must hold the captured position at all hazards, that he could and must whip the Christian enemy. Colonel Helle's brigade being reinforced by a brigade of Wheeler Garcoylins from the main division of Wheeler Cavalry charged the Angelinian Cavalry and drove them nearly a mile. The day now was theirs. The Christian troops had disappeared from the glandelinian front, and they succeeded in carrying all of the works, which they had crossed without being further annoyed by the Christians. In a desperate charge however at the head of a column the glandelinian General Snider fell mortally wounded being shot in the lung. Thus ended the three days battle of Julio Gallo Court House with one of the most brilliant victories of the enemy. It seriously enhanced General Mandons besieging main lines further off and he had to send big divisions to reinforce it. To retake the seven lines of works, and fortifications now at least seemed impossible and he had to be content at leaving the enemy where he now was. If another serious break like this would have occurred elsewhere the siege would have been broken.

As I have stated in other chapters of the siege of Vivian Wickey one of the principal glandelinian defenses of Mic-Whirther section was the fortresses of Gr Granco Darling, Thumbelina, Marcucian and Thumbelina, a series of heavy work works on high banks called "armor Hills" eight miles below the region of M. Vivian Wickey. Here the river was dosed with the heaviest piling and hundreds of vessels loaded with heavy material and stones were sunk in the channels near these three fortresses. The work was mostly casemated and mounted with the heaviest kind of guns. They were each of sixty hundred feet in length, and it will be remembered that the Angelinian fleet and land forces once made a desperate assault against the works of Fortress Thumbelina but were repulsed. The ships which made the storming attacks by water were unable to elude the guns efficiently to reach the glandelinian works, and the sides of one of the best of the Angelinian warships were not thick enough to resist the plunging storm of shot from the fortress, which struck its side at right angles. The Angelinian warships Nanny and Fanny engaged in the assault burst six guns at the first discharge. General Gaidner had arranged to make efforts to stop the depredations which the glandelinian fleet of armed steamers six of them in all had been committing upon the Christian camps along the shore and had therefore advanced several forces from Libermann junction with the aid of many Angelinian siege gunboats and other war craft, ten regiments of Munchkin Cavalry, and one inkie artillery battery and reached the location of Carnays bridge over the Norma pun near the southern section of the Mic-Whirther section of Vivian Wickey early in the fourteenth of June. Their progress however was stopped by several long unknown earthworks, under whose guns lay the rebel armed steamers.

7-41

Early on the following morning on the fifteenth Commander Mic-Galler opened fire from his flagship and was joined in it fiercely by the other Angelinian gunboats and other war craft while the troops were advancing on the shore to engage the Glandelinian batteries and ships from the rear. The troops were not long in subjecting their enemy to a fierce infiltrating musketry and artillery fire from the woods and such was its destructive effects that the rebel ships had finally been compelled to retire toward an upper shore battery at Mic-Whirther Janet. Early on the following morning the glandelinian ships were seen floating down the wide Norma pun in sheets of flame having been set on fire and abandoned by the glandelinians. The Angelinian troops therefore returned to their own main positions the many thousands of Angelinian wounded having been meanwhile placed on large rafts and towed down the river to the Christian positions.

Another thing peculiar about the great siege, considering the terrible nature of the many series of severe bombardments of the main Christian siege batteries, it was wonderful that throughout the three years not a single inhabitant was killed by it, although many families refused to avail themselves of the opportunity to leave before the firing of each artillery duel between both sides commenced. These however managed to find shelter in the cellars of the houses, and thus escaped, while the many buildings in the neighborhood of the range of shell fire in many cases were so shattered as to be perfectly uninhabitable. Six big palace like buildings in Norma Catherine which had not been destroyed by the big conflagrations there presented a melancholy spectacle no less than thirty thousands of big round shot having gone right through one building and razing it or leaving the appearance of as many portholes.

On the night of June the fifteenth in the blockading region as an Angelinian battle ship was stationed near Port Wickey a long Schooner looking like one of Abbisania, but being believed to have been a glandelinian in disguise ran at full-sail against an Angelinian transport steamer as it was entering the harbor. As the glandelinian vessel was painted yellow, and even had no kind of lights burning, there was little doubt among the captains and other officers of the blockading ships that it was really a daring and desperate attempt on the part of a glandelinian blockade runner to wreck the pursuing transport, more especially as the crew of the schooner, immediately after the shocking collision, put off in boats and rowed away in all expedition toward the rebel side of the shores. After disengaging herself from the sinking glandelinian schooner the Angelinian transport pursued her way and reached one of the inner islands near the Bay in such a leaky condition that the troops had to be landed at once.

At the same time one of the objects of Admiral Gaidner was to send an expedition to attempt once more to take big fortress Thumbelina and so the ships sent under Commander Sabine proceeded to the point as soon as ordered with the intention to land their troops as soon as the enemy's batteries were silenced. The strength and position of Thumbelina were known, having been in Angelinian hands since eighteen forty eight, yet though the fleet consisted of eighty strong battle ships they met something unknown looked for. The eighty big vessels advanced firing terrific broadsides at the water front of Maya and Thumbelina but without a single reply till they were well in range, when with a murderous deafening roar the batteries of both forts opened. Sixteen of the ships were immediately crippled and forced to strike, while a shell penetrated the boiler of the flagship the "Turner", causing an explosion that made her a peit wreck. Four other ships, were sunk, and twenty disabled and forced to retreat. The expedition was therefore given up after an hours disastrous action. Many hundreds were killed in the action and by the explosion, the rest escaped except those who survived the wrecked ships and who were made prisoners. It was seen that Thumbelina could not be taken in this way at all.

During this time it happened that the fierce boeler glandelinian Cavalry managed during a terrific sortie to capture an Angelinian supply train of several thousands of wagons loaded with ammunition and a substance, while on the way to Norma Bridge. The guard of the wagons being about thirty thousand in number made a strong resistance, but being fewer in number than the rebels were soon overpowered by the glandelinians, whose headlong attack, and numerical superiority threw the whole train into great confusion and prevented any escape. The strange Gargoylian cavarly were supposed to have crossed the Jennie Bridge at Klugtonia junction above general Manions first main line of positions, and come down from that point upon the wagon train. This daring act of the glandelinians showed general Manion how materially a large force of cavarly was needed in his besieging armies. The feeling of strong sympathy for unfortunate Angelinian christian officers and men who so long while prisoners suffered outrages at the hands of the unhuman Angelinian gon federates gave way to continually feeling of joy as news came of the escape of many officers and men at many times from Vivian Wickey. From time to time during the siege many hundreds had escaped, and the narrative of the escapes of Angelinian soldiers and officers with child slaves they secured and brought with them had been among the most intensely exciting incidents of the war and siege. But when more than a few thousand contrived to get out of the G city prisoners the interests and excitement knew no bounds. One of the most exciting escapades of prisoners ever occurred was from one of the prisoners in Mic-Wh Arthur Janet. The method employed in escape was as follows;

Two thousand pris prisoners at different points of the prisons having found access to secret cellars, commenced work, relieving one another as the opportunity offered, and having child slaves to watch out and warn them of the approach of the wardens. Their intru instruments were ki knives, one knives, plato knives, chisels and files. After getting through the walls they disposed of the excavated soil by drawing it out in something of a small water bucket, in which they attached to a sort of cord. This would be filled by the party at work in the secret tunnels and pulled out into the cellars by their comrades, who disposed of it by spreading in it in shallow layers over the floor, concealing it beneath straw and other hiding places so the inspectors would not discover their work, the inspectors going round six times every day. The tunnel completed by over one hundred and fifty one days of patient but nerve racking toil, was about sixty hundred feet long, and opened into an old abandoned child slave mill beyond the line of strictest Soodlar guards. In order to elude their pursuers for they took the child slaves with them, who they knew would soon be their traitors, they scattered as much as possible. In this fashion ten thousand soldiers and officers got away and with them nearly as many ragged branded marked child slaves all scattered but each man retaining a child. Indeed many wore their hardships and sufferings, and more frequent were their narrow escapes from the glandelinian Gargoylian cavarly who the next morning were fairly bushwacking the whole region out side the christian lines for them. The joy with which several Angelinian generals and two colonels experienced when they caught sight of the many fugitives knew no bounds, and they rushed in overwhelming numbers upon the rebel pursuers and rescued them, and their joys could not be expressed.

CHAPTER TWENTY.

CHAPTER TWENTY-ON-CHERTOWN.

BIG CHRISTIAN ARMIES UNDER CONCENTINIAN ARONBURG DESCENDS IN FULL FORCE UPON BESIEGED CITY OF VIVIAN WICKY. FIERCE BOMBARDMENTS AND BATTLES RAGES CAUSING IMMENSE LOSS OF LIVES AND PROPERTY--- CATASTROPHE UNPARALLELED IN ANY HISTORY OF THE WORLD--A NIGHT OF IMMENSE DARKNESS HORRORS AND SUFFERING. SAD SCENES BEYOND DESCRIPTION IN ALL PARTS OF THE RUINED CITY. COUNTLESS CORPSES IN THE STREETS EVERYWHERE---A SOMBER, SOLAR WEEK---

---SURVIVING PEOPLE LOYAL TO ANGELINIA APATHETIC, DEJECTED AND HEART BROKEN AND FULL OF DREAD.

FOR these pre proceeding chapters this volume is to show a chronicle of the frightful visitation of the fiercer battles, floods, and explosions and shell fire upon the besieged city of Vivian Wickey, which unparalleled calamity occurred in the latter part of the war of the third year, and the author had taken the utmost care to make this fabled record of the worse of the catastrophes of the war as complete as possible in every detail. No expenses have been spared to write down the occurrences. The situation in the stricken sections of the besieged city of Vivian Wickey during the last threemonths of the siege before its capture is to be portrayed by day exactly as it could have existed if it had been true. (Thank god it was not) and is written in a way that could have outdone the greatest imaginations of any writers. No storm of attack have been followed from its inception, just south of the Julio Callio Section, all around to the last section of Vivian Wickey to the capture of the island and the glandelinian navy, through Norma Catherine, and then along its inward course, until the rebels evacuated the city and all the works and fortifications, the horrors of the battles in the streets the cruel killing of countless thousands of desperate glandelinians by shells, and musketry fire, and exploding mines, the great floods that break out, the wrecking of thousands of buildings in Norma Catherine, the destruction of countless helpless people men women and children by the enraged rebels who murder to revenge their fall are to be given in all its graphic and yet fair language. The fearful mutilation of the dead soldiers and people by the rebel ghoul-like vandals who afterwards depole the corpses of all their arms and valuables and the swift vengeance that follow these unutterable crimes when the Angelinian troops shot the vandals, vampires, and harpies by the hundred score, are to be told in the most vivid and exciting way, the disposal of the countless dead by the casting of their bodies into the sea and big rivers, burying them hastily in long trenches or cremating them by burning them upon the most vast human pyres ever thought of, erected even in the principal streets of the city are painted in the ghastly colors of the results of the rebellious worse horror, the awful wave of insanity which swept over the unfortunate city and claimed hundreds of thousands who had escaped the perils of the deluge of iron hail and explosives, and the flood, and the most frightful battles in the streets is set forth here most graphically. What caused the mighty Lucillia sea Explosion, the possible possibilities of the recurrence of another such explosion, and the danger which constantly hangs over unguarded Galverinian sea coast cities are also given in detail the awful pestilential conditions set up in Vivian Wickey by the wars worse catastrophe, the panic stricken people, flying from the scene, of death, desolation and fires, the horrible spectacle of countless bodies floating in Wickey Bay, and the rivers mouths, the generous response of the people of Angelinia to the appeal for help, all these are written with minuteness. Nothing is wanting to make this work about Vivian Wickey down fall reliable and as correct as possible, in short the story of the wars worse centre is well and accurately told, of a disaster which has not its like in any where in the real world of ours, or like since ever happened in Galverinia itself. Worse than any disaster that ever happened in the Angelinian world.

Justo on the month of July General Concentinian Aronburgs big army pushing up from the south and west, with immense reinforcements gathered from the mobilization camps at Dorothy Gale, Angelinia Agathia, and Oama had reached the besieging christian armies under Mansion, and general Mansion being relieved of his command on account of his condition from overwork in maintaining the siege, he needing rest better Concentinian Aronburg started operations immediately for the taking of all sections of vivian wickey by force. He ordered Zimmerman of the fleets to gather in a frightful storm of shelling upon all of the sea board fortifications and islands combined, and to never cease firing under no circumstances, or no matter what happened or was did, and sending a notice by wireless to the loyal inhabit ants of the city of what was coming, hurled an assault upon the enemys main right which was in possession of Mansions left grand divisions of seven works, and recaptured a all in one days hurricane battle in which he lost over fifty million in killed and wounded and the enemy over eighty and drove the enemy back to their own encampments. Then the main christian batteries of Mansions were massed in full numbers upon the outer works of vivian wickey, while the batteries of his own including, vivianmans and others were reinforced to their aid, and the frightful storm of iron hail, explosives shells grape, and high explosives, which descended upon the fortifications of vivian wickey on the land side for miles and miles causing the loss of many countless of lives among the resisting glandelinian soldiers, and the destruction of millions of dollars worth of property in one day, and then ravaged certain portions of the interior of the city, killing glandelinians there and inflicting damage which cost many millions to repair has had no parallel in any history. The din was dreadful beyond describing, and was added to the shaking artillery wild demonical storm of fire from the forts, and from the sea board as thousands of ships joined in, and the coast was haken for miles.

While this most tremendous cannonading, of the siege was in progress and gaining force hour by hour as more and more cannons went into action general Aronburg at the orders of X Concentinian Aronburg sent forward great forces of two troops which attacked the enemy positions at Jennies and Childrens Bridge carrying all before them and when they urged toward the enemys main line of works they came on like a storm waves lashed into a tremendous irresistible fury, and then it was that despite all resistance, combining their main forces, the christian forces rushed forward with the greatest violence and poured over the works driving the enemy back in confusion.

In the short space of four hours the entire line of enemy works in front of all of the land side of Julio Gallio was fairly covered by the victorious Angelinians, who drove all before them, while the dreadful christian batteries hurled shot, shell and bombs of all kinds, at the rate of one hundred per second, and from many hills which fell into the city by accident, business houses, public buildings, churches, all sorts of residences, even charitable institutions in the hands of the enemy and all other structures gateway before the explosions of many shells, and the glandelinians who were driven from their works and which gave way entirely from or before the pressure of the christian onslaught under viviananna started toward the higher fortifications and works of the city and those of the rebel lines which did not crumble all together, were so torn and injured in the majority of cases, that the survivors fled panic stricken into the very section of Norma Catherine and prepared to defend themselves as a last resource in the houses and streets.

As the Angelinians pressed on, and started battling the enemy in the streets and driving them from one street to another and from house to house during the proceeding night, such a night of horror as the unfortunate inhabitants were forced to pass who witnessed the battle had fallen to the lot of few since the records of any events, storms or wars and sieges in histories of the world were first opened. In the early evening when the glandelinians started to retreat into the city of Norma Catherine and the Angelinians began to first press on from house to house and street to street the people either loyal to Angelinia or disloyal residing along the frontal portions near the besieging lines or the waters of the river and near it, fled in the greatest fear from their homes or into their cellars or sought the highest and any points in the bombarded and fiercely attacked city as places of refuge from the storm of bullets and shot and shell, taking nothing in their haste but the smaller articles articles in their houses with them. On and on a fairly c rawled the attacking christian forces pouring like torrents into every street again available until darkness set in, and then as though possessed of a fiendishness of vindictiveness the glandelinians hidden in the various ruined houses, in or behind barricades in the streets, or in doorways on house roofs and elsewhere poured upon the christians as fierce a fire as ever could be delivered but could not at up their headlong attack. Simultaneously an explosion of some big mine burst a levee near Norma Catherine in and in a short time on her water front a flood poured in over the surface of the town, completely submerging it--covering the most elevated ground near it to a depth of five feet, and the lower portions ten and twelve feet. The storm of shot and shell from the christian batteries of countless thousands of guns was equally malignant if not more fiendish and cruel, every score of explosions sounding like the roar of a hundred thunder claps of the loudest kind at once tearing great buildings in possession of the desperately fighting foe and even the most beautiful homes to pieces with a seemingly evident delight, scattering the debris and dead mangled bodies of the glandelinians far and wide, telegraph and telephone poles and lines were thrown down, big fires were ignited, railway tracks and bridges in the city--the latter connecting the city across section of Norma Catherine with the main section of Julio Gallio--torn up and blown to pieces, and the mighty tangled masses of wires, bricks, sections of roofs, sidewalks, fences and many other things hurled into the main thoroughfares, and across streets rendering it impossible for the Angelinians to make their way along for hours enabled the enemy to take advantage of it as a sort of abatis and for days resisted the fierce attacks and the wildest fire of the christian soldiers. In Norma Catherine, during the battle in the streets, and the terrible cannonading fourty million four hundred and fourty thousand people, women and children all loyal to Angelinia covered in terror in cellars, on or in their own homes in face of deadly peril, in terror for many days, the intense darkness of nights and the awful scenes of day, and the sickly inferno of firing and fighting in the streets, the roaring and crashing of volleys of many thousands of distant cannons, the demonic howling and shrieking of many shells and the indescribable and awful crashing, tearing and rending as the houses, hundreds at a time per day were wrecked and shattered, or ever sounding in their ears. Often too the apparently friendly shelter where many families had taken refuge it would be swept away, the explosions and falling of buildings plunging hundreds and hundreds of helplessness who dared to remain above their cellars into the mad scene of death and destruction or into the mad current of the floods caused by the bursting of the river levee which flowed through every lower section street of the town, and fathers and poor mothers were forced to undergo the agony of seeing their children drown, or die of horrible shell wounds, with no possibilities of rescue, hundreds every day lost their wives on account of their own recklessness, and wives their husk husbands, and the elements of bombardment and war were only merciful when the shell explosions destroyed an entire reckless family at once.

7-412

All during the fearful weeks engagement until the Glandelinians were finally driven out and into Norma Catherine and a gray and gloomy dawn finally finally broke upon the sorrowing and stricken city the entire population of Norma Catherine stood face to face with the grim death in its most horrible shapes, they could not hope for anything more than the fury of the bombs, the death from bullets, or the ravaging fury of glandelinians bursting upon them with intent of vengeance for their defeat, and as they realized that at every passing moment that souls of the inhabitants as well as scores of thousands of the enemy were being hurled into eternity, it was at all wonderful indeed that after the strain was over, and Norma Catherine was in possession of the Angelinians and all her land fortifications and works, and all was quieted down, and the strain was over and all danger from battle and foe gone, reason should be finally unseated and men women and children by thousands break into the unmeaningly unmeaning gayety of the maniacs!

Not one inhabitant of Norma Catherine who had faced all the horrors of the enemy and the entire edge old enough to realize the terrible situation had any other idea than that death was probably to be the fate of all before even another day was passed, so fierce was the storm of death and destruction all around and the conflicts in the streets and houses, and when this long and weary suspense to which was added the chill of stormy weather, and the growing pangs of horror, and hunger and big conflagrations raging, was at last broken by the evacuation of the enemy, and by the first sunray of hope of the Angelinians now being in possession, the latter was not entirely welcome, for the face of the sun was hidden by morose and ugly clouds from burning fires all over.

Thousands were killed or wounded during the fray, and their bodies either mangled or mutilated by the explosions of shells or by the falling wreckage which had been tossed everywhere like the horrors of Florida, left to decompose in the slimy ooze deposited by the flood or forced to lie in the streets naked and exposed to all sorts of weather. Dejection and dependency succeeded fright and horror, the majority of the business men of the city, had suffered such losses that they were completely over come by apathy, nearly all the hon homes of the people on the front sides of the city facing the christian batteries were in smoking ruins, covered with masses of scorched or dead bodies of glandelinians killed in the horrible death struggle, the streets were now impassable, and the dead of both sides lay thickly on every side, like streams blown from a hay stack by a cyclone, all telegraph and telephone wires were down, and as miles and miles of railroad track had disappeared inside the city under masses of wreckage, and the bridges destroyed or wrecked, there was absolutely no means of communication for the besieged enemy with the outer world, except by escaping by sea and river. The strange spectacle was then presented of the richest and biggest city in the Angelinian world lying with one section already fairly lying prostrate like a dead child, helpless and hopeless, a prey to glandelinian hordes, vultures, a hordes of thieves, thugs and outlaws of every sort, its people starving untill the Angelinians took possession and gave their rations to them, and the awful putrid bodies of its dead, and the awful numbers of dead and wounded or dead entirely of both sides breeding pestilence.

How

HOW THIS BIG AND TERRIFIC ONSLAUGHT WAS ORIGINATED.

Big christian columns which moved with the velocity of that which managed to sweep with irresistible force into Norma Catherine and which were also common to the southern and southeastern coasts near Vivian Wickley invariably was originating or originated by the cleverness of general Noro Viviananna and Francis Viviananna who helped general Concentinian Aronburg capture the city of Francis Atlanta after a three and half years siege and almost destroy Manley's three armies there, according to general Hansonia Francis Johnston. It had been probably known that the generals had at first intended to move their armies against Mic-Walther Janet a little further east of Norma Catherine but general Concentinian Aronburg ordered different and in this most particular instance the place of concentration therefore was quite south and east of Norma Catherine, and the other movement of the armies north of Norma and Jennie Bridges. The outstanding lines of the assaulting christian vases of men varied in length from forty to forty five miles in length, and as they had moved on in separate columns shifted their extreme columns between Jennie Vivian, and Gunbeam Creek and then pushed on with a force so irresistible that nothing what ever could withstand it. Because of the capture of Norma Catherine in a week's time it was by two immensely strong columns of Abyssinkilian and Inkis Troops supported by Angelinians and Abbeismians, meeting within the very section of the city at a perfect angle, and thus it caused the city and the enemy forces defending it so desperately in the buildings and streets to be rapidly rapurapidly placed between a deadly converging fire from overwhelming numbers, and which finally caused the glandelinians to withdraw step by step from Norma Catherine, and retreat into the stronger defenses of Julio Gallo. It is or was seldom that a storming assault of any kind, moved so successfully or so far into such a well defended town as did this one made by the Angelinians, but it was not however unprecedented.

1418

The reason that the Angelinian forces under Viviananna and his assistants captured Norma Catherine so quickly and even the assaulting lions roaring so far as the outer defenses of Norma Catherine, was that the assaulting columns pressed on by the constant commands of their officers, moved about twice the same force as other armies did on making onslaughts in battle. Thus usually the force of such onslaughts would be swept like a wind storm on a line of works only and be broken up by losses and so on, but this assault was supported by an ever increasing number of troops, and so though the enemy fought for a week, day and night as desperately as men could fight, and standing their ground like lions they could not withstand the ever increasing pressure of the series of deadly assaults and therefore Norma Catherine was hastily abandoned. The whole works of Norma Catherine were captured on the land side, besides thousands of big cannons, and many prisoners. This assault at once missed the main outer works called the Maya and Thunbolin fortifications, and consequently was deflected further to the north. The thunder of guns from these forts which tried to stop the assault sounded like many big thunderstorms raging in one instant region, and all the districts just far north of this big storming assault was under heavy artillery fire from both sides, which seemed to be the natural result after such commotions of the opposing armies, the besiegers and the besieged. The conditions of the earthworks around or near Norma Catherine were put into such a serious condition by Viviananna's big artillery storm that when the assaulting columns reached them, the defenders had no possible means as cannons and other means to escape a disastrous defeat, and hence the dire results. All the cannons of their outer works had been dismantled and the works had been carried through at dreadful loss to the Angelinians and Francis Viviananna was severely wounded and general Johnston also. If there had been a chance for the Angelinian columns of its right wing in particular to have been able without more resistance to move further westward so as to go straight west it would in all probability, have captured the fortresses of Thunbolin and Maya, but though some assaults were made by weaker columns, and though it was heavily cannonaded, the fortifications received no living more than a severe shaking up. In this event the worst effects had in a probability been felt by the enemy who defended Norma Catherine and Concentinian Aronburg knew that if fortress Gertrude Angelina, Mic-Holleston, Thunbolin, and fortress Vivian and Silverbe 11, and the Evangelina grandia Heights were not taken Norma Catherine would be recaptured in no time by the foe.

It was indeed an absolute impossibility for any one to ever form an idea of the extent and magnanimity of the disaster within a week of its occurrence. The morning of the day after the city was in possession of the Angelinians, when the fearful battle and cannonading had subsided in this locality, the streets of all parts of Norma Catherine were found clogged with debris of all sorts. The people of Norma Catherine could not hardly realize for several days what had really happened to the enemy, and whether they were delivered from the one enemy or not.

Forty thousand six hundred houses had been entirely demolished by explosions of shells or by conflagrations started by the bombardment, and hardly a building in the town was fit for habitation. The people released at last from the enemy's power so suddenly were apathetic, they wandered around the streets in a aimless sort of way, unable to do anything whatever, and afraid to have preparations made for the reparation of the great damage done for fear the enemy would counter attack and recapture Norma Catherine. The morning following the beginning of the wars worse catastrophe it was apparent that not all of the glandelinians had been really driven out at that for Norma Catherine was completely in the hands of large bands of Gargoylian thieves, thugs, ghouls, vampires, and bandits, and many of them even women and glandelinian girl and boy scouts, who made all attempts to search and rob the dead soldiers of the fallen christian side, and mutilated the thousands of mangled corpses which were lying everywhere, ransacked all business and munition houses still standing, and residences, blowing up big munition plants to prevent their being taken over by the Angelinians, and creating a reign of terror among the non-combatants by attempting to murder the little children, fire on men and women from ambush, and do all kinds of insults, which lasted and continued to increase, until the officers in command of the forces which had captured Vivian Wickey sent large companies of men to patrol every street, alley, to guard ruined houses, and houses, and to watch everything possible. The general in charge ordered out all the remnants of general Winstons command and various associations of business men also applied men who assisted the Angelinian soldiers in doing strict patrol duty in the ruined and bombarded city and its suburbs. The deep depredations of the lawless glandelinian spies and murderers, were of an inconceivably brutal character. Unprotected women and children, whether found upon the streets, or close inside their own ruined homes, or in their cellars were subjected to all kinds of outrage or assault, and not only robbed of their clothing and other valuables but their little girls and boys threatened with destruction or the rebels attempting to kidnap the children and carry them away. Julio Gallio. Even not only pedestrians were held up in broad day light on the public streets and thoroughfares but also soldiers who happened to be off their guard, and compelled to give up all valuables in their possessions. The bodies of dead soldier soldiers, even of dead women and men were completely despoiled of everything, and in their haste to secure the valuables and escape before the Angelinian guards would see them the glandelinian ghouls would even mutilate the corpses in any manner possible, cutting off fingers even to get the things and rings thereon, and also amputating the ears and heads of women to get the earrings, or strings of beads wrapped tightly around their necks. The majority of the glandelinian thieves and vampires belonged to the fierce Zimmermannians, but were reinforced by glandelinian desperadoes from Julio Gallio, Vivian Wickey, and Michaeler Janet who took advantage of the lull in the frightful battle and war storm to rush disguised as Angelinians into Norma Catherine immediately after the great disaster, obtaining free transportation on the railroads and steamers and even Angelinian ships upon a pretense that they were Angelinian officers of the red cross going to Norma Catherine for the purpose of working with the strong bodies of relief parties and the gangs assigned for burial of the many dead soldiers of both sides. Their outrages indeed became so flagrant and the people of the city became so terrified in consequence of their depredations and of the fact that Fortress Thumblinia was bombarding Norma Catherine now that the Angelinian authorities now in charge of Norma Catherine unable to cope with them, most of the officers of the interior having been victims of the battle and bombardment, that an appeal was made to general Viviana to send all his troops into the city and procure the preservation of order. General Goncentinian Aronburg was also implored to lend his main aid in putting down the many lawless glandelinian bands, and they accordingly sent the entire of Vivianas and Vivianamans victorious armies in their commands who had not met death of serious wounds in the blood battle of Norma Catherine. There was on account of the firing from fortress Thumblinia in getting the main troops to Norma Catherine, because the rebels at other portions destroyed many miles of railway, and made such big floods that all ways of transportation on land had been washed away and also that Fort Gertrude Angelina, was bombarding Norma Catherine like a fury of hell. Adjutant general Beppo Barance was compelled to notify general Winstons whose arm was wounded upon slings to notify the main besieging christian commanders to send some christian cavalry by courier, but the general ordered Vivianams army to push on to Norma Catherine at once to garrison the other body of troops there, and with the instructions to promptly shoot all persons and glandelinians found despoiling the dead. At the same time he was preparing his batteries, and immense forces to storm Gertrude Angelina.

Most of the glandelinian vampires were even women and glandelinian girl and boy scouts, some of them even surprising to relate being pretty girls at that not under ten years of age, but as they did it for their cause the latter were as savage in their depredations and merciless in their treatment of the dead as the most abandoned of their grown up companions. The real regulars were put on full duty in full force on the night when the glandelinians at Gertrude Angelina were throwing big shellshells and there in the city, and before morning had shot hundreds of the things even the boys and girls not receiving mercy, and those who were captured grown up or not were executed on the spot when found in the act of robbery. In every instance the pockets of many of the glandelinian harb harpies slain by the Angelinian troops were found filled with bullets and military possessions, mingled with jewelry and other valuables, and in some cases, even even fingers and hands and ears were found in their possessions which had been cut from the dead either of soldiers or dead men and women, the vampires no doubt being in such a hurry, that they could not wait to tear the rings off. Simultaneously at another point of the city among a windrow of still smouldering wreckage a scouring party of Winkie Abyssinkilian troops came across a gang of two thousand one hundred and fifty glandelinian desperadoes sixty of which were rebel girl scouts not more than ten years old, who were searching the ruins and despoiling the bodies of the dead Angelinian and even glandelinian soldiers found smashed in the burned wreckage of the ruined houses. With commendable promptness the regulars moved forward with the purpose of placing the boy and girl and men and women ghouls under arrest arr arrest, but they immediately retreated to the shelter of the ruins and fought so desperately that eighty of the Angelinians were killed and forty three wounded before fifty of the rebels were captured. The rest fought their way through suffering a loss of two hundred dead and wounded and those who were captured having been caught with the goods on them were lined up against a brick wall and without ceremony shot down. In case where the villains were not killed at the first fire, the officers in command of the firing squads administered coup de grace. Many of the glandelinian boy and girl thugs thus captured also begged piteously for mercy but no attention was paid to their feelings and though children they suffered the same stern fate as the rest. When all the other troops arrived in the captured city they took the same severe but harsh and cruel measures and the result was that within twelve hours or even less the city was as safe from such robbers as it had ever been before its capture by the glandelinians. The Angelinians arrested every suspicious character and stranger and the jails and cells not ruined by the bombardments in the city, and the prison camps within the christian lines outside the city were filled to overflowing. These people being mostly girls and boy scouts of the enemy were deported immediately for the main christian camps further away and notified that if they tried to escape from the lines and returned to Norma Catherine, they would be shot without warning.

The temper of the Angelinian and Winkie soldiers was such that they would not temporize in any case with those who were neither any criminals or rebels or inclined to work. Every able bodied man in town was impressed for duty in relief and burial parties and whenever an a man refused to do the work required he was promptly shot down. By another morning all the men required, scores of thousands of them had been obtained, and relief and burial parties were filled to a greater quota deemed necessary, and the work of despoiling of the bodies of that awful sea of dead soldiers of both sides, administering to the wants of the countless wounded soldiers, the people of the city, and the clearing of the streets of the debris was proceeded on satisfactorily. The dead soldiers of both sides lay in the streets and vacant places, and among the ruins of houses, and in the good firm ones in hundreds of thousands, and the heat of the sun, and the heat of fires and warmth of recent conflagrations began to have its neutral effects. Decomposition began to set in, and the stench became unbearable. At first an effort was made to identify the numerous Angelinian soldiers killed in the battle of Norma Catherine but it was soon found that the work could not be proceeded with as any delay imperiled the living. Fears entertained to regard to pestilence were speedily verified, and the people of the city and the soldiers in possession were taken ill by scores. It was even then despite the strict orders very difficult to obtain men to perform the duty of burying the awfully bloated corpses of the victims of the catastrophic battle, and consequently the Angelinian and city authorities ordered that the dead be loaded on barges and all kinds of boats, taken out a few miles to sea or into the river, self weighted and thrown into the water, or even cremated. The ground at many places had become so water soaked from the floods that occurred on account of the explosions that it was impossible to dig even trenches for the reception of the countless bodies, although in many instances the people and soldiers managed to bury their friends and relatives either in the yards or the ground surrounding their residences. Along the river banks countless pyramids of soldiers gray and blue uniforms were buried in the sand or weighted and thrown into deep water, but the majority of the burials were at sea. By another succeeding night 2,500,000 bodies had been cast into the water, while about five hundred thousand or more had been interred within the city limits. Precautions were taken however to mark all the graves, and who the ground had dried sufficiently & the bodies were disinterred, and taken to various recently made cemeteries where after funerals, suitable memorials were erected to mark their last resting places. No attempts however were made at identifications, lists being simply made only of the victims, the graves of those buried in the beach areas or in the army cemeteries being marked with headboards, telling the name, age, and so on of the person, male, female, and children as the case might be. So accustomed did the burial parties seem to become to the handling of so many thousands of dead that they apparently treated the mangled bodies as though they were merely carcasses of animals and not bodies of soldiers and friends and children, and they were dumped into the mile long trenches prepared for their reception without ceremony of any kind. The excavations were then filled up as hurriedly as possible, the ground or sand being packed down tightly. This might indeed have seemed brutal and very unfeeling, and mean, but in truth the exigencies of the dreadful situation, demanded that the legions of corpses be put out of the way as speedily as possible.

The greatest difficulty was experienced in securing men among the soldiers and even non-combatants to transport dead bodies of soldiers, men women and children to the Norma Catherine River wharves where the numerous barges and boats lay, and it was also practically an impossibility to get any one to touch the bodies of many of the child victims, decomposition having set in earlier than in the case of the dead grown ups, and had it not been that members of the soldiers finally volunteered their services the remains of so many dead mangled children would have remained unburied for a long or time than they were. Finally however patience ceased to be a virtue and orders were given all guards and soldiers to shoot any man or soldier comrade even, who refused to do his duty under the cruel circumstances.

The result of this was that at the beginning of the second week and there was less delay in the matter of disposing of so many dead. However in spite of the active activities of the burial parties the work of clearing the streets of the corpses was a most tedious one, for the workers, and the city day and night was constantly under fire from Gertrude Angeline and Maya and Thumbelina, whose shelling was a method of driving the Angelinians out, or a covering, for the enemy's preparations to counter the assault the city as soon as opportunity presented itself. For this time nothing further had been done to accomplish the assault on Thumbelina and Norma Catherine's rear guard fortifications.

SIGNAL STATION REPORTS ON THE STORMING ASSAULTS OF FORTRESS THUMBELINA, AND GERTRUDE ANGELENE.

The forecast official reports of the glandelinian signal stations at Julio Gallio to General Francis Stanek made the following reports, two weeks later of the fierce Angelinian assaults on Fortress Thumbelina, Gertrude Angeline, and Maya;

The local signal station office of the glandelinians at Julio Gallio sent in the first message to General Francis Stanek who now commanded the situation in McAllister's place (the latter having resigned his command) in regard to the advancing christian assault against Fortress Thumbelina, Maya and Gertrude Angeline at 8 P.M. The assaulting columns were reported to be ten miles long and was now moving northward over the stretches of the Sunbeam creek, while the guns of the attacking and besieging ships were hammering the fortifications from the water side with might and main. Each hour thereafter amid the tremendous uproar of the wildest battle ever yet at civilian wharves, until the Angelinian columns struck their charge home bullets were posted by every glandelinian general in Julio Gallio giving reports of the progress of the assaulting columns, and the reports of the vallant defenders and how they fared out, and also giving the progressive movements of the big Angelinian disturbance. An hour afterwards reports came in that the assailants had been repulsed in the attack on fortress Gertrude Angeline with frightful loss, but that the other and main columns had now moved up over the southern region of gunbeam creek, and streamed up toward the Fortress side of the river Norma gun, and thence was changing its course of attack and moving westward upon all parts of the outer works of the fortress, and that the most violent of the attack was central of the

Turner gun section, when the warnings of approaching columns toward Evangelina Crania Heights were ordered up to the signal stations at Aronburg and Federal. At four thirty o'clock the attack of the whole christian line of assault had increased in energy and was covered by a most tremendous cannonade, and that though one portion of the line had been crippled and crumpled up, the rest was still moving forward in terrible array against Thumbelina, and at five o'clock the Julio Gallio batt le and attack warnings were changed to Evangelina Crania also. When was the entire stretch of the Norma Catherine section of the main line of Lucille Jackson fortifications were in danger. The many signal stations in front of the fortress continued to be busy until the flying shot shell and grape of the christian batteries brought all the signal stations down with the killing and wounding of all who were operating them, many of the glandelinian officers could not get the use of the telegraphs and telephones on account of all lines and communication being cut off. Glandelinian officers in Julio Gallio came in big droves followed by men to the main officers headquarters inquiring about the situation at Thumbelina and fortress Maya and Gertrude Angeline. About the same time the following information was given to all alike;

"The christian attackers are now in possession of Fortress Maya, south or southwest of us, the attacking columns moving against Gertrude Angeline anew, are shifting their headlong advance to the north northeast--east, and probably another is moving from the southeast, their attack, and the fire of general Noro's batteries increasing in energy by the deafening noise of the conflict. If you officers and men have any residences in the lower parts of Julio Gallio, move to higher ground to your strong fortifications. It is apparent that at no time whatever Julio Gallio and the fortresses around her frontal sections will be under a hammering fire."

"Prepare for the worse, which is yet to come" were the only consoling words of the signal station men at Julio Gallio from morning until night that day, when no further information could be given out. The local signal station men, and one observer stayed at one of the signal stations close to Fortress Thumbelina throughout the entire storm of battle, although the building was wrecked and many were killed and wounded around about it. Many officers who were at Julio Gallio at the time went out to take observations of the scene of the battle about four P.M. and one of the officers though two miles away got killed by a heavy explosive bursting in the sky like the loudest clap of thunder.

Another observing officer left after he had sent the last telegram which could be gotten off, it being filed at Aronburg Federal over the telegraph wires about 4 P.M. of that fatal afternoon. Over half of the city of Aronburg Federal was then reported to be covered with flood waters caused by levees bursting near the McAllister gun river, which were destroyed by the fire of the besiegers and one of the other daring observers left for his own headquarters also at 4 P.M. after he had done all he possibly could, as wires and all were then going down. The entire city was covered with flood waters from one to even five and six feet deep, and once in a while shells fell and exploded in the flooded streets. On his way to his headquarters he saw thousands of glandelinian soldiers and he informed all he could that the worse was still to come, that the fortresses could not and would not hold out, that Maya already was captured and overwhelming forces were concentrating against the heights of Evangelina Crania and the soldiers and officers who could not hear his voice either on account of the distance or the din of the shelling and roar of cannon he motioned them to go to their fortifications at Julio Gallio and prepare for what may come.

The fiercest assaults as the observers saw were repulsed from fortress Thumbelina at 8:10 P.M. but the assaults were resumed with greater violence a little later even though with the same results. The tide of attack at about eight P.M. managed to push its way through and over all the outer works of fortress Gertrude Angeline simultaneously, and the highest fury of the battle raged when a dreadful attack was made from both the southeast and north east upon Gertrude Angeline supported by the fire of the captured guns of Maya, and the extreme velocity and force of the assault almost carried the fort at that time, though by dint of courage, utmost desperation, and most dogged and determined fighting the glandelinians who defended the fortress managed to finally repulse the christian assailants with dreadful slaughter and four generals killed and twenty wounded.

One of the highest battlements of fortress Thumbelina was blown down by a high explosive shell from a christian siege gun at this time, and the curtain of artillery fire was more wilder and furious later when everything seemed to be going before it, and fierce fires and floods were aging simultaneously when the signal station observers estimated that the Angelinian was assaulting columns extended between ten and twenty miles in length and came on with apparently irresistible violence. The daring observers who witnessed the final repulse of the assault at all points, even to Evangelina Grania believed from the records heard his followers managed to save that a good part of the assaulting wave moved inward over the works of the fortress near the flanks of Gertrude Angeline, going up toward Margaret Forde but was finally repulsed also.

The warning of the glandelinian signal stations were the means of the fortifications at that time being saved from captured except Maya through the hurricane of christian soldiery, and orin stell and explosives.

The attack and the artillery fire of the christian batteries, and from captured Maya however were a dreadfully severe that it was impossible for the surprised glandelinians to prepare for such destruction. The signal stations of the main part to relieve apprehension stated on the following morning that everything within sight was going on again as normal and there were as yet no indications of another storming attack following.

The surviving garrisons of fortress Gertrude Angeline and Thumbelina did not need to awaken from sleep on the following morning, for they had not slept at all the night before. For many wear hours throughout that fearful bloody day they had stood face to face with the contending christian armies arrayed against them, and knew that being face to face with death ruin and disaster that hundreds of thousands of had yielded up their lives, and that in the property of fortress Thumbelina alone millions of dollars damage had been done by the christian shell fire and many of their strongest barracks in the fort and buildings were wrecked and burned. Of all the scores of thousands of barracks inside that immense redan or fortress there was not a building which was not either entirely destroyed or wrecked, many of the cannons were dismounted, the camps were crowded with wounded being already preparing for transportation to Julio Gallio, everything outside the works and fortifications lay looked as if a cyclone had raged, trees were down and splintered, furrows and craters were in the ground, and the soldiers and garrisons of both forts still in their possession lived in the valley of the long shadow of death, seemingly helpless and hopeless, deprived of all hope and ambition--they merely waiting for the appearance of the military death rattle, a roll and the order from their main generals to evacuate the battered fortifications before they were heavily stormed again in such condition, as there was no hopes of holding out much longer.

Confusion and chaos reigned everywhere, death and horrible desolation were on all sides, wreck, fires and ruin and dismounted guns and fragments of exploded guns and gun caissons, and scores of thousands of dead horses were the only things visible wherever the eye might happen to rest, and with no other occupation than the search for and the burial of the dead it was strange that the thoroughfares and even company streets inside the fortifications were not filled with some insane victims of the bombardments frightful visit.

For days the garrisons of the three fortresses knew from the reports of the approach of Conventinian Arab Aronburgs overwhelming armies that there was great dangers ahead, they were warned repeatedly, but they laughed derisively at all fears, military operations went on as usual, and when the blow came it found at least fortress Maya so strong before to resist any tidal wave of men, fully unprepared this time, and without a strong garrison or batteries, and thus was captured, and the others assaulted and cannonaded with dreadful results though they held gallantly to the last.

Owing to the stupefaction following the awful second catastrophe, the glandelinian garrison already menaced by the Angelinians in possession of Maya and the dreaded siege batteries far beyond were in no condition either physical or mental to provide for further resistance, and even depended upon the main lines further beyond at the works near Julio Gallio, for food provisions, and clothing or they would have to withdraw from the fortifications. Indeed it was seen that the garrisons if they were to withstand another attack needed immediate relief but how they were to get it from the main fortifications was a mystery, for fortress Thumbelina and Gertrude Angeline were not in touch with the city. The bombardment of the fortifications strong as they had been were sorely stricken, and the generals in charge appealed to the main commanders at Julian Wickey to send food, provisions, clothing, ammunition and water. The waterworks in possession of the garrison near Maya and Thumbelina were in ruins and all the hastily made military cisterns all blown away, so that the lack of water was one of the most serious of the troubles for the garrisons. Never did assaults or bombardments of a place work more cruelly. All the electric light and telegraph wires and poles within and outside the fortifications were prostrated, and the interior of the forts were littered with the timbers, slate, big blocks of cannon, glass, and every conceivable character of debris caused by the explosions of shells among the army barracks. There was hardly a habitable barrack barracks in the entire fortification, and every home of the glandelinian generals and officers were either wrecked or badly damaged. On the following morning, there were deaths among the garrison among those badly and not mortally wounded, or from hunger and thirst, and also exposure, and the list began to swell rapidly. Still maintaining the fortresses and expecting help the garrisons were living it through as best as they could--in the ruins of their barracks, in torn tents, in other buildings, in captured rail railway stations, in other parts, in the dugouts, and in the company streets of the city of barracks, by the sides of their beloved dead. So great indeed was the desolation one could not imagine a more sorrowful and unconsoling place. No hands were playing, no wagon trains with provisions could reach the fortifications only sad a sullen eyed men walked about the company streets, or lounged about with weapons at their side expecting another assault and artillery storm every moment, the dead and wounded being hastily gathered up monopolizing the attention of those capable of doing anything whatever, and the fortifications were at the mercy of the crowding batteries of fortress Maya.

On account of the attack and bombardment of these three fortresses Julio Gallio suffered badly. In the business section of the city the water from a flood set loose by the Angelinian dynamiting engineers was from ten to three feet deep in stores, and stocks of all kinds, including food stuffs were total losses, and from Beldon Avenue, to Sacramento Avenue tenches to the river beach of normal gun not a vestige of a residence was to be seen. It was a common spectacle--that of the unfortunate christian inhabitants of the blown city, wandering around in a forsaken and forlorn way, indifferent to anything around them, and paying no attention to inquiries of friends and relatives, or the rough words of the wicked glandelinians in possession of the city, and orders to stay within doors. God forbid that such scenes will ever be enacted in the United States.

It was thought from the scene going on that the vengeance of the very fates, had been visited upon Julian Wickey and her outside sections in its most appalling shape upon the place which had unwittingly incurred its wrath. Alas! how it was very fortunate after all, that all the hundreds of thousands come compelled to endure those horrible trials, and privations were temporarily deprived of their very understanding, were so stunned that for a time they could not appreciate the enormity of the disasters.

At the beginning of the attack upon fortress Thumbelina the first loss of life among glandelinian officers was at Barracks No. ten in the strand section of the fortress, where three of the most prominent generals of the whole garrison, lost their lives, and many other officers and generals were maimed and imprisoned. These were at the windows of the barracks directing the men in the city of barracks when the Angelinians were swarming over the works, giving frantic orders here and there, seeming to make light of the great danger, when a big high explosive blew up on the roof where it crashed through, the roof suddenly caving in, and coming down with a crash killing them. Those in the lower part of the building escaped from the falling wreckage with their lives in a miraculous manner, as the falling roof and flooring happened to catch on a sort of bar, enabling the officers and men standing near it to crawl under the debris.

It took several hours after the assault was repulsed for men and diggers and hard work too to get them out. One rebel officer a lieutenant who was sent for relief during the fray, was shot down by an Angelinian sharpshooter as he was crossing a flooded district, his body being found a short time afterwards.

Fully seven hundred officers were congregated in another building close by most of them more or less injured in various ways. On general Terracrine Licaner, reported the loss of one hundred and fifty officers who were killed within the firing line, and he himself was severely wounded about the head by the explosion of a grapeshot. Some of the glandelinian generals who were on an inspection tour of the ruined and shell swept earthworks outside the forts, and who passed along them as far as about a mile climbing over the piles of shattered lumber, machines, and abatis, which had once also been strong earthworks of some sort found four thousand dead bodies which had been observed in half a mile of works, and seven thousand in another section of the same works, while as many as sixty thousand corpses were seen lying singly and in immense groups in the space of one mile. A majority of those killed in the tremendous battle, however were under the wreckage of mined earthworks. The body of general Sarahania sum monis was found near his headquarters his features set in death his hands set ill grasping his pistol tight ly. The remains of his staff officers who also were killed in the disaster were never found. The reports from the ruins of the Glandelinian Main Infirmary and Base hospitals showed that only ten escaped the number of wounded soldiers there, their attendants and others being over six thousand. The headquarters building in possession of general Rosenburger Zimmerman chosen as a place of refuge and defense by the few numbers of glandelinians who had fled from their captured works had collapsed under shell fire, and very few of those who had really taken refuge there and defended themselves and the building ever escaped—how many cannot be told, and will never be known. Never before had the following days risen upon such a sight of the day as soon visited his face behind the dull and leaden smoke clouds of big fires, and hardly ever shined, and surely it was enough to draw tears even from the inanimate things, but it was the horrible fate of rebellion. At a small railroad depot near fortress Thumelina one of the Angelinian officers of the commands who were besieging it picked up the lifeless form of several girls and little boys within a few feet of the terrible fortress. It was believed that either their parents were among the lost, or that they had been escaped child slaves and had ran into the midst of the terrible firing of both sides and were thus riddled with shot and shell fragments. The station building and other points was selected as a point of refuge by hundreds of people who fled from Norma Catherine and although all the windows and south portions of the walls were torn down or blown in, and the occupants expected every moment to be their last during the battle, escape for the Glandelinians at that time in possession was then impossible, for about the big building at the time the water of flood was fully twelve feet deep, and the glandelinians there had to surrender to prevent themselves from being drowned. A couple of small abandoned ammunition shanties were floating about, but there was no means under such shell fire of making rafts or getting boats. And in Norma Catherine itself every available building in that section of Vivian Wickey was used as a hospital for the millions of wounded Angelinians and for wounded non-combatants. As for the countless dead, they were being put away anywhere. In one large building on St. Anna Street all the space that could be cleared was occupied by the hundreds of wounded Angelinian officers, who were falling leading charges against Gertrude Angeline, or who helped in the capture of Norma Catherine. It also was nothing strange to see the dead, and crippled and bandaged soldiers everywhere, and the living indeed were fascinated by the large fields of dead they could hardly be dragged away from the spots, where the corpses were piled where were dead by the score of thousands, by the hundreds of thousands, and by the millions. It was a city of the dead, a vast battlefield within a city, the slain glandelinians alone being the victims, of flood, shell fire and terrible discharges of canister, and also of flames and fallen wreckage. Of course we can know that probably the dead of the Angelinian side may have been or were now now at rest, and the living non-combatants had to suffer, despite the aid being at hand from the soldiers, but how were the souls of the dead dead glandelinians getting along. In many portions of the town of Norma Catherine the amount of the damage could not never be estimated. The many different kinds of houses, near the river front, even wholesale houses, buildings for business, and even schools and churches, effected by the flood let loose upon the enemy had about seventeen feet of water for two days so above above even their ground floors, and all the window panes and glass and roofs of the buildings and protectors of all kinds were demolished not from shells but from concussion of the terrible cannonade of both sides. On Turner Anna Street please the water was just as deep, and all provisions of whole sale abandoned groceries and goods on the lower floors, were saturated and rendered valueless by the enemy themselves who abandoned the city. In clearing away the ruins of an enormous Catholic Orphan Asylum the most heart rending scenes and evidence of the great heroism and love of the very sisters and the attendants were discovered. Bodies of many of the little folks boys and girls were found riddled by shot, crushed and mangled by wreckage, and also which indicated by their position that the most heroic measures were taken to keep them together so that all might be saved. The sisters had during the explosions of shells and grapeshots all around during the bombardment of Norma Catherine by the enemy at fortress Thumelina had tied the children altogether in bunches of eights, nines and even tens and then tied the cords around their own waists. In this way they had probably hoped to quiet the fears of the children during the terrible but unsuccessful artillery storm and lead them to safety. It would probably have been accomplished but a terrific high explosive fell in one of the rooms of the building and exploded with such terrific force as to shatter shatter the upper rooms of the building and from the concussion the whole structure fell, carrying the entire number of inmates with it, and burying them under tons of debris. Two crowds of children about two hundred of them, tied and attached to the sisters had been found covered with rubble so deep that it was evident that they died of want of air. In one heap the children were found piled on the heroic sisters, and the arms of one little five year old girl were clasped tightly around a sister's neck. In the wreck of the Home over two thousand one hundred and ninety children, and sixty six sisters the entire number of the inmates, and twenty hired hands and the engineer were killed. It was first believed they had been massacred by the enemy during the retreat from the city, but the discovery of the groups of sisters and little ones in the terrible ruins indicated that all were killed and buried under the wreckage caused by the enemy's guns.

The following days after the futile assaults upon Thumelina and Gertrude Angeline were days of the greatest sufferings for both sides, and the non-combatants besides; although the Christian population had hardly at sufficiently recovered from the shock of the mightiest of calamities to realize that they would have been hungry and cold if the Angelinians had not shared their own rations with them. On the second day all relief trains sent from captured Calverine, from Pandora, and also from Angelinia Agathia and Porothy Gale toward Vivian Wickey were forced to turn back, the tracks having been washed away by succeeding floods made by the enemy in their futile efforts to drive back the big Angelinian assaults. On the same day general Viviananna who had led the assaults in which Norma Catherine was captured, and also directed the assaults upon the outer works of Thumelina and Gertrude Angeline declared that some slight relief had been at last sent in, the railroad from girl Knool Lines to Norma Catherine junction having been found intact, boats also taking the supplies from that point up the rivers, and the besieging transports also giving aid. Food, uniforms for soldiers, and provisions and food for the women and children of the city were the things most needed just then for all who flocked to the Christian lines for safety. While the men and soldiers had been able to get along with the clothing and uniforms they had on, and what they had secured since the two disasters, the women and children of the bombarded city suffered considerably and there was much delirium and sickness among them in consequence. It was noticeable however that the Angelinian women and even little children of the city had by their own brave example been instrumental in reviving the drooping spirits of the men inhabitants. Since the assaults of Thumelina there was now better feeling prevalent among the non-combatants, as news had been received that within a few more days the acute distress would be over, except in the matter of shelter. Every house standing in Norma Catherine was damp and unhealthy, and most of the very wounded soldiers were not getting along as well as hoped for.

Countless numbers of the injured had been sent out of Norma Catherine to the Christian lines, to Angelinia Agathia by rail, and other places, but hundreds of thousands still remained. It would have endangered their very lives to have moved them. That following night, ninety Glendolinian spies were shot down in their tracks by even citizen guards. One of them was scared and seven hundred dollars found, together with some important plans belonging to an Angelinian general, and two water so soaked important letters. A dangerous looking pistol was clutched in his right hand. In the afternoon of the same day at the suggestion of some of the generals mounted squads of numerous concentinian cavalry soldiers under general Brockfilder was detailed by his superior to search a section of the town where it was reported a number of Glendolinian spies and looters were to be seen.

"Shoot them in the air tracks boys." Said the general. "The plunderers and spies however cleverly changed their locations before the arrival of this big detachment however, and the raiders even back emptied handed. Twenty eight hundred hundred cases of looting were reported between three and six in the evening. At six o'clock a report reached the young general that twenty hundred Glendolinians disguised as Ange Ang albinans were robbing houses at nineteenth and plunders Streets.

"Plant them at once." Commanded the young general, as half a score of hundred soldiers, led by a corporal mustered before him for orders. "I want every one of those Glendolinian foragers dead or alive." He added. "The squad left on the double quick. Half an hour later a courier came in reporting that they had been ambushed by the plunderers and all hot down. The following order was posted on the streets at noon of the second day after the Thumbolnia horror!!

"To the public of Norma Catherine;

The city of Vivian Wickey of Norma Catherine section in possession of Angelinia being under martial law, and all good citizens being now enrolled in some branch of the public service, it becomes necessary to preserve the peace, to hold Norma at all hazards, and to keep out vandals, that all arms in this city abandoned by the enemy be placed in the hands of all able bodied men and that during this time for several weeks, all good citizens are to be allowed to carry arms, and must in case of necessity help the Ange Angelinian forces in case the Angelinian insurgents should take forceful measure to recapture Norma Catherine and her fortresses. All good citizens are hereby commanded to take up all arms, and ammunition of the city abandoned by said foe, and to take general Concentinian Aronburgs receipt."

General Walterson Daniel Jones.

Starting through the ruined town of Norma Catherine as soon as the flood waters caused by both sides combined began to recede that following morning, a large number of relief parties began the work of rescuing the Angelinian wounded soldiers and dying from the ruins of buildings at which they fell while battling the dogged enemy. The scenes here presented were almost beyond any description. Thousands of screaming women, bruised and bleeding, many of them bearing the lifeless forms of children of all ages in their arms, men broken hearted and even sobbing, bewailing the loss of their wives and children, or cursing the enemy and filling the air with imprecations against them, streets filled with floating rubbish, among which there were many bodies of the dead soldiers of the battle, constituted part of the most awful picture of the war. In every direction as far as eye could even reach, the scene of desolation and death continued. It certainly was enough to cause the stoutest heart to quail and grow sick, and yet the searchers and surviving Angelinian soldiers well knew they could not unveil one hundred or one third part of the misery the destructive fire of both sides had purposely or accidentally brought about.

They also knew that the full import and heaviness of the great blow for the capture of Vivian Wickey could not be realized for many days to come. Although all those of the relief parties were indeed prepared to see the natural evidences following upon the heels of the mighty battle of Norma Catherine, they did not expect to see such frightful scenes. It was a lull, without precedent, a gathering of victims that was a ghastly as to be beyond the power of any man or artist to dare picture if he could. As the parties went on the members met many others who made reports of things, that had come under their notices. There were fifty thousand Glendolinian soldiers alone found killed by shot and shell or drowned in one section of the town, one hundred thousand in another, fifty five hundred thousand in another. The loss, a horrible one it was grew larger in another and with each report. It was a matter of wonder, and increasing wonder too, that a single soul of both sides escaped in that horrible deathstruggle inside the city escaped to tell the tale. No one among the very inhabitants of Norma Catherine seemed sane, for their air was madness in the very air. All moved in an atmosphere of great gloom, it was even difficult to move and breathe with such death on all sides, and yet no one or even among the soldiers could keep their eyes of the terrible scene, of the one horrible fascinating corpses of dead of both sides. They riveted the gaze and life and death were often so closely intermingled they could not be told apart. It was the apotheosis of the frightful. The returned Maya Mayor of the city of Norma Catherine sent out the following appeal to the whole Angelinian and Galverinian country:

"It is my opinion based on all kinds of personal and excited information information, that during the successful assaults upon Norma Catherine, and the bloody failure of Thumbolnia and Gertrude Angelina, that on both sides a combined five million soldiers the gray and the purple have lost their lives here in one of the most terrible of battles in the war. Approximately one third of the residence portion of the city of Norma Catherine had been swept away by shot and shell, fire and flood. There are several scores of millions of people even, the remaining inhabitants of the city abandoned and set free by the enemy by force who are homeless and destitute, destitute---how many really there is no way of finding out. Arrangements are now being made to have the women and children sent from the ruined town to the main Christian lines, and to some further off and other places, but the means of transportation outside the main Christian lines are limited. Hundreds of thousands are still to be cared for here. We appeal to you for immediate aid.

Mayor of Norma Catherine."

Those who had escaped the hurricane of shell fire, and bombs, and flood, and conflagrations, and the fierce deathstruggles in the streets and houses, were now searching for missing dear ones in such a listless way as to it irresistibly convey the idea that they did not care whether they found them or not. It was the utmost languor of homelessness and despair. Some or many of those who had lost their very all, property, and even dear ones were even merry, and apparently happy, conversing to friends and companions about it as if the disaster was the funniest joke ever imagined, but it was the gloom of insanity. Two days after the assault upon Thumbolnia and Gertrude Angelina had been so heavily resisted and repulsed, the streets of Norma Catherine were lined with people, half clad, crippled in every conceivable manner, hobbling as best as they could to where they could receive attention of doctors for themselves and summon aid for friends and relatives who could not move. General Francis Conisanna who had recently in many other battles throughout the war been awarded first prize as the most popular and bravest Christian general in concentinian Aronburgs army was in a pitiable condition indeed, the toes of both his feet had been torn off by a grape shot, six of his ribs were caved in, and his head and arms badly brushed and lacerated, but when a question he said was nothing. All my staff, and my horse and wife and children who resided in Norma Catherine are dead. He said. "I have not a thing now on earth for which to live and I'm glad to die."

Chapter 21
What the Journal says.

The houses of all the prominent citizens, which had fortunately escaped total destruction were or had been turned into hospitals, as also were the leading stores, hotels and many other kinds of houses. There were scarcely one of the houses left standing, which did not contain one or more of the many dead, as well as many injured soldiers and non-combatants. The rain soon began to pour down in torrents and the searching parties still continued to work. The misery of the poor people, all mangled and hurt, or homeless, pressing to the main Christian lines for medical attention, was greatly augmented by this sudden rain. Stopping at a small store to avoid the rain a party of Angelinian officers, found it packed with injured soldiers. The provisions in the store had been completely ruined, and there was nothing for the numerous customers who came in hungry and tired. The place was a horrible looking host hospital, no longer a store. Further down the same street, there was a large restaurant, which had been during the flood submerged by the waters and soldiers here were serving out soggy crackers and cheese and other food to the hungry crowds. That was all that was left. The main food was soon soaked full of water, and the people and soldiers who were fortunate to get these sandwiches were hungry and did not make any complaints. It was hard to determine what section of the Norma Catherine line part of the city suffered the greatest damage and where the greatest loss of life among the soldiers and even non-combatants occurred. Information from both the extreme and eastern portions of the city was difficult to obtain at that time. In fact it was nearly impossible, but the reports received indicated that these two sections had suffered the same fate as the rest of the Norma Catherine and to a greater degree. Thus the relief parties wended their way through streets which but a few hours before were teeming with life. Now they were the thoroughfares of dead death and desolation. It did not seem as if they could ever respond to the throbbing quickened vitality again. And it seemed as though it would take many years to even remove all the wreckage. As to rebuilding, it appeared as the works of ages. Annihilation was everywhere.

A week had now elapsed since the frightful attack on the Christian lines. The capture, and also of the futile attacks on the heights of Evangelista Grande, and the three fortresses of the unbelieved, My Maya and Gertrude Angeline. As marked out on the military charts of general Conventinian Aronburgs army headquarters at the centre of the besieging lines, he was evident that all possibilities of capturing these points abruptly by assault was impossible, so he immediately launched the fiercest assaults upon the enemy's outer works in all points in the vicinity of Julio Gallo. The fierce assault definitely caused the capture of the works near the region of San Domingo, and with in another hour the central portions of the attacking Christian line was approximately moving at or against the works toward the enemy's centre. From there it started to change its course a little going almost due northeast, attack attacking the glandelinian works under generals Kingston and Jamaica with dreadful fury, and if it had continued with the evident success on this same line it would have struck the main line of the enemy's works just the same with telling effects, but would have resulted in their capture somewhat earlier than it did. The main attacking columns were headed for the main enemy's earthworks and fortifications all the time, supported by their batteries, but on the last hours of the morning, when pressing over the works almost due on the right wing of general Ceinuegos the main column of the attack finally changed its course so as to go almost due northward, and finally carried a portion of the rebel works under general Florida and up along the rebel line to Tampa. Here the great Christian wave of humanity though meeting dreadful losses in these successful attacks made another sharp turn, to the westward, and headed again almost straight for the enemy's main line. It resulted now in a general battle, and the roar of cannons and musketry was something dreadful. And it was this sharp turn of the Angelinian columns to the westward, which could not be anticipated by the glandelinian signal stations, so the rebel government guards sent out their many signal corps both for the main line of fortification fortifications, and the outer works, well understanding that the prediction as to one of these lines of assaulted works would certainly fail. As soon as the enemy's column turned westward after the capture of the glandelinian works on Tampa the glandelinians knew the fortifications of the land sections of defense were safe for the time being, and the signal corps turned their attention toward the outer works. The glandelinian officers and generals along this portion of the rebel line had abundant warning of the coming of the assaults through the signal corps and the scouts, but could not of course anticipate the destructiveness and irresistible energy of the force of the assaulting columns would gain after the capture of certain portions of the works.

However the conflict raged all day without the Angelinians gaining any further in their successes and the night ended the desperate conflict for a time. On the following morning the main glandelinian generals were informed by the signal corps that the first sign of the resumption of the Christian assaults was noticed at eight thirty O'clock, near the windward fortifications. An hour more passed and the assaulting columns were still in the same location not having accomplished its purpose though it was reported a fearful battle was raging. The biggest part of the Angelinian assaults did not develop any irresistible features during its slow progress in the vicinity of general Garrib Jean Beans lines and across a portion of general Cubas works, but nevertheless was once over or accompanied by tremendous cannonading of the main Christian batteries. During the first section of that morning in fortress Anti-go 10,500 shells fell and exploded. There were some heavy assaults upon general Cubas works at the same time but they were repulsed with great loss. Toward noon the central portions of the Christian line moving forward was seen a short distance from the outer works of Lucillo Jackson, and the heaviest assaults imaginable had commenced upon general Floridas works, the assaulting line, supported by a dreadful curtain of artillery fire extending from the location of Fortress Jupiter, and to forty miles from the northeast, to Gaudandonia. During that sometime the northeast branch of the long extended Lucillo Jackson fortifications opening a terrific cannon fire of its own, caused the conditions in the vicinity of the right wing portion of the assaulting Christian lines to withdraw in confusion, and so far changed that situation as to prevent a successful movement of the Angelinian troops along other portions of the battle line, and the main column therefore continued onward northwest over the works still assaulted. On toward the afternoon the assault had grown in such violence that the central section of the main works were promptly carried, and at this time many new signal stations had been ordered up on the main rebel line, but well on in the afternoon all the outer works had been carried, and the assault storm was nearing the fortifications at the right, and was apparently moving in the strongest force against it from the noise of the conflict then heard at the time which was redoubled.

DENSE CROWDS OF NEGU REFUGEES AT THE CHRISTIAN LINES---FED AND HOUSED IN AN IMMENSE CITY OF TENTS---ANY SOLDIERS DROWNED BY FLOOD--- GOVERNMENT PROPERTY IN NORMA CATHERINE DESTROYED---FEAR FOR THE FUTURE OF VIVIAN WICKY---THIRLING EXPERIENCES OF PEOPLE AND SOLDIERS
DURING THE GREAT STORM OF BATTLE AT FORTRESS LUCILLE RICKSEN---EIGHTY FIVE THOUSAND PERSONS MOSTLY SOLDIERS FINISHED BY BEING BLOWN FROM THEIR WORKS AND A TRAIL OF CARE BY A DREADFUL EXPLOSION---ADVENTURES OF MANY SURVIVORS AT JULIO CALLO---RELIEF SENT FROM ALL PARTS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD AS SOON AS THE TRUE SITUATION OF AFFAIRS WAS MADE KNOWN---HUNDREDS OF MILLIONS OF DOLLARS SUBSCRIBED AND MILLIONS OF CARLOADS OF SUPPLIES FORWARDED TO THE DESOLATED CITY.

THE main besieging christian lines was the great rendezvous for the immense stores of supplies sent to Norma Catherine during the meanwhile, and they poured in there by the thousand of carloads beginning with the day when the fortresses of the outer works of Lucille Rickson were being assaulted. The response to the appeal for aid by the unfortunate people of all of Vivian Wicky on the part of the whole christian army, the whole of Galverinia, and in fact every country of the world, was to be prompt and generous as soon as the other sections could be wrested from the enemy who really was the cause of all this suffering, and that relief was an absolute necessity was made completely apparent, from the appearance of the millions of refugees who began to flock into the christian lines, as soon as battles were resumed again, and as soon as transportation began to be made soon after the catastrophe. In addition to these, thousands of war correspondents and news paper reporters and sight seers arrived also, and the christian authorities were at a loss as to what to do with them, when as they did not care to send them away. Some of these war correspondents, and news paper reporters were from many points far distant; who also had relatives, and friends in the siege and battle swept and stricken districts, and had come to learn the worse regarding them, others there also were who had come to volunteer their services in the relief work, but the greatest number however consisted of curious sight seers, almost frantic in their efforts to get to the war stricken city and foolishly feed their eyes on the sickening, repulsive and dense breeding scenes. In addition there were hundreds of thousands of sufferers themselves, who had been brought out of their miseries to be cared for within the rear of the christian lines. The question of caring for these immense crowds and carrying on the attacks on the enemy at the same time came up at a mass meeting of the generals and their staff and the Norma Catherine general relief Committee held during the siege. Every incoming train that could be allowed to go through the besieging lines, although under strong guard, brought across and hundreds of more people, and immediately an action was necessary. It was decided finally to allow them and as many of the strangers as possible to be cared for in as many tents of the army as could be spared, as the hotels and other buildings in the city being filled with wounded could not accommodate a single one of them.

First attention naturally was given to the survivors of the three big battles as the numbers of wounded and dying was quickly increasing. General Brassensar, sent word to general Conscientin Aronburg, that all persons no matter who they were, rich or poor, ill or well, should be sent for safety into the main rear of the besieging christian lines as soon as possible. They would be well provided for until arrangements could be made to the wreckage being reorganized. The urgency of his message for the depopulation of Norma Catherine, he explained was that because of the enemy of in the fortresses of Thumelina and Gertrude Angeline continued continually shelling the city in the efforts to drive the christians out, for the purpose to arrange an assault to recapture Norma Catherine if possible, and another was that in case all of Vivian Wicky was taken from the foe, the people should remain out until sanitation could be restored, in the wrecked sections of all parts of Vivian Wicky, and so for safety safe everybody except the army should be sent away out of range of the enemy's continual firing. It was estimated that within a week and day that nearly 10,000,000 of the unfortunate survivors of the city population were sent to the rear of Conscientin Aronburg's main armies from Norma Catherine in response to general Brassensar's request. Every tent, barracks, military works and every thing in the rear of the christian lines out of range of enemy fire that was habitable was opened to them, and all the seriously ill comfortably housed and the children cared for. The others including the sight seers and war correspondents were made as comfortable as possible, but for the survivors of the war horror it was not only food and clothing they wanted, the only relief came and many of them sought could not be furnished. They all were grieving for the lost ones left behind in that roaring volcano of flame and din fathers-mothers, sisters, wives and children. Nearly everybody had some relative missing, either among women men or children or fallen soldiers in battle, but few of them were certain whether they were dead or alive. All however were satisfied that they were dead. Men thousands in number, bareheaded, and barefooted, with sunken cheeks and sunken hollow eyes, women and children with tattered clothes, and bruised hands legs, and faces, and mere infants with bare feet bruised or lacerated, and swollen, were among the immense crowds on the company streets in the rear of the besieging lines. Women of wealth and refinement, with hatless heads now deprived of all they once had by the enemy, and gowns of the richest material torn in shreds, were among the refugees. At times it could be seen that a man and his wife, and sometimes with one or two little children, could be seen together, but such sights were not frequent, for nearly all of them who went to the christian lines for shelter from the shell fire of Thumelina and Gertrude Angeline had suffered the loss of one or more of their loved ones.

But with all this horrible suffering there was a very marvelous amount of heroism shown. Three weeks before the very siege began most of these people had had happy homes and their families were around them. Ever since the time the enemy had secured possession of the immense city most of them had been made prisoners but now since the disaster already described they were now all homeless, penniless, and with nothing to look forward to but horror and death. Yet though all could look toward Norma Catherine and see the thousands of shells bursting over her every hour, there was scarcely any whispering or any complaints. They walked among and about the company streets of the army camps as if in a trance, they accepted all the assistance offered them with heartfelt thanks, and apparently were greatly relieved at being away from the scenes of battle, sorrow and war at home. They were all made to feel at home in the christian lines, that they were welcome, and that everything in the power of the army troops would be done for their comfort and welfare, and yet they seemed not to understand half that was said to them.

General John Moodyton one of the generals in charge of the garrisons now in Norma Catherine and who had sent men to take charge of the various relief parties, reported to Conscientin Aronburg on the morning after the two days battle for the outer works of Lucille Rickson as follows:

"To His Excellency general Conscientin Aronburg--Sir!
On arriving at Lemarque encampments this morning I was informed that at the largest number of bodies of fallen soldiers was along the whole battle line. Fifty six thousand were buried yesterday, and to day within less than two miles, under fire mind you, extending opposite this place and toward Virginia junction. It is yet sixteen miles to that junction and the bodies of dead soldiers are thicker where we are now than where they had been buried. An officer inspecting in the opposite direction reported a sea of dead bodies thick for twenty miles. In our efforts to capture Vivian Wicky by main force we are suffering most dreadful losses. The residents of Norma Catherine have lost all, not a habitable building left, and they have been too busy disposing of their own dead friends and relatives to look after personal affairs. Those who have anything left are giving it to others less fortunate than themselves, and yet there is more suffering than any one can bear. I have given away nearly all of the provisions I had brought in wagon trains for the army supplies to hungry children and other refugees. A number of helpless women and bagged children were landed here from Norma Catherine this afternoon while the city was under fire from two strange fortresses previously reported to have been assaulted, and they have no place to go, and not a bite to eat. Tomorrow or at any hour thousands of others are expected from the same place. Every ten feet along the wrecked river front of the city of Norma Catherine tells of acts of glandelinian vandalism, not even a trunk, valise, or tool chest or anything, but what has been rifled. We even buried children this afternoon whose fingers bore the marks of recently removed rings."

Indeed the Angolinian generals of Mansions army alone now under general Hanson glandorin furnished several millions of tents for the internment camp of the regu refugees, which were under the supervision of the Angolinian marine and army hospital authorities.

General Kio-Cant ler girlknown who was sent to the front by the National war Department to investigate the conditions prevailing in Norma Catherine made the following official report that the city was still under fire and that if the fortresses were not carried the city would soon be leveled and probably assaults of the enemy made which would cause the recapture of Norma Catherine. General Concontinian Aronburg therefore ordered a large portion of the garrison in charge of the city to restore the fortifications, while the main batteries of the seige guns were to cover it. He also sent immense armies under many various generals to support the assault. He ordered the generalists to carry the fortresses of Thumbolonia and Gertrude Angeline at all costs. The costs were handsomely paid and general Vivianmanns declared to Concontinian Aronburg in his report:]]

"To his your Excellency general Concontinian Aronburg: Dear sir. The assaults were made on the fortresses as you ordered and a desperate battle raged along a point for twenty seven miles with dreadful fury but the assaults were unavailing. I arrived in the vicinity with my troops having been driven a road to the river by enemy attacks. It is impossible to adequately describe the conditions existing. The attacks you ordered were begun about 9 A.M. this morning, and continued with constantly increasing violence until after midnight.

As Gertrude Angeline had been hammering the city the most the main attack had been on her but the fire of her guns was dreadful and the whole region in her vicinity was inundated with dead dying and wounded Angolinian soldiers and wreckage of shell torn trees. I could describe a that the battle raged with the fury of a thunderstorm of terrific violence and cyclone combined. With few exceptions every assault was desecrated and hundreds of brigades had been crippled. All the rebel fortifications except the glandelinian rapid fire battery under general San Jacinto were massed upon the assaulting christian troops under my command and the counter fire of my batteries could not destroy that of the enemy. However on account of our fire the losses of the enemy was also dreadful. General Jacintos headquarters building and ever barracks of his camps except his Base Army hospital has been swept away by fire caused by our explosive shells. Battery C of first Artillery of our own division, lost two hundred and twenty eight men. The officers and others however and the artillery being withdrawn from the attack were saved. Three hundred members of our hospital corps were also lost. Names of fallen generals and other officers and all the privates will soon be sent in. Loss of lives and of fallen and wounded is possibly more than one million. All bridges crossing the stream to Thumbolonia and Gertrude Angeline has been destroyed by the enemy, waterworks also destroyed, and all telegraph lines were cut down. Their fortifications seem to be in terrible condition but still the fortifications cannot be carried whatever. General Robertson Camp was in the lead of the assaulting columns and made every effort to get telegram through to me to tell me he was being repulsed and pressed back with great loss. Every article of equipment of our batteries was lost. Not even a record of any kind is left so severe was the enemys artillery responding to the fire of our own. The men fought at their guns so furiously that their clothing or uniforms are in rags, and nearly all are without shoes or clothing, other than their shirts and slip shirts and trousers. There are probably five million wounded, who even that be clothed. General Frank Perry who lost half of his division will make his way back to the main lines and send this telegram. Clothing necessary has been asked for and arrangements made for the shelter of the troops under heavy fire day and night without ceasing. Have ordered twenty million rat ions and tents for my own divisions who are moving back into the city of Norma. Have wired Commissioner general to ship thirty million rations by trains and transport ships.

General Vivianmanns."

On account of the constant and severe bombardments of fortress Gertrude Angeline and Thumbolonia to cover the assaults many batteries and besieging fortifications suffered considerable damage. The jetiss near the river batteries were sunk to mean low tide level, but not seriously breached though a number of large guns were blown up. The channels were as good as before, perhaps better. Fortress St John, fifteen pounder placements and concrete and big seige guns were also all right, standing firm as ever. The battery for eight hundred Centimeter and mortar guns and carriages on hand were also unmounted and in good shape, though the outworks were blown up by shell and grape. At Fortress Olla Henry the battery of for eighteen hundred twelve inch mortars and big centimeter guns were badly wrecked, and magazines were fallen in or blown up. The smaller mortars and other guns however were safe, and some of the sand parapets of sand bags were still left though the battery for twenty nine big Kruppt guns were badly wrecked with considerable loss of life. Even the gun platforms were down and the guns disabled, silenced and leaning perilously. However the battery for two hundred 4.7 inch rapid fire guns were apparently all right. However the battery for six hundred fifteen pounder guns mounted on concrete walls though still standing on their pillars were slightly damaged and some of the guns silenced and had to be repaired.

At fortress Childs all guns were all right, concrete was instant, though a eastern gun was dismounted by explosion of shrapnell, but all the western guns were all right. The shore line of the river batteries had been withdrawn back about one thousand feet on the line of the rear of the main batteries to be sufficiently depressed to reach Fortress Thumbolonia. Under the Engineer corps are another line of fortifications of seige built at a considerable expense, also the other improvements of Norma improvements upon which more than eighty million dollars had been expended.

It was feared that the section of Norma Catherine was destroyed beyond its ability to recover, and this gloomy prophecy for the future future of Vivianmanns were well reflected in an official report to general Concontinian Aronburg by many of his officers who were at Norma Catherine investigating the horrible situation. Their statements claimed that seventy five per cent of the city of Norma Catherine was completely demolished and gave little hope for rebuilding as long as the war would continue. One of the generals whose name was Bromme Agle who acted as aid to Adjutant general Hanson Gourrie, Angelinia national guard, during the inquiry, said in his report:]]

"The horrible situation of the city and of the results of the seige and the many fearful battles during so long tedious descriptions. I am convinced that all portions of Vivianmanns is practically wrecked for all time to come and also that the enemy cannot under any conditions be dislodged even by main force of vigorous bombardments. Fully over seventy five per cent of Norma Catherine is irreparably wrecked, and the same percent of damage is to be found in the residence districts. Along the water fronts and river and sea wharf fronts, great warships and war transports wrecked during bombardments on sea, have either bol bodily bumped themselves on the biggest piers in their retreat from the enemys fire from the sea front of the forts, and lie there, great masses of broken iron and wood, that even fire cannot totally destroy. The great warehouses along the water front hastily abandoned by the enemy, the munition plants and other buildings are smashed in one side by the christian hell fire, wrecked and gutted throughout their whole length, their contents either piled in half burned heaps on the wreckage strewn river wharf wharfs or along the streets. Small tugs, and sailboats driven ashore by waves produced by battles concussion have jammed themselves half into the wrecked buildings, were they were inundated by the incoming shock producing waves, and left by the receding waters. Houses are even packed, and jammed in great confounding masses in all of the streets by our own hell fire during the bombardments.

Great and most enormous piles of human bodies mostly fallen soldiers, thousands of dead animals horses in particular, rotting vegetable vegetation, enormous amounts of household furniture, and fragments of the houses themselves, were also piled in big confused heaps right in the main streets of the city. Along the water fronts of the Wickey Bay, and the river fronts human bodies were also seen floating around like cord wood, no doubt being the dead sailors, soldiers and marines killed on sunken battleships during the engagement on the water. Intermingled with them were to be found the carcasses of horses, chickens, dogs, and rotting vegetable matter as in the city. And above all rose the most foulstench at stenches that ever emanated from any worse kind of cesspool absolutely absolutely degrading in its intensity, and lost most dangerous to health in its effects.

Along the main strands adjacent to the main Mic-Hollister Gun River front, where were located all the big ammunition houses erected by the enemy, the whole houses, and stores the situation was even worse, but done by the enemy who were forced to abandon the same. Great stores of fresh vegetation had been scorched, or despoiled, and the enemy in their vicinity had burst a levee of the river enabled a good portion of the water to be flooded and so the invading waters had gone into these stores and turned the valuable fruits and all kinds of vegetation into garbage piles of the most befouling odors. The flood waters caused by the wrecking of the levees, aided by the shell fire of the enemy from Thumbolonia and Gertrude Angeline played at will with everything, smashing in doors of stores, blowing in windows and tearing off roofs, tearing away walls, depositing bodies of human beings and soldiers where they happen to happen to please, and then the enemy abandoned everything they could not take with them leaving the flaming and defouling wreckage to tell its own tale how the work had been done for the Angelinians. As a result the ammunition dumps, the great factories, and the warehouses, were even perfect tombs for here the enemy resisted the Angelinians most gallantly and the buildings were tombs, wherein were to be found the dead bodies of soldier soldiers and carcasses of animals such as dogs and horses, almost defying the efforts of relief parties. In the immense piles of debris along the main streets, in the water of the river itself, and scattered throughout the resident portions of Norma Catherine gathering were to be found masses of wreckage, and in these most great piles were to be found more human bodies, and household furniture of every description. Most of the bodies were dead soldiers of both sides please.

Even many handsome pictures were seen lying alongside of ice cream freezers, and resting beside the nude figure of some dead soldier of non-combatant. These great masses of debris and dead soldiers of both sides were not confined to any one particular section of Norma Catherine. The shell fire of both sides, and the flood waters of the river released by the damaged levees spared no one who was exposed. The shells destroyed the biggest houses, the explosions seemed to whirl the houses like a wind windstorm does when it is in its grasp, the shells in explosion exploding piling their shattered frames high in the most confusing conglomerate masses, and dumping even most of their contents on top, get a frog hop. Many of the soldiers who had been killed were thrown around like at many splinters of wood by the explosions, and left to rot in the withering sun. It was therefore believed that with the best exertions, of thousands, may scores of thousands of men it would require three years or more to secure some semblance of physical order in the very city, and it was doubtful even then if all the debris would be disposed of please.

None of the Angelinian soldiers ever saw such wreck of a city in their lives.

From the Wickey Bay front to the river fronts, to the centre of the city of Norma Catherine, from the main Ocean back the storm or wave of shell, and bloody battle left terrible scenes of death and destruction in its wake.

There was hardly a family on the city whose household old was not short a member or more, and in many or some instances entire families had been killed or wounded. Hundreds of a scores who escaped from the waves of battle, and shelling, probably did so only to become victims of a worse death please by being crushed by falling buildings, even in the main and business sections of the city the foundations of the greatest buildings had given a way from the shock and concussion, carrying towering structures to their total ruin. These massive ruins falling across the streets, formed heavy barricades on or behind which gathered the glandelinian forces who defended the streets of the city against the christian assailants when driven from their fortresses and works and which now were or had been covered with countless glandelinian and Angelinian dead. It was seen by those who had gat hored up the dead that many of the bodies had been stripped of their clothing by the force of shell fire and the water of the flood, and there was nothing to protect them from the scorching sun, the hundreds of millions of flies, and the rapid invasion of decomposition that set in. Many thousands of the bodies had decayed so rapidly that they could not be handled for burial, and some of the most conservative men of the Angelinian authorities who conducted the siege, planned the loss of Angelinians alone in the conflicts of Norma, The outer works and of the attacks on the Thumbolonia fortifications at not less than seven million five hundred thousand dead, and possibly 10,000,000, while others said it would not exceed five millions.

General Whilliam Wickey, one of the main general staff of Stancke main army at Wickey, glandelinia being asked his opinion of the idea of many generals of withdrawing from Wickey Wickey replied as follows: "I should not and would not under any conditions ask the or advise the abandonment of the city of Wickey. It is true that the christian armies during their siege have moved against us in overwhelming numbers and struck so violently that we have lost the possession of Norma Catherine, but it is not likely that another such desperate movement against us will be resorted to as the christian besiegers have suffered immeasurable losses in dead and wounded and one of their main siege batteries are dismantled. Within the last half a year no attack from the christians of the severity had ever struck against any portion of our big earthworks, and fortifications. Yet I have heard from our couriers and officers that there are many points on both the Nonestic Sea coast, the Norma river coast and Wickey Bay coast, some of them occupied by enormous fortifications like Thun Thumbolonia, Maya, Gertrude Angeline and the Lucilla, taken fortifications that are and can equally be exposed to the force of dreadful assaults by both land river and sea, should Concentinian, romburg decide to drive a human hurricane of troops, and a storm of hail from the region of Evangelina, randa, or his fleets, from the Nonestic Ocean Bay or obtain the proper position relative to them. Therefore in spite of this it would not be advisable to abandon any set section of Wickey Wickey merely because Norma Catherine in the possession of the nationals again, or that there is a remote probability that at some future time, another dreadful artillery storm and assault by both land and water may be the cause of the capture of one or two more fortifications, or the cause of great loss of life and property. We however have passed through a battle in three successive sections and advantages that for fury and violence had no parallel within the last six or seven months, or during the whole siege entirely. Records of terrific bomb shelling, torrential rains of grape and high explosives, and other dreadful phenomena of battle that had raged for two weeks are not of infrequent occurrences. There does not appear to be so far as we know from the outlook now any scenes or outlooks governing the occurrences of such an onslaught. And it would seem that, rather than abandon the city of Wickey Wickey, means should be adopted at the scenes and portresses outside of Norma Catherine, and other similarly exposed works on the Mic-Hollister river coasts to make all efforts available for the recovery of Norma and that we should strengthen the fortress of Thumbolonia by the erection of concrete walls and battlements on only heavy stone foundations, that should have the most solid interiors of masonry to a depth or width of ten feet or more to withstand the heaviest of bombardments, rigid army regulations should allow no other kind of structure erected for the defence of Thumbolonia which fortress suffered the most from the bombardment of Wickey Wickey."

batteries in the future in any fortresses located within range of the Federal batteries, and that is also exposed to the direct sweep of the sea of assaulting besiegers. But the Army near Gorma Catherine who had been driven out under general Purragatorian, Gormellian should take heart, instead of falling down discouraged discouraged as they did over their sad defeat as the chances are that not once again in a thousand years would the army be so terribly stricken with losses, and higher and more solid foundations for Thumbeledina would doubtless make her more impregnable to damage and loss of provisions, guns and life by all future future storming assaults and artillery attacks....

GENERAL WILLIAM DUFFY MOORE CHIEF GENERAL OF GORMELINIAN ARMY AT ANDREAN

Chapter 23
The War of Gorma

INDEED Pestilence could only be avoided before the works of Thumbeledina by cremation of the enormous dead numbers of dead bodies, lying there after the fierce conflicts and so that was the stern order of the day. Scores of the carcasses of human corpses, thousands of dead horses, and all debris were therefore to be submitted to the flames. So a few days after the big battle upwards of four hundred thousand bodies, mostly women and children included with dead soldiers, were completely cremated, and yet the work went rapidly on. They were gathered in in big heaps of hundreds of bodies, placed on big piles of wreckage and lumber saturated with gasoline oil and the torch then applied.....

Three days after the three battles inside and outside of Gorma Catherine ending at the great Gormellian fortifications train load after train load of provisions, ammunition, clothing, disinfectants and medicines were lined up near the center of the Christian lines, six miles from Gorma Catherine. In the rear of the Christian lines were hundreds of thousands of the refugees friends of the dead and living together, waiting for news of living ones or missing ones and an opportunity to help, but only a meager amount of relief had at that time reached the stricken sections of Gormellian. Two of the lines of damaged telegraph wires had been put up already and partial communication restored to let outside world know that conditions were far more terrible or horrible than was at first supposed. What was about all. It was not that which was needed, it was a more practicable connection with the mainland of Gormellian. True all the transport boats belonging to the besieging fleets had been pressed into badly needed service to carry succor to the suffering, and the suffering to succor, but their numbers were few and small on account of the numbers of ships also used to convey the soldiers, and although working diligently day and night the service was inadequate in the extreme. And the people were still suffering--the thousands of sick dying for want of medical attention and care, the well growing desperate, and in many cases gradually losing their reason.

While there were many who could not be provided for because the necessary articles for them could not be carried in account of the enemy's heavy artillery and long range guns shelling all approaches to Gormellian. There were only hundreds who were benefited. These little supplies which had been of great assistance, but they were far from ample to provide for even a small percentage of the many sufferers, estimated at about thirty millions. Even the rich among the Gormellians were hungry and with out clothing. Efforts were being made on the parts of the authorities even to provide for all those in the greatest need, but this was found by the military officers to be difficult work, so many were there in the Christian lines in such sad conditions. A most rigid system of issuing supplies was also established, and many of the soldiers, and even a large number of citizens were sworn to as military police. The attention to the issuing of rations as soon as the boats or transports arrived. Every effort indeed was put forth to reach the many thousands of dying first, but all sorts of difficulties and obstacles were encountered, because so many of the Gormellian soldiers were so badly wounded and maimed or torn by shell fire, that they were unable to apply to the thousands of relief committees, and the latter were so burdened by the great number of direct applications that they were unable to send out messengers.

The situation grew worse every minute, everything was needed for wounded soldiers, for the refugees, man and beast, woman and child--disinfectants, prepared foods, hay, and grain, and especially water and ice. Scores of or more of soldiers who were wounded in battle, died that day as a result of inattention, and many more were on the verge of dissolution, for at least it was to be many days, before a train could be run into the Christian lines and the only hope was the arrival of more armed transports to transport the goods and provisions and more ammunition. The many relief committees held meetings to decide or decided that as many armed soldiers as possible were needed to assist in burying the many dead and clear as much of the wreck wreckage as possible, so the Gormellians could make good the occupation of Gorma Catherine, and full arrangements were made to fill this very demand. There were plenty of volunteers for this work, but they were continually under fire from Gormellian. The proposition of trying to have the work carried on under fire, was rejected by the committees, and yet it was decided by Gormellian officers to go ahead impressing men into service, issuing orders for rations only to those who worked or were able to work, and that Christian batteries should shell the enemy's lines to cover the work, and prevent the batteries of Thumbeledina and Gertrude Angeline from firing on the workers.

Word was also received that thousands of refugees who were escaping from Julio Gallo would be carried from the city through Gorma and to the Christian lines without hindrance, and so an effort was indeed made to induce all who were able to leave to go because the danger of massacres from the enemy, and of pestilence was frightfully apparent. There was however from fear and want, many a number willing to depart if possible, and so each outgoing boat, or barge, after having unloaded its provisions of food and ammunition was filled with Gormellian refugees from Julio Gallo. The safety of the living refugees was indeed a paramount consideration, and the actions of the railroads that could get to the Christian lines, in offering to carry all refugees free of charge greatly relieved the situation. The scores of thousands of workers under fire constantly had their hands full in any event, and the thousands of Red Cross nurses and doctors also, for forced men to work, although unavoidable often resulted in the death of many.

It was estimated that $222,500,000 would be needed for the relief work of that portion. The banks which had been recovered in Gorma Catherine were subscribing $400,000,000 but personal losses of all the citizens of Gorma Catherine on account of the retreating enemy taking everything possible with them had been so total and large that no one not even the richest of rich were able to subscribe anything whatever. The total confiscation of all foodstuffs held by thousands of wholesale grocers and others was decided early at the time of the full occupation of Gorma Catherine by the Gormellians, and by the relief committees. Starvation would surely ensue unless the supply, which survived the disaster was dealt out with the greatest of care. All kerosene oil and other oils were gone, and the many gas works, and electric light companies were destroyed by the enemy. Committees asked for ships loaded with kerosene and other oils, shiploads of drinking water, and hundreds of tons of disinfected tents, such every kind especially formaldehyde, for immediate use, and money, and food next. Not even a tallow candle could be bought or secured for gold, or light of any kind procured as the enemy had seen to that on their abandonment of Gorma Catherine. No baker was in the city to make any bread, and milk, and fruits of all kinds were remembered as past luxuries only. What was there to do with everything was gone as usual, in the way of even, and all kinds of utensils.

It was absolutely necessary to let the Gormellian country and even the outside world know the true state of things left by the enemy. The whole of the Christian section of Gormellian was unable to help itself, and in fact three quarters of the once mighty mighty Christian Gormellian, and parts of northern Abyssinia and Angeline also was prostrate by the disastrous war. Even all of Abyssinia and all her territories at large were paralyzed at the sense of the magnitude of the war worse disaster, and worse for the time being powerless to do anything whatever. The entire Christian world itself was thrilled with the greatest of alarm it being completely felt that the worse about the situation of Gormellian had not yet been made known.

since the capture of Norma Catherine itself, thirty five million refugees had to be clothed and fed for many days, and many thousands supplied with household goods as well, and tens of millions of wounded Angolinian soldiers to be cared for. Such money and even supplies was also required to make the ruined residences of Norma Catherine even fit to live in when the enemy would be driven away from Thumbeinia. During the first few days after the disaster it was almost beyond possibility to make any estimated amount of provisions and money, and supplies necessary to even temporarily relieve the suffering of the refugees and wounded soldiers. As a means of enlightenment major general Good Child was asked by Concentinian Cronburg to have some of the war news paper reporters within the lines to write and send out a statement to the Angolinia Agathia Associated Press, for dissemination throughout the whole world, and one of them accordingly dispatched even at the very risk of his life the following to general Charles Sanders general manager of the Associated Press in Angolinia Agathia: []

VIVIAN WINCKEL- CALVERINIA- Se August 12th 1914

General Charles Sanders

General manager of the Angolinia Agathia Associated Press

A tremendous summary of the horrible conditions prevailing in Norma Catherine and among the millions of refugees is more than human thought can master. Briefly stated the damage to Angolinian property by the enemy and shell fire is any where between six hundred million one hundred and fifteen thousand dollars, and to enemy property only $20,000,000. The loss of life among refugees is about 10,000 but among wounded soldiers who fought the battles to capture Norma Catherine the loss of life really cannot be computed. No lists even could be kept and all is simply guesswork. Those of the many dead thrown out into the Nomesio Ocean, into the rivers, and buried on the ground, wherever found will reach the horrible total of at least three million souls gone into eternity. My estimate of the loss of life among the Angolinian soldiers who captured Norma Catherine, and the works immediately surrounding the city is between four million and five million deaths. I am sure I do not make this terrible statement in any case of fright or excitement. The whole story will I hope soon be told of the seiges most frightful battles and disasters, but as yet will I believe never be told, because it cannot and will not all be allowed to be told. The necessities of the living refugees and of the millions of Angolinian wounded are total. The property also in Julio Gallo and Anderson is still all a wreck from bombardments and fires during earlier parts of the seige for not a single individual either loyal to Angolinias cause or in favor of the rebellion, escaped property loss and loss of homes and dear ones. War is cruel to both sides. One half of the total property of Norma Catherine once swept out by a great fire in the first year of the seige, is now argumented but another half totally swept out of existence by shell fire, conflagration and big floods. With the needs of the refugees and the wounded soldiers can be computed by the very christian world at large by the statement herewith, submitted much better than I could possibly summarize them. Even Concentinian Cronburg is on account of his enormous losses not in any condition just yet to press his assaults. His total losses as he told me in the big battles, from Mansions left wing, to the capture of Norma Catherine and the assaults on Thumbeinia, and Grangelina Graniasand elsewhere is probably nearly forty eight million in killed and wounded. The help for so many wounded and the tens of millions of refugees steadily coming into his lines must be immediate. Concentinian Cronburg requests more armies from Dorothy Gale, Ozma and Angolinia Agathia to help him in his purpose.

H.J. Darger, Manager of war correspondent news. General of Angolinian National Guard. Geminian member.

On August 14th 1914 Norma Catherine being in possession of the Angolinian armies though still under constant fire from Thumbeinia and Gertrude Angeline began to as it seemed to slowly emerge from the Vallet Valley of the shadow of death, into which she had been plunged for nearly three weeks, and on that day for the first time actual progress was made toward clearing the city as the main batteries of the christian general Beppo Evans kept up a hammering fire of shells and explosives upon fortress Thumbeinia and Gertrude Angeline compelling them to constantly reply and thus preventing Norma Catherine from being fired on so constantly. The bodies of those killed and drowned in the battle storm and flood, for the most part had already been disposed of. A large number of dead Angolinian soldiers were still found when the debris was being removed as far as possible, but on that date there were no corpses to be seen save those occasionally cast up by the Nomesio Ocean of the rivers or fromiskey Bay. As far as sight at least was concerned, the city despite the enemy's shell fire was cleared of the dead who fell in battle. They had been burned, thrown into the sea and rivers, buried anything to get them quickly out of sight. The main chief danger of pestilence was almost entirely to the large number of unhuried horses, lying upon the extensive battlefields outside the city, whose decomposing carcasses, polluted the air dreadfully and to an almost unbearable extent. This however fortunately was not in the riding city or christian lines proper but was a condition prevailing on the outskirts of Norma Catherine on the five tremendous battlefields. One great trouble heretofore has been the inability to organize gangs of laborers for the purpose of clearing the streets and many soldiers had to do the work themselves while under fire.

The situation in the stricken section of Vivian iskeey called Julio Gallo on August the 12th from being in possession of the ruthless enemy was horrible indeed. The glandelinians though heavily supplied from secret resources were dying for want of food, and scores of hundreds went insane, many scores of thousands went insane from the terrible strain and cruelty from thence they to which they were being subjected.

In his own appeal to the authorities of Strong Angolinia Agathia for more aid in provisions men, and armies, Mayor Daniel upon and fully 10,000 Angolinian soldiers had lost their lives within the three weeks during the four tremendous battles, he declaring that this terrible and uncounted extinction being based upon personal information. General Charles Glarskonka, a vernal owner of Norma Catherine, and a reliable Angolinian general and commander of fleets and army transports said that the horrible death list would be even greater than that, and he was also backed in his opinion by many other generals and a conservative man who had no desire whatever to exaggerate the losses but felt that they were perfectly justified in letting the whole of Abbeisamnia and her many states, and the whole world in general know the full extent of the disaster in order that the necessary relief might be immediately supplied. It was the general opinion that to hide away any of the facts would be criminal and like siding with the insurrexion of the wicked Angolinian and southern Abbeisamnian states. General Glarskonka was never what any one may call a sensationalist but he well knew that the truth was what the people of all of loyal Abbeisamnia states and the christian world wanted at that time.

If the people of the loyal Abbeisamnia states at large felt that they were being deceived in anything they would be apt to close their pocketbooks, and refuse to give anything. If told the exact truth about the horrors of the disaster, they would respond to the appeal for all generosity. And when relief finally began to pour in it was remarkable indeed how soon the woman refugees of the city now within the rear of the christian lines plucked up courage and went to work with the bravest of men. They of course had suffered a most frightful but they refused to give up hope. Many called upon the christian generals in chief and offered their services as Red Cross Nurse nurses. Others prepared rolls of bandages for the wounded Angolinian soldiers and added the army surgeons in procuring medicine for the sick. Mayheven went among the men who were engaged in burying and otherwise disposing of the dead, and cheered them with bright faces and soothing words. They were everywhere, and indeed their presence was as rays of a sunshine, after the big black clouds of the battle storm. A regular fleet of steamers and barges had been plying in the meanwhile between Norma Catherine and Julio Gallo only six miles distant and which had railway communication with all parts of Angolinia, but they had been suddenly attacked and captured by rebel gunboats, and a railroad line to Julio Gallo from Norma Catherine had been repaired which had been repaired, and from which trains had been sent as close together as possible had been destroyed or seized by enemy raiders but this did not prevent the Angolinians from frustrating the enemy's attempt attempts to prevent many thousands in Julio Gallo from leaving and dying of starvation and lack of medical attendance. A leading Angelinian official who was in possession of one of the still remaining buildings in Vivian Wickey or the Norma gathering part, gave a following version of a great Reign of terror started within the very Christian lines, as the sudden dreadful regime of the most daring glandelinian spies, thugs, and rebel ghouls was called, . . .

Ever since the very capture of the enemy lines and the city of Norma Catherine on the Christian lines have suffered in every conceivable way since the time by spies. A fierce hurricane of glandelinian attacks came first upon a portion of general Conventinian Aronburg's center, raging one of the most titanic battles ever seen, and which gradually extended toward the other lines near Norma Catherine, and after the regulars came another big flood made by the enemy a then disaster and then the work of many spies, scores of thousands of reckless "Jungle" glandelinian spies and vandals flooded to the Christian lines in the blavest disguise, by the means of the first glandelinian boats that could be landed near there, and were unchecked in their daring work of robbing generals and other officers of all important papers, plans and maps, and even money and weapons, and a killing them also. On August the fourteenth however however general Patterson commanding one of the Angelinian batteries, and also the regular artillerists in the main besieging lines of barracks sent seventy of the Angelinian combat to go guard duty near all the officers' headquarters and tents, and were ordered to promptly shoot all those found trying to enter or found looting, and they carried out their instructions to the last. In one day on over one thousand spies or glandelinian ghouls were shot, and no mercy was shown the daring glandelinian vandals who came within the Christian lines to rob or murder the wounded soldiers. And those who did not kill were killed at the first volley of the troops, the Angelinians therefore saw that the camp, degrading was admitted. Most of the glandelinian spies were "Junglesmen", and when executed when executed were found loaded with spies, important papers, weapons, maps, plans, jewelry and other articles. Not only had these fiends robbed the lowest of the Angelinian officers but they mutilated those they killed when resisted, in many instances disemboweling them in order to show their merciless ferocity to those who dared to oppose their purpose. All of the officers had to furnish guards to assist in patrolling the very camp streets, and fully one million men were now on duty. That same evening the regulars shot one hundred and forty nine more of the glandelinian ghouls after they had been tried by court-martial, having found them in possession of large quantities of plunder. Indeed the vandals did beg for mercy but none was shown them whatever, and they were speedily put out of the way. The glandelinian spies and vandals as a way obtained transportation to Vivian Wickey or to the Christian lines by representing themselves as having been engaged to do relief work, to aid in burying the dead and so on. Shortly after the first bunch of spies was executed another party of thirty hundred were shot. The outlaws were afterwards put out of the way by twenties and thirties, it being the habit of the rebels to travel in gangs and never alone. In every instance the pockets of these fatal and dangerous glandelinian spies were found with military plunder belonging to Angelinian officers. Even still up to now more than two hundred thousand more bodies had been thrown into the river this being still decided upon by the authorities as the only way of preventing a visitation of pestilence, which they felt should not be added, to the horrors the siege beleaguered city and besieging lines had already experienced. The following evening before darkness finally set in, thirty three barges containing many thousands of bodies were sent out to sea, the corpses being thrown into the water after being first heavily weighted to prevent the utmost possibility of their coming to the surface. As there were still few volunteers for this most ghastly work, Angelinian troops were sent out to impress men into or for the service but while many thousands of these unwilling laborers after being filled with liquor agreed to handle the bodies of the grown people or soldiers, nothing could induce them to touch the dead bodies of many children killed by the enemy's fire from the forts. These were badly decomposed beyond any measures and it was absolutely necessary to get them out of the way to prevent the outbreak of a plague.

1-406

No attempt had been made so far to gather up the dead soldiers on the battle fields during the night time, because the region was so constantly under the heaviest artillery fire from both sides that nothing could be done, and as light and electric power in the city were destroyed nothing could furnish any illumination whatever. On the night of August the fifteenth, some of the Angelinian flash searchlights were started in use but immediately brought a pounding drum drum fire from glandelinian guns of fortress Lucille Jackson and this had to be stopped to avoid destruction of the Christian lines entirely, since the very bigginging of the terrible struggle no efforts at identification of dead persons taken from the ruins had been made by searchers or any one, it being completely positive that the dead be disposed of as soon as possible. While the barges containing the remaining bodies were on their way out to sea lists of killed officers were made, but that was the only care taken in regard to the victims of the awful battles many of whom were among the most prominent officers of the army. Of the hundreds of thousands buried near Gunboat Creek and other points not one was identified. Ninety six thousand bodies were buried at Texaco on two miles from Norma, all of which were found in that point. One few happened to have been identified, but the great majority were not. At the same time troops and camps were stationed in that locality to prevent those who could not give a satisfactory account of themselves from boarding boats or trains bound for the city. In burying the many a dead still found along the river shores no coffins of any kind were used, there being no such supply. There was no time even to knock even an ordinary wooden box together. Names were even known were the Angelinians had buried their dead comrades in their very company streets. Even still the work of cremating the bodies still continued. Great funeral pyres were still being erected and the corpses placed thereon the terrible incineration being under the supervision of the officers and soldiers. Matter had come to such a desperate pass that even the casting of the bodies of the dead into the sea and deep rivers was not only dangerous to those who handled them, but there was danger in carrying the decomposed, putrefying masses of human flesh through the company streets to the barges on the various basins of river and sea fronts. The city cemeteries near Norma Catherine were also used for burial purposes but they were not buried in single graves but in long trenches. Of course still it might have been deemed unfeeling, and even brutal, but the fact was that the bodies of the many soldiers seemed to receive rough and cruel treatment or small consideration, being handled roughly by the workmen, and thrown into the trenches in the cemeteries or elsewhere although they were animals, and not the remains of human beings. No prayers were uttered save in isolated instances, and the poor mangled bullet-swept or shrapnel torn bodies were consigned to the trench as hurriedly as possible. The big burying parties had even no time for the slight test sentiment, and so accustomed had the workers in the Angelinian army "dead gangs" as they were then named become to their gruesome task of being constantly under fire that they even laughed and joked, when a big shell exploded three hundred feet from them, or crashed in the sky above them like the loudest thunder claps. Special attention was given the Angelinian wounded. Doctors, surgeons and physicians were on duty all the time, one of them not having been or seen bed for three or four nights longer than an hour at a time. Victims who were not badly hurt put themselves aside for those suffering and actually requiring the service of surgeons. There were few in the Christian lines who had shared in the battle for Norma Catherine who did not bear the marks of wounds of some sort.

On August the twenty fourth a final and most desperate assault made by Christian batteries and tens of millions of soldiers was directed upon the full line of the land sections of the Lucille Jackson fortifications and one of the most extensive battles of the war raged unceasing for six days and nights combined. Great indeed were the losses of the Angelinians who in that time made sixteen hundred attempts in vain, and the fortifications were not since silenced by the Christian batteries, while six Christian batteries were demolished, Julio Gallo was shelled, and many Christian batteries in that vicinity silenced or dismounted with dreadful loss among artillery men and even horses. General Conventinian Aronburg's headquarters was demolished by a shell from Lucille Jackson and totally destroyed with all in building killed by falling wreck wreckage. Fortunately he was not there at the time of the disastrous disaster but was out in the field looking over the situation caused by the artillery storm. Every time the Angelinian columns were repulsed the glandelinians in lines of troops six to ten miles in length would counter charge and attack with the fury of a roaring tornado and driven the Angelinians back and clean out of their own works before they were repulsed themselves. The experiences and adventures of those who were within reach of the great and disastrous six days storm of battle and escaped after undergoing frightful fears and anxiety makes the most most interesting reading. Those who did emerge in safety from the fearful vortex of war were unusually fortunate. When it is considered that probably in that six days battle of Lucilla picked eight million Angelinians lost their lives and a score of millions were wounded, while 89,000 of the inhabitants in Julio ga, Gallo section were victims to the fury of the terrible shell-fire in the territory adjacent adjacent to the Stormed Lucilla no known fortifications.

General John Porter was present when eighty five hundred wagons belonging to an Angelinian army baggage train was assaulted and captured by the enemy who in they counter charged and where all who accompanied the train were either killed or wounded in their desperate fight to save it from capture. The general had arrived upon the scene just too late with his division to drive the insurgents back and unfired unfortunately with some of the other divisions was soon driven back himself and whose troops were compelled to seek safety in the captured redoubts near Norma Catherine. At the time the enemy was advancing and driving back one of the divisions of troops under a leader who had attacked aort vician the a wagon train going through the region had headed for Bolivars lines about noon of the first day of the conflict, and all preparations were made to drive the train through the region before the human hurricane struck. But in that location the shell fire of both sides was too fierce and the enemy was advancing so swiftly that the wagon trains could not get through, and the drivers of the teams of horses after allowing the train to halt for a few minutes to give the soldiers who protected it time to pour volleys into the advancing foe started to retreat with the wagons back toward Norma Catherine. At the numbers of the approaching enemy was increasing so rapidly, coming from the direction of pedan Marouli maroulian, that the glandelinians were now only within a few hundred yards and they came and attacked the wagon in overwhelming numbers. Still the drivers held their horses and tried to sought escape but in spite of all efforts three hundred wagon drivers, were killed, sixty of the wagons were blown up and eight thousand of those following the train were killed or wounded or taken prisoners. The wagon train with nearly two hundred thousand rounds of ammunition and provisions and many thousands of horses were captured though ninety wagons were totally blown to atom when destroyed by fire.

Some of the killed Angelinian soldiers were from the garrison of Norma Catherine, and as the wagon train made direct connection with the main supplies it was a great loss to the Christian army and its capture a staggering blow added by the repulse of the assault of Lucilla. Those who escaped from the Zimmermannians had to spend over fifty six hours in deep ravines or among rock gullies on almost no rations and fighting off assailants by musketry, and by throwing rocks and stones and by using bayonets and sabres. The experience was one which the survivors of that ill fated baggage train will remember as one of the most terrible of their lives. They knew how fierce Zimmermannian soldiers were despite the fashion of their hair, and their faces and uniforms but did not expect to meet them like that.

A graphic description of one mans experience in Julio Gallo was given by an Angelinian war correspondent--whose name was Schloder Henryson. He had reached the outer section of Julio Gallo early on the morning of the second day, when the battle was roaring wildly for sixteen miles like a tidal wave that maybe comes at the end of the world, combined with all the volcanoes blowing themselves to pieces, with fire raining from heaven, and with all various kinds of tempests and earthquake disasters occurring at the same time. His narrative was especially interesting because it showed a shock with what suddenness the Christian and enemy artillery duel assumed a dangerous and destructive character.

"There was heavy cannonading, which sounded like volcanoes in eruption in a long line, but but at first as nothing happened but the roar of guns at many quarters so little was thought of it that myself and others were not and some acquaintances started down to the front of Norma Catherine to see what the desperate situation was. We were started led to see that the Winkie and Lunckin and Orites Zimmermannian glandelinians had repulsed and annihilated an Angelinian assault on fortress Maroulian and Maroullie and in counter charging had come forward so swiftly and ran rapidly that Christian forces contending them in overwhelming numbers even could not withstand their assault and their fierce attack was so to make a roaring inferno, of firing, go to avoid injury to ourselves to had to hurry for the Julio Gallo junction and Norma Bridge. Before we reached it however we saw it was in possession of the glandelinians who are called Gargoylians who were trying to destroy it to prevent the Angelinians from crossing it, and in danger of being seen and fired upon we had to wade in the stream a mile further down in water and waist deep to get to our own side. One of my comrades was killed by grape shot and I myself was wounded. Within a few minutes after the start of us got to Julio Gallo shells were banging and booming in the streets like popcorn in a popcorn shaker and we saw countless old men and women and even children straining to the Christian lines beyond for refuge. Many of these were killed by shell fire of the enemy's great guns not six hundred yards from us. General van Gatonin was one of the first to prevent the enemy tide from going too far and after the first storm of action subsided he made a crossing one of one of the smaller streets under fire in a little boat. When he reached a point he selected for the placing of some of his batteries he found a long line of damaged passenger coaches, and a long line of wagons chained together and whose interior especially of the coaches were filled with dead and wounded glandelinian soldiers who no doubt used the trains as a point of defense against one of the Angelinian assaults. While the general and his staff waited for the terrible firing to subside he and they managed to count the fallen glandelinians in the trains and counted fourteen thousand bodies and ten thousand wounded showed that the glandelinians who defended the trains must have fought a death struggle here.

Colonel John Patrickson who was in charge of a company of Abbigannian troops and who earlier before passed through the big battles of Big Arkmoor, Phola Phelantoburg and Francis Lanta suffered such hardships and hardships and such peril in this tremendous battle for Lucilla picked the terrible morning of the second day that he was convinced that his experiences in these three big battles at that time was very little, mild little experiences in comparison. He was one of the survivors of his little company which by the enemys counter assault was almost annihilated.....

The battle began with many sorties and a skirmish, and with occasional heavy artillery firing early that morning.... He said. "We consisted of one of the best of companies who followed the rest in one of those fatal charges upon the enemys works but at nine o'clock our losses were becoming so heavy that the attack was discontinued by our little force, and I prepared to lead them back to the shelter of the main lines before the glandelinians would counter charge in mass. I got to our works at about ten o'clock and found the enemy coming forward faster than I had supposed they would. The main line of the troops had fallen back and then made a stand. The attack of the enemy began to get worse and worse, the attacker of the enemy getting stronger and the numbers of the assailants increased rapidly until it was almost as bad as the worse attack of the enemy at Big Arkmoor itself. Finally the lines of Christian troops which had been resisting the enemy began to recoil from the works and was swept off from the field like a house taken from its foundations and demolished..... there were nine generals in charge of that line of Angelinian soldiers, which was about six million strong besides a hundred other high officers, but of the whole line of soldiers I am the only officer surviving of the six hundred and fifty officers in command of all the various regiments and divisions, the nine generals having been killed in trying to rally the panic stricken Christian troops, and only half of the Christian columns could get away the rest being shot down or captured.

I managed to withdraw what was left of my little company and went on with the tide of retreat. I had not got far when I was struck with some wreckage hurled against me by the explosion of a grape shot and a lieutenant who was beside me was knocked down and killed. I and the remainder of my little company was carried on with the tide of humanity, sometimes retreating through a glen, and once more I was thrown off my feet by being struck with splinters of a tree scorched by the explosion of a hall shell. Explosions were everywhere around us and finally to escape disaster I and my little company of thirty survivors out of six hundred men managed to get on a raft on the river but were soon thrown from it by coming in contact with some large pieces of timber, parts of floating houses, logs, cisterns and other things which were floating around in the river having been blown from the wrecked water front section of "Orma" gathering. Many and many a brutal knock I got on my head and also my body until I was black and blue all over, and often I had narrow escapes from the exploding exploding shells, making fountains of water. The shelling and roaring of cannons was making a terrific volume of noise, and the waves of assaulting rals which I saw in the distance were carrying all before them, not being able or daring to land on any shore I drifted and swam the river all night, almost blinded by flashlights, the glare of explosions and lightning of shells, and not knowing where I was going, or in what direction or what was going to happen at any moment. However about four o'clock in the early morning I began to sense the presence of hard ground, and then I knew I was near the shore. I finally landed and wandered around until I finally came to some house, and there I reached the line where I secured some uniforms and new clothes. I had lost most of mine as soon as I had started, and only wore a coat.

I was a fugitive for two hours, and in the water under fire and battling with wreckage about seven or eight long hours, and this is a most sensation, together with the feeling of all those bruises, I have on my head, arms, legs, and body, and a severe scull wound and witnessing the total destruction of my company, is not at all a pleasant one. I managed to save my own life under heavy fire, through the most hardest kind of a struggle, but when the shells exploded near me in the river, I thought more than once I was surely done for, and I had lost all the best friends I had in this world and only had seven men surviving out of a company of six hundred men. The losses of the main line of assault must have been awful.

One of the most daring of Angolinians was the hero Hans who had went through all the horrors of shell fires to save a little girl whom he had rescued, at the cost of receiving terrible wounds. Again here he proved his real class. His full name is Hans Jensen and was a well known Abbeonian soldier and though having been promoted a colonel for his daring rescue of the little girl so many months before he showed his heroism again by his most daring rescue of the whole siege. During the wildest Zimmermannian storm he saved nine lives and the story of his heroism was told by his acting lieutenant, who had lead a regiment into battle and which came out with only a handful of men remaining.

We had "We had succeeded in repulsing one grand and fierce assault of the enemy and thinking all was over had been preparing to change out position of defense when Colonel Hans the hero who rescued the child slave and adopted her for his own and made her an army mascot and girl scout rushed into my lines with his company and told us we must retreat for the enemy were attacking and were carrying all before them, and that the main line was literally flying for its very life. However the Zimmermannian tidal wave was on us in an instant, and almost before my three companies and my regiment could retreat from our works to go to a higher point where a Church stood some five or six hundred yards away, the rushing waves of Glandelinians with fixed bayonets and yelling like Gargoyles were all about us fighting fiercely to cut us off from escape and we had to fight most desperately to get through. Hans, with his little company struggling against the tide of screaming humanity, bore a wounded officer in safety to the main line of works under heavy fire of grape, shell and canister escaping being crushed by a heavy tree which the explosion of a line of shells by it brought it down in thick fragments. Returning immediately to the worse of the firing line, Hans in like manner brought safely to the same point his own friend and companion Jack Glans who was severely wounded. His next act of heroism was to rescue his wounded general Beppo Gram himself, and his two assistants, two colonels, two lieutenants, one private and another officer whose commission he could not recall. Here the rest of the line had retreated, but he and his company stood its ground at the same spot and single handed held the overwhelping force of the foe at bay until the reinforcements sent by General Gornose picket arrived and the wild assault of the foe was repulsed. Hans this time escape all throughout without a scratch. Colonel Braqueter Luisanna his assistance, had suffered the loss of his whole regiment and gave up his life in the successful defense of a single gun which the Zimmermannians strove like madmen to capture.

Maurice Anderson who was one of the refugees from Julia Gallo itself septa a thrilling night in one of the big abandoned orphan asylums in the latter city. One thousand one hundred and fifty six other persons shared his most memorable experiences. The building was near the eastern outskirts of the city and had happened to stand almost isolated and alone, and was exposed to the full force of the enemy shell fire from Thunbolinda, and the first explosion of a shell near it during the bombardment was followed by the sound of shattering glass and crash of the under. Several of the windows upstairs in the upper rooms had given way under the concussion of the explosion. The lawns for all the beginning of almost thirteen hours of mortal dread indeed. The cannonading of both sides continued to rage with unabated fury all night, and the roar of long lines of cannon which was fairly deafening was always accompanied by the rattling salvos of shell explosions, in the streets, near the building or in the sky followed by the sound of crashing glass, as one after another of the many windows was torn from its fastenings and shattered by these concussion or shock against the brick walls of the building, or upon the adjacent sidewalk below. Men who had them clasped their frightened children in their arms although they expected to be killed any minute. Men even began to lean many of the pillars and partition walls supporting the floors above and to take up such positions as seemed to be the most conducive to safety in the event shells got into the building and exploded or in case the building itself would be razed by the shells. The crashing of glass at times was simultaneously followed by a sound of rattling and tearing. Section after section of the roof was sometimes torn up like large sheets of parchment and hurled hundreds of yards away when a big shell exploded on the roof. And to add to the terror and confusion, the electric lights suddenly went out and the building was left in total darkness. Men many moved toward the main entrance of the building itself, with the evident intention of seeking other quarters but they were so backed at the door by what seemed before them to be a blinding sheet of lightning as a shell exploded three hundred feet away, with mighty force, and hurled a lot of wreckage down to where lay between them and any place of refuge, and worse than that a torrent of water came in the door way, and they appeared to hesitate between a choice of being drenched by water, killed by shell fragment and possibly struck by a flying section of roof, or of remaining in the building until the end or until it caved. The question was soon settled. Even as they looked the roof of a large hotel across from where the orphan asylum stood was blown off by a shell blast, many of its inmates rushing into the streets only to have a hail land among them and killed and wound all. Almost simultaneously a wall went up from the people in another building, as the skylight and whole roof was torn and shaken loose by three shells exploding simultaneously on it, and fell crashing down to the second under the top floor, causing a list of dead and a pandemonium of the survivors. This therefore seemed to satisfy those in the abandoned orphan asylum that under such shell fire no haven of safety could be found and they therefore determined to make the best of the terrible situation. Just then above the roar the roar of so many distant cannon of both sides, the thundering salvos of exploding shells, the crashing of glass, and the flapping and pounding and tearing as of tin, a new and terrible sound was heard following the ear-splitting crash of shrapnell. It was that of falling brick. Every one stood crouched, prepared now to leap to either side as the occasion might require. Every one indeed realized the gravity of the situation, but strangely there was no shrieking like in the other buildings, no fainting, no panic. Every woman stood the ordeal with such fortitude as to lend courage to even the faintest hearted man. Even the babies, and children were mute and a lung to their mothers or fat men, necks in breathless despair.

Nearer and more nearer came that awful roaring and rumbling. A tremendous shower of bricks and mortar fell in the rear of some of the orphan asylum waiting rooms. Nothing remained of the building near it. Now if any doubted that now the end had come and that in another very quick moment a all would be buried beneath the ruins. But suddenly the sound ceased. The brick had fallen the lower story of the building remained intact. It was soon learned that the entire main wall stood unbroken and that really the fall of brick and mortar was but the collapse of several large chimneys blown from the roof by a shell and which had been surmounting the top of the building.....

As soon as this really became known the effect upon the war stricken mass of people was electric. All the men were seen to light or relight cigars, women, cheered, cheered laughed or sang, children cried, and though more chimneys fell and though bombs were blown on the walls here and there, more glass was shattered and the cannons of both sides still continued to pound furiously until seven o'clock in the morning or later, there was no more panic and confusion, and all felt that the building would withstand the fury of the shelling. And it did... One soldier who belonged to the ninth engineering corps told a very interesting story of how he got across the Jennie Bridge, into a portion of the rebel lines and out during and after the awful Lucille Jackson battle storm, and of his observations in the stre stricken city of Julio Gallo itself. He went toward the Lucille Jackson fortifications during the fifth day of the conflict arriving near there a few hours after the fifth day of the terrible conflict began in full force.

"Then I and my regiment succeeded in crossing the bridge under fire of grape and shell over the river," said the corps engineer, the enemy had in an effort to stop the Christian assaults hurled down four and the flood was flowing toward the Christian lines and cutting a portion of the assault from the right of the fort. Nevertheless pausing on the bridge to view the scene from my glasses I saw that the assaulting lines had reached an elevation close to the outer works, or two hundred yards from Lucille Jackson Bend. This was near the vicinity of the captured fortress Protestantia which was throwing a rain of shells into the broken fortifications. After crossing the bridge and reaching a point some three miles beyond we were stopped by reason that the enemy in this location were putting in an annihilating fire upon a certain landscape ahead of us, and after waiting for an hour for the firing to cease, we were once again compelled to send for a relief party or retreat one or the other. During this period of one hour waiting in a rocky region covered from the shelling we saw the Angolan columns over a mile long moving against the fortress of civilian moving like a flood, and the enemy's fire making big gaps. The relief party came and a gang of girl scouts who were among them signalled us to return half a mile to better ground, where my troops were transferred, all the officers going with the men. At this time we could see that the attacking columns had reached and were over a section of the outer works, under the Glandelinian generals Harker Galveston, Houstonia Hannan, and Henderson fielding, and that another column was moving in a westerly direction at a terrific rush attacking the enemy with dreadful fury. One of the scouts were compelled to wade in the stream and dislodge driftwood from a track which we wished to use. At about I thirty that afternoon we arrived at the Christian positions on the heights of Santa Fe and then being ordered forward with all troops we moved against the fortress at the eastern end. At that period of the day the enemy had reinforced the garrison, and their resistance was therefore increasing, and were hurling upon our assaulting columns shells at about forty per minute. After carrying a portion of the enemy's works, I immediately led my troops to the second line of works held by general Tremont Carrington, where which after being captured I and my troops remained under heavy fire during the balance of the day and even night resists some of the worse hammering assaults of the enemy. At about five thirty the enemy in making one of the assaults had begun to move around my right but were repulsed, and by eight o'clock a line of attack a mile long with was moved against the troops and charged in the face of a withering fire that mowed them down like leaves in a storm until they reached to within twenty eight feet of the works before they recoiled. Finally toward morning we had to leave as the assault everywhere had been a failure, but I retained all the rest of the night the outer works of the enemy and the front windows of the building which my general occupied as his headquarters had been blown out by shell, the roof was torn off, and the sky lights over the rotunda fell crashing on the floor below. Even during lulls in the conflict refugees began to come into our lines between five thirty and nine o'clock, until at least eighty thousand persons from Julio Gallo had sought a safety in our rear. The rear of our lines were strewn with fear stricken persons all night during our action with the enemy.

During the time of such great excitement many of our officers did everything in their power to help the suffering refugee refugees from the effects of the battle, and to give them shelter from the enemy's shell fire when the enemy was making the final assault we all had to fight most desperately, and our very work was from the concussion of firing vibrated like a box car in motion. I and my comrades fought incessantly throughout all the night without a moment's rest, or a single hour for sleep, there being so many counter attacks, attacks, and there was a so much loud noise and confusion from the crashing shells, crashing buildings or barracks, falling trees, firing of musketry and cannon and explosions of shells that not one of the refugees in the rear could even get any rest. At the very first glimpse of morning our who's lines were forced to recoil, during our retreat we were pursued. As we recrossed the bridge the sights in our vicinity were appalling. The whole line of our former firing front was full of debris and dead or wounded, communication wires were all down, and the rebel buildings near the fortress were in a very much damaged condition. Very barracks of the enemy in their camps were damaged by our shell fire to some extent, with but one or two exceptions. Upon during our slow retreat many thousands of refugees came pouring into the hearts of the Christian lines, many of them having but little clothing, and some were even almost naked. They were homeless and even without food, or drink, and even many had lost their all, and were in really desperate circumstances.

During the continual movements our generals made steps to furnish provisions and relieve the suffering of the refugees and to bury the dead. A conservative estimate of the number of soldiers killed in the assault upon Fort Victoria was from 1,500,000 to 3,000,000, the wounded many have been ten million persons. Early in the following morning it was learned by us our scouts that the water supply of Julio Gallo had been cut off by the enemy for some unknown reason or cause and the scouts presumed that it was caused by the Glandelinian engineers cutting the pipes. At all events Julio Gallo was completely without drink drinking water or even lights, and something had to be done by the Angolanians who were besieging the enemy to relieve the terrible situation. People who had depended on waterworks, and on cisterns of course had their very resources swept away by the enemy when they abandoned Julio Gallo, and there were not even one reservoir to be found even in the ruined business district.

The results of the fleets bombarding the Umbelina and Gertrude Angelina were terrible and caused a more terrible scene. The small rebel working fleet and large transports had been badly wrecked and their wreckage was washed up over the docks, and railroad tracks near by were in frightful confusion. The main Glandelinian river docks also were demolished by a big raging fire. Big grain elevators were torn in shreds by big explosions. These big rebel transports which were anchored off the docks seemed to be in good condition however. The damage to the rebel shipping interest was something immense, the very improvements being being swept entirely away by fire.

After the repulse I tried to get our out of the loose location of the enemy as quick as I could, and succeeded in securing a repassage over the Jennie Bridge. We retreated across with some number of refugees in our midst, and when we got to the middle of the bridge we found it swept by grape and shell by some unseen rebel battery. As we passed over the bridge however safely we could see a big Glandelinian fire raft anchored off or toward where a railroad bridge should have been and came to the conclusion that the ship or raft was being prepared to be sent against the attacking Christian fleet. Another big fire raft, eighteen hundred feet long could be seen off the river shore of Lucille Jackson Point, floating down the river and being towed by a number of tugs. While continuing our retreat we passed within a few hundred yards of where a battery belonging to a rebel command had come on been but could see no evident of the artillery it having no doubt been withdrawn to safer points. The waters of the river in this location were strewn with thousands of carcasses of dead animals. We indeed had in retreating across the bridge a very hazardous passage, running across under fire but managed to reach the main lines with out too loss at 1:35 o'clock. At the other section of North Lucille Jackson we heard that a main force of Abbeasunians like a tidal wave had crossed a long line of works in the face of rebel fire that carried destruction before it, but nevertheless before the assault had been repulsed. A long line of the enemy's artillery had been captured and turned upon them with deadly effect, the artillery blowing the buildings behind the works into total ruin and causing enormous loss of life among the foe.

"It was one of the most awful tragedies of the war which has visited Yvian wick. Two sections of the city known as Julio Gallo and Norma Catherine are in ruins and the dead combatants of the Angelinian forces will number in its assaults upon Yvian wick will number probably one million."

"I am just from Julio Gallo, having been commissioned by General Henry Darger the Angelinian leader to try and get in touch with Angelina and the outside world and appeal for help to hasten and crush the foe at Yvian wick and cause its speedy fall and capture. Norma (Galverine) was the nearest point for me at which nothing telegraph here and the rivers being wrecked by the enemy."

"I left Norma Catherine shortly before noon yesterday, while I could hear an awful roar of battle, the soldiers within the city were organizing for the prompt burial of the fresh number of dead expected, the further distribution of food, and all necessary work after a period of such disaster."

The wreck of Julio Gallo and Norma Catherine was brought about by a tempest of battle, and a cannonading of both sides so terrible that no words can adequately describe its intensity, and by floods of water which turned some portions of Norma Catherine into a raging sea. The signal station works show that the cannonading of both sides sent such tremendous shell volleys that there must have been fired hundreds of thousands of shells in a few days, but it is too impossible to tell what was the total number of the rate of exploding shells.

The terrible battle I experienced began on the morning of August the twentieth. Preceding to that I had heard that a great battle had been raging for the capture and defense of Evangelina Grand and for the recapture of Augusta polls at the same time, and that the enemy's tide of advance at the region of Norma Catherine was very high. The attack of the enemy first came from the right, and was in direct opposition to the forces from the left, while the attacking repulsed arrayed itself against the Christian works near Norma Catherine upon the front, the flanking force at once the works from the rear. About noon it became evident that the Christian lines was going to be either visited with defeat or disaster. Hundreds of regiments were reduced to mere handfuls of men, and scores of residences in the outer sections of the city were hurriedly abandoned, the families fleeing from Julio Gallo, to dwellings at other portions of the city or to the main Christian lines further beyond. Very soon and place was opened to the refugees fleeing from shell fire. The fury of the battle was increasing constantly, and glass rained in torrents from the windows of buildings into the streets from the concussion. The uproar of the battle was so terrific that it seemed to cut the ears of the hearers like a knife or almost make them deaf.

By an hour more it was declared that the opposing forces had met, and were submerged together in a wild bloody death struggle. An explosion somewhere of terrific violence blew up a levee in the river causing water to pour into the lower sections of the city, flooding two electric light plants and gas plants and the city was left in total darkness. No go even into the streets was to court death. The shelling of the city was then at terrible velocity from the fortress Thumbelina, Gertrude Angelina, Uedernine, and Yvian. Poles by the hundreds per hour, cisterns, portions of buildings, telegraph poles, and walls were falling, and the noise of shell explosions, their screaming, and the crashing of buildings and the roar of cannon and other sounds of battle were terrifying in the extreme. The uproar of conflict rose in fury steadily from day light until dark. During all this time the people still in Julio Gallo were like rats in a trap.

The lowest portion of the city near the river front was fourteen to eighteen feet under water, the highest portion five to six feet, while in the great majority of cases the streets were submerged to a depth of thirty feet, and all the while shot and shell banged among the houses like the outside of the loudest thunder claps. To leave a house was to drown. To remain in it was to be killed by shell or fallen wreckage or by fire. Both a day and night of agony had ever seldom ever been equaled before in any disaster the world ever knew of, worse than even the Galveston Horror. Without apparent reason, while the bombarding was increasing in intensity the flood waters caused by the enemy suddenly began to subside at one o'clock at night. Within two minutes it had gone down to two feet, and before the approach of daylight all the streets were completely free of water. In the meantime the fortress Thumbelina had become comparatively quiet and the shelling of Julio Gallo slackened up. Not very few of any buildings escaped escaped injury. Even in Julio Gallo there was now not hardly a building which could be habitable for wreckage or dampness. When the countless people who had escaped death, went out daringly at daylight to view the work of the battle tempest and the floods, they saw the most horrible sights imaginable.

In sixteen blocks from St James Avenue, to St Peterson Street they saw many bodies. Forty corpses were in one yard. The whole of the business front for three blocks in front of the mighty Norma river was stripped of every vestige of habitation, the dwellings, the great river bathing establishments, and every solid structure having either been carried out into the river by the receding flood or its ruined piled in a windrow of pyramids, according to the vagaries of the tempest of shell fire, and floods.

The first hurried glance of the ruined cities, showed indeed that the largest structures, supposed to be typhoon proof, suffered the greatest. A big Orphan home, on Beidon Avenue, fell before the concussion of one big high explosive five hundred yards away like a house of cards. How many dead children and refugees are in the horrible ruins could not be ascertained. At that distance from the building could be seen a two hundred foot crater in the ground where the underground mine went off. Of the many wounded in the big St Ann's hospital in Julio Gallo, together with the attendants, only two were understood to have been saved.

A big place known as an Old Emma's Home on James Avenue, collapsed when a big shell hit it, and a big school building close by is a mass of wreckage from the same cause. Even a large high school was but an empty shell having been swept by a destructive fire, and crushed and broken. Every church in Julio Gallo, without one exception, is all in ruins. At one of the Angelinian forts in the face of the full enemy fire, all the soldiers are reported dead, their cannons dismantled or blown up and the fortress wrecked, having no protection against the enemy shell fire. The river bay in front of a band of the Christian position where a battery was stationed is in ruins. Nothing but a sea of piling and wreck of great fortresses remain. The main line of stronger fortifications of siege, lost all their superworks, and their ammunition and stock were damaged by water. Even one battery a little beyond the fort was fairly carried away by the enemy's fire, the whole gun battery and its gunners being swept to death. The whole front of the Christian line near the water contained enough wreckage belonging to damaged besieging fortifications to build a good sized city. Eight officers who swam across the river during the storm, were picked up on the shore alive. Five thousand corpses of soldiers were also picked up.

In addition to the living and the dead soldiers which the river cast up near the Christian line, gasbats and coffins from some unknown cause from one of the cemeteries at Yvian wick were fished out of the water there. In Julio Gallo, the big Gotten Mills, the many gas works, the electric works for lighting, and nearly all the industrial establishments of the city were either wrecked or crippled by the enemy to prevent them being used by the Angelinians when they would occupy the occupied the hastily abandoned city. The flood caused by the enemy left a dreadful slime about nearly a foot deep over the whole city, and unless the enemy do not hinder the progress of the Angelinians in burying the corpses continually added by preceding battles and also carcasses of so many horses and other animals there would be danger of pestilence.

Some of the statistics of the scenes are very miraculous. One of the city men whose name is not mentioned mentioned unharmed in the ruins of his own house, and when dug out in the morning had no further injury than a bruised leg and a finger and nose dirt in his eye. Another young man who happened to be a doctor or unskilled mechanic when his own house collapsed from the concussion of some great explosion, but was revived by the water, and thrown two hundred feet without injury by the concussion of another explosion. At the same time a man who had charge of children was carried from a private orphan asylum window by the shock of some concussion and fell sheer three stories into the flooded street below and the man who had rescued her had to hold her high above their heads, as the water was sixteen feet deep when they rescued her and the two children. Thousands of stories were current of houses falling and the inmates escaping. Frank Glander editor of an Angolinnian Newspaper had his family and the family of two grand neighbors in his house when the lower half torn asunder by a shell crumbled and the upper part part slipped down into the flood waters and was again struck by a shell which exploded. Yet not one in the house was hurt. Of another family six out of seven were reported killed by a grape shot. Of still another unharmed family only one was known to have been saved. The family of Joseph Franklin who met death in the streets when a grape shot exploded in front of him was reported to be dead. The high school house, in the south end, was turned into a hospital even though under fire. All of the many regular hospitals were unavailable. Of many of the big works little remained but the piling and so forth. Half a score of million feet of lumber was carried away by the flood and one engineering corps said that as far as the company is concerned, it might as well start over again when the war is over. Eight big ships were torn by the flood from their moorings loaded with provisions and standing on the river shore. The big Randall castle was carried over the flats by the flood of the burst levee or dam from the Forty Third Street wharf to Norms Catherine and Lisa. In the wreckage of one of the inner piers the communication transport boat was stranded in the river between Norms Catherine and Julio Gallio, and Lucille Jackson band.

A Glavellinian or Angolinnian battleship was also swirled around through the west bend of the river, crashed through a portion of the Norms Bridge and is now lying in a few feet of water near the wreckage of a line of railroad bridges.

A six bug big gunboat was carried across Ford No. Ten and is stranded about ten miles up near Wickey Bay. Another steamer or transport was torn from her moorings and dashed upon Smith Bend, and the bow of another transport, the called the Red Cross which had been previously hurled there was broken in two. The stern of another called the La Plaza was stove in, and the bow of another crushed. On the river channel to the jetties two other transports like a ground some war schooners, barges, fire rafts, and hundreds of smaller craft, were strewn bottom side up along the slips of the long river piers. Two hundred small tugs, were also wrecked. It was believed it would take many weeks to tabulate the number of dead and the wounded and missing, and to get anything near the idea of a monetary loss. It is safe however to assume that one half of the property of the two sections of the city is wiped out by flood fire and shell storm, and that one half a half of the residence have to face absolute poverty and to seek refuge with the main Christian lines. At Andrean section three of the residents were drowned, one man stepping into a well or cistern by mischance, and his corpse was found there by the Glavellinians who were still in possession there. Two other men despite the flood and shellfire ventured along the river to front during the height of the artillery duel and were killed. Here are but few but buildings at Andrean itself that do not tell the story of an artillery storm. A big hotel there was a or is a complete ruin and partly gutted by fire.

For ten miles along the water fronts of the bay, and also the river and along the shore it is a common sight to see large craft, small craft, and transports, big war launches, row boats, schooners and even broken battle ships stranded by flood. The life boats of a river shore life saving station once in possession of the Angolinnians was carried half a mile from the river shore, while a large fossil that was anchored in Glavellinia Bayou, lies high and dry five miles up and right within full view of the front line positions of the besieging Christian lines.

The great storm of battle which has just devastated two sections of Vivian they reminds me of the terrible storm of battle that we fought at Francis At Ikanta and Big Irknool, and also the Glorinia and y Jennie Vivian horrors." said Colonel Henry Jameson of a Brigade command, within the main line. "At that time I was moving with my brigade toward Chamberlaine near Angellinia Agathia during the battle of Big Irknool and my experience was similar to that of many others who escaped. The loss of life and property even in that battle was great.

The situation of our own positions though strong and massive are exposed directly to the enemy whenever there is a severe artillery duel or infantry assault. The fortress of Lucille Jackson consisting of many works, redans, battlements, and barricades is about thirteen miles long, and strongly defended by all kinds of earthworks, rifle pits, and by many big cannon. It is really situated on high ground its outer works rising four feet to sixteen feet like long Confederate redans in the American Civil War. Their highest point these fortresses are not more than twenty feet above the normal waters of the river and shore. The fortress is built at the northern end of Julio Gallio and faces also the sea at one section toward the west. On opening to the bay, and landside between the river and the shore of the Glavellinia Ocean and the mainland gives the gunners of the fortresses a free sweep with their guns, when a heavy assault is raging against it, either by warships, or by land forces. In this way columns of troops millions strong and 4 extending many miles can rush forward upon the fortress many times but the gunners and other defenders can pour an enormous amount of shells and other missiles, and at the same time the gunners can shell river levees and cause the breaks to pour immense volumes of water into the smaller streams causing its waters to rise many feet and flood the lowlands in the path of the advancing Christian troops. In the main rush of the waters back toward Norms, on the narrow channel entering the river at that location, are not sufficient outlets and the floods if strong enough could sweep the assaulting columns to death.

It is seldom that attempts had been made so severe to capture Lucille Jackson, that the enemy have yet been compelled to cause such a flood. In very heavy attacks however as in the latest assaults, the enemy could have burst a number of levees had they dared to do so and cause great waves of water to sweep across the land from the river, and to add to the work of death and destruction that the guns and musketry fire were doing, in rushing back to the river from the channels.

The fortifications have no cellars. The fortress is built of concrete and the flood waters could not of fact it at all. When the flood water is high it could wash up to several feet but could do so no harm. When we attempted to carry a portion of their outer works yesterday we went as far as a house near the edge of the outerworks five miles down the north end of the 14 Lucille Jackson fortifications. An explosion of shell hurled that little building and let it slide into the water of a creek near by until it tilted at an angle of forty five degrees. With other soldiers while we were under hot and shell we took refuge at a ravine on much high ground, but even there we were soon driven back to our own lines.

Another man by the name of Colonel Davis of the Thirty Third Ay Abyssinkilian corps being with his general and fifty other officers at the time the enemy made a fierce assault upon his lines declared after the engagement that the building had been demolished by shell fire and the general and the fifty three officers all killed when the house collapsed. General Hanson and Joseph, and general Owania Johnston rescued about five hundred of his wounded their wounded comrades and officers on that same awful day from the fury of the victorious enemy. They returned with the shattered fragments of their divisions only when the assaulting insurgent columns threatened to turn their flanks. They had no idea that the fiercely assaulting assaulting enemy had gone around their rear, until they were warned by girl and boy scouts who signaled to them just in time. They started a retreat immediately for their own lines, but many of their men and officers of all rank had been swept away to their deaths. Many refugees were picked up at Glavellia and taken to the rear of the lines, where they were given every possible attention. Many of these refugees were suffering from injuries, and had been under fire and in the flood water all the time. Even most of these persons women and children children had floated in on drifts, and raft, and one of the party came ashore on a large piano. One hundred thousand ammunition boxes, from Camp Crowley, were found near Glendale pier, and a big army pile driven driver from Glendale pier was driven inland by the flood of the hurled logs to within a few hundred feet of the christian lines under general possession. The pier piers within the front of the christian lines was covered with drift of all kinds, broken gun caissons, discolored dismantled cannons, baggage wagons, scattered ammunition boxes, dead horses, damaged war craft of all sizes, buggies, wagons, and such like intermingled with dead soldiers. Searching parties found dozens of thousands of bodies in glander Bayou, and burned, and buried them.

One of the unfortunate refugees, who arrived at the christian lines, on the first relief wagon train, from Julio Gallio, just outside of the place, and who had a sad experience in the artillery so storm, and flood, was Sampson William Schloederine, an engineer at a hospital plant at the Ju, Julio Gallio outskirts.

His family consisted of his wife and seven children one girl and six boys. When his house was first wrecked by shells and then washed away by the sudden flood, he managed to get three of his little boys safely to a raft, and with them he drifted helplessly about. His raft collided with wreckage of every description, he was under fire, and finally a shell hit it and split it in two, and he was forced to witness the drownings of his two three sons, being unable to help them in any way. He told the Angollian officers when he was rescued that the whole of Julio Gallio are nothing more than water.

Mr Henry Jennings, a broker who resided at Twenty fourth street, got to the christian lines in the same manner as did Schloederine. After losing his wife and children he got out and by swimming and drifting around and in peril from fragments of exploding shells, and gunshot shrapnel reached the river shore. William Schloederine, a little boy of eight years old, whose home was in west Julio Gallio, had a most narrow escape. He little boy watching the battle at a distance was blown by a shell explosion off the docks, and came ashore in the drift wood. Despite the difficulty he experienced in keeping afloat, he held out to the end, and reached the shore of the river safe and sound. Another man whose name the Angollians did not learn, whose baggage wagon was attached to a long train which passed through the territory to provision an Angollian brigade not far from Julio Gallio on the last day of the frightful but futile conflict said that at Glendale creek, the men of the wagon train in the lead, heard cries coming out of a mass of debris near by. Several of the men immediately answered and answered the cries and found a little girl fastened under the roof. They pulled her out and she timidly and in her simple manner informed her rescuers there were other children under the roof. The further search resulted in the finding of twenty men and nine bodies of children all having been abandoned child slaves left behind by the enemy in their hasty retreat from that region. When the wagon train reached the appointed part of the christian lines, they found that it had been withdrawn and that all the works had been destroyed and cannons dragged away.

Frank Johnston, a prominent officer of the Abbeonian munition division was among the lines of the line, but arrived at his lines the evening after the battle direct from Julio Gallio, and was received with joy by his official officers and comrades. The colonel went to his own works the day before the disaster, and was there during all the battle, until the following night after, when he aided in the efforts to draw back the lines to shelter and saw some of the most sorrowful sight in his life. He said that many of the Angollian soldiers who survived the great struggle got through the rebel fire, and the flood almost by miracle. He saw many thousands of young men who were black haired before the conflict, come out of the terrible ordeal with hair turned completely white on the following day. It would take fifty five million men one year to clear the streets of Julio Gallio and Mrs Catherine, so complete is the terrible ruin. The biggest liar in the very world could not do any kind of justice to the existing conditions of the affairs there. I was in the outskirts of the city during the battle. The building was thickly thronged with refugees, women and children were screaming and praying desperately and frantically throughout the terrible night and days, and above the roar of so many cannons, the explosions of shells, could be heard the wash of many buildings, and the splash of the flood waters against the building. We expected the building to be in to go down any minute before the shelling or the strength of the flood. At daylight the following morning, I and four others started out to view the ruins. We passed eighty bodies within a block, and when we reached the river beach, where the flood waters were still running high, we stayed some time, and while there scores of bodies per minute passed us, floating with the flood, all dead soldiers, some were wearing our own uniforms and others the rebels. Homes that were formerly elegant are masses of wreckage. When I left the ruined city the stench of decaying human flesh or bodies, was simply terrible, and almost unbearable. It was indeed with the greatest difficulty, that they could be handled at all, and the only ones who dared do the work were soldiers. He might have been sickening than any one could have believed, and it is impossible to make any efforts at identification of so many dead, except to keep a record of the weapons and valuables taken from the bodies. All attempts of holding inquests were abandoned. The bodies were piled on brenna drays and hauled to the wharves, where they were lowered into the water. They were piled one on the other like so many dead animals, it being impossible to give them any attention. The bodies of the poor and rich alike were treated in this manner. Thousands of soldiers hundreds of dead non-combatants and women were found this way and soldiers and relatives of all kinds who are among the missing surround the bodies the places where the many bodies were being taken or handled, and their cries of distress were or are almost unbearable. There was not a living animal or anything within the battle line so far as I could see. Ten thousands of dead horses were drowned or killed in the battle. Not even catfish dogs in the city survived the flood and not a bird could be seen. No one can make anything like a reliable estimate of the number of deaths among the soldiers and citizens. I myself had to walk over twelve miles or more from the place where I landed on the main coast of the river before I could get out of the sea of wreckage. The flood waters swept the land for the distance of twenty five miles inland, and dead bodies of those fallen in battle are to be seen a little beyond the rebel territory. I passed a large number on my walk to get back to the christian lines. The stench in this battle swept part of the region was awful. It is estimated that over fifty five thousand horses were killed in the battle in that section. One of the most pathetic stories of suffering in Vivian Wickey or the Julio Gallio section was brought to light after the battle for Lucille Jackson ceased, when the Angollian columns who had failed went back to Norma Catherine. Among the troops were an enormous number of refugees who had even arrived there before the storm accompanied by women and children. All day during the last of the struggle the many fugitives had not been falling well and were so scared and frightened that they had to go to the rear. When the battle became very bad one little girl in general Cannons headquarters arose cautiously and went to the window to look out in the total darkness, hoping to see, by the constant flare of what she thought was lightning, whether or not there was danger of the enemy pursuing, as was greatly feared. Suddenly there came an unusually violent fit of explosions, and the window out of which the little girl was peeping, was literally blown out as if by a mighty air pump, and she was taken along with it. Other persons in the same room as far as they were able to gain,

20 April 2011
Horrible scenes.

Instead of having been thrown out of the window by the concussion were hurled in an opposite direction against the wall of the room. When they recovered from their daze they were not severely hurt and in their fright at the little girl missing they fairly shrieked out her name. An Angolinian officer who occupied the adjoining room of the building came to the assistance of the frightened child refugees and cared for them until dawn the next morning. Then they went out together and searched the adjacent portion of the Christian camps for the little girl who was missing, but no trace of her was to be found. The search was kept up for two days by which time all the wounded had been cared for in the best possible way, and all the unburied dead had become putrid. When the officer brought the frightened children to the main lines the children girls and boys were completely overcome by fright and although children not over six years old of the youngest, had all the appearance of being frail half crazed wretches, so terrible had been their recent and trying ordeal. They were compelled to remain under the doctors care.

Colonel Mac Neal Hancock was unnerved by the scenes of horror he witnessed among the ruins of the city and among the battle Christian tide, hastened to leave the stricken city, and arrived in the main lines on the afternoon of the third day of the struggle. Lights of the dead bodies constantly before him, and according to his hasty statements, he had been practically without sleep, since he first seen the conflict or set foot in the city. This soldier who was a cavalry officer had a run from pursuers from Norma Bridge to Norma Catherine but when he reached the city he heard of the disaster at Julio Callio and decided to go with a relief party of officers and men leaving the city of Norma Catherine that night. The relief party on the wagon train was only able to proceed as far as the bridge links and from there the goods were transported and put aboard a small transport. The colonel was accompanied by his lieutenant, Francis Fielder. Although they happened to be with one of the Angolinian relief parties they were stopped several times by the pickets at the steam transport landings. After much difficulty they gained a full view of the city and of the battle fields and the smoking guns of the fortresses and the vast sea of dead bodies. While in the midst of their sight seeing, they were accosted by Winkie Abyssinkilian soldiers, and commanded to assist in the recovery and burning of the many dead bodies. Feigning to acquiesce they managed to draw away from the soldiers, and then made a run for a river beach. A small boat carried them to the main land of the shore, and they made a forced march of twelve miles, before they were able to obtain a vehicle to take them to the main positions. Reaching the main Christian positions late at night, they started at once for their cavalry force. When met at his lines the next morning the colonel said:

"The sights of the battle fields, and the wrecked cities of Norma Catherine and Julio Callio were the most horrible that I have ever witnessed. Dead bodies were everywhere like a nation killed. Part of Norma Catherine had been reblotted out and for a distance of twenty miles along river and bay fronts, all houses have been washed away by flood waters, and only the foundations left. The flood has not entirely receded, and where fortresses, and munition plants, and business blocks and fine residences had once stood were simply holes marking the foundations. These were filled with floating debris, and bodies of dead soldiers and of the drowned. The sight I witnessed was ghastly beyond the extreme as the working parties would arrive at one of these awful holes, and start to drag the many bodies of the dead from the pools of dirty water. Every one was expected to work at the recovery of dead soldiers, and Winkie soldiers coralled my companion and me and told us we would have to assist in the work even though we were officers. At that time we happened to be standing watching a party of fifty men working under several guards. They were lassoing the bodies and pulling them out on high places, and then piling them on many boards preparatory to burning them.

Just as some of the Winkie Abyssinkilian regulars were guarding us a most terrible outcry arose from the Angolinians engaged in the rescue work. Running quickly to the scene none of trouble, we saw one of the workers was in the grasp of the Winkie soldiers. Another Angolinian soldier was covering him with his rifle and had a horrible scowl on his face. The man taken prisoner was a Zimmermanian, dressed in khaki clothing, and wearing a drooping girls sailor hat, and was sullenly eyeing the crowd of soldiers, with one hand in his right pocket. His captor grasped his arm suddenly, and dragged his hand from the pocket, and five envelopes containing important letters dropped to the ground. With the sight of these evidences that he was a spy disguised as an Angolinian relief worker before them, the very workers seemed to go mad, and with cries of "Lynch him" "Burn him" made for the unfortunate wretch like a pack of mad dogs. Before that he had been standing so still and unmoved, but the approaching danger of being mobbed by the fierce Abyssinkilian workers shook his courage immediately, and he finally sunk to the ground pleading for mercy. But there was no mercy for the Glandelinian monster and the men were only prevented from killing him then and there, by the interference of the Winkie soldiers.

"Leave the spy and traitor to us." Said the corporal in charge of the party, as he rang ed his men around the prisoner. "We Abyssinkilian soldiers will attend to his case." And with that he and the Zimmermanian marched over and the rebel was placed against a post not more than fifteen feet from the dead soldier he had robbed. Selecting six soldiers as a firing party or squad, he lined them up ten feet from the doomed Glandelinian, and with the word fire "fire" six bullets pierced the Ghoulish Glandelinian soldiers body, and he fell dead. Such was a measure of the speedy Abyssinkilian justice, which is being meted out to spies by Abyssinkilians. Besides this case, I heard of many more where the guilty men were given the benefit of a short ou court marshall, then sentenced to death and shot.

However I told my companion that I did not desire that kind of work, and that I could never stand the notion of handling many dead and mangled bodies, that I would rather be dead myself, and therefore suggested that we make our escape. He agreed with me, and we gradually edged away from the Abyssinkilian soldiers, and finally made a run and reached the river bank. Here we secured a boat and rowed across to our own side of the river, and from there we had to walk twelve miles before we could get a rig or wagon to take us back to our main line of baggage works.

Never again will I want to return to Yvian Wickey, and it will be a long time before I can forget the terrible scenes I witnessed there and on the battle line lines. Since I left there I have been seeing the dead bodies all the way long, lying stark and stiff, with looks of terror on their faces, as though they had realized that a sure death was in store for them, and at night I have dreamed constantly of having to handle them. I tell you such things like that wears on any man, and I will bless the time when I can forget totally that I was ever in Yvian Wickey. The ruins show that the flood and storm of shells must have struck the city in all forms, the flood itself broadside as the building along the river front of Norma Catherine and Julio Callio are washed away in almost a straight line back from the shore. The flood swept away buildings as far as eighty blocks, inland for a space of nearly twenty miles in length. The ruined parts comprised all the best parts of Norma Catherine and Julio Callio. All the city buildings and the entire business portion of the city were swept totally away, and nothing remains to mark the spots where business blocks and others once stood along the river front except half submerged foundations foundations filled with boards and many dead bodies. The inhabitants who were rendered homeless and who were not able to leave the city to escape the enemy's guns when they responded to our own fire, are now living in most of our own rear encampments. Many distribution stations had also been established, and forces of men were busy still busy issuing food and clothing to unfortunate people. There however appeared no lack of provisions, but water is scarce that is pure water, and there is no ice. While we were there the heat of the August month is always or was a most unbearable, unendurable, and the stench from the many bodies made the tasks of the many relief parties anything but pleasant.

Water has to be hauled from the river for several miles. All the electric light plants in the city were destroyed, and the entire of Vivian Wickey is without light, and not even the moon don't shine, and the work of finding the bodies had to be carried on day and night. Conservative estimates of the number drowned in this Lucilla Jackson disaster made by persons familiar with the battle fields place the loss of life at five million. No one knows just how many were killed, and it certainly will be terribly difficult for an accurate statement to be ever made, as the Angelinian authorities are making no attempt of identification of a many myriads of bodies, but are always bending all their efforts toward getting the two sections of the city that are captured and the battlefields cleaned up in order to prevent the raging of a pestilence. At first friends and relatives of those killed in battle, were allowed to accompany the searching parties, but this was found to be too slow a method, and now numerous pickets we are instructed to prevent any one who are not connected with Angelinian relief parties from entering the city or the region of the five battlefields. For the first two days after the six days engagements at Lucilla Jackson the bodies were like before from Norma Catherine carried out to the river or bay in boats, and barges and steamers and dums dumped over board, but now again the officials are piling up the many slain bodies in the heaps with boards and pieces of timber among them, and after a sat urating the pile with oil, set fire to them. It hardly seems probable that during the war Vivian Wickey will be rebuilt, at least not while the war is on. Many of the refugees came north and east with us, and all seemed to be in the utmost hurry to leave the scene of desolation. They all acted as though dazed, and many were unable to talk intelligently regarding their many narrow escapes. All along the line we were besieged with numerous questions regarding the safety of many different people, and of whether the enemy will be driven from Vivian Wickey or not but of course were unable to give our many questioners any reliable information. However so far, Julio Gallo and Norma Catherine were the only parts of the city so far to suffer from the sudden flood, and that accounted for the large loss of life among the inhabitants. Most of the dead women and children in both parts were drowned, and but few killed by falling timbers or shells. In Andean several buildings were blown down and about ten persons killed.

The Angelinian authorities who took possession of the remaining buildings in Norma Catherine issued one of the most saddest and most direct appeals to the whole Angelinian world, and the entire world in general for help on the eleventh of August and the response indeed was more prompt and liberal than was expected. Indeed the Angelinian authorities were not at all afraid that the people of all the Angelinian states or countries would call him a sensational man, for no one was better qualified to judge of the horrible situation that they were. Many of the leading authority men of the Angelinians had spent almost every hour, after the flood, and five battles in working for the good of the success of the big besieging armies, and for the rescue of the Angelinian Angelinian inhabitants, and had indeed accomplished wonders. The many officers in charge there organized many of the well to do non-combatants who had not suffered losses, giving their own money, inducing others, more unwilling than themselves to open their hearts and pocket books, and in fact hardly any one took any rest for days after the war calamity. As the newly formed authorities had been around the city and the terrible scenes several times before the appeal was issued, they all knew the conditions of things through out ly. Therefore the general public of Angelinia had great confidence in what he had said. The same day the Army relief committees of Norma Catherine issued the following after a full occurred;

"Norma Catherine, Calvernia/ August 11th. 1914.

To the public people of the whole of Angelinia;

A conservative estimate of the loss of life among the besieging armies of general Concentinian Aronburg is that it will reach three million dead in one battle singly, at least eighty thousand large families and small families of the non-combatants are without any shelter whatever, and they cannot remain in the city as it is under fire, and they are who wholly who wholly destitute. The entire remainder of the population still within the uncapitulated portions of the city is suffering, in greater or less degree. In Julio Gallo or Norma Catherine not one single church, school or charitable building or any place, of which these two sections of the city had so many is left intact. Not a building escaped damage from flood or shell fire, and three quarters of the whole number of buildings that escaped the great conflict on the early part of the siege were entirely obliterated. There is for the besieging armies, and for the refugees they are aiding immediate need for food, ammunition and provisions of all kinds, clothing and household goods of all kinds. If all the near by cities of Calvernia and Angelinia who have escaped the terrible disaster of war, will open asylums for the many children left orphans the situation will be greatly relieved. And it will be seen that all persons that are able will be requested under penalty to adopt said orphans. Coast cities of Angelinia and Calvernia and also Abyssinkile and Abbesannia should send us water, as well as all kinds of provisions including oils of all kinds, gasoline and candles."

"General Daniel Jones.

Command of Relief Committees."

The Secretary of the main Tea Treasury at Angelinia Agathia (Angelinia) received a joint telegram from General Griffinia, and Lieutenant Colonel Blander at the camps of the besieging lines. It is described the destruction caused by the terrible five battle storms; and said;

COUNTLESS persons of the two sections of the Vivian Wickey city are homeless and destitute and fleeing from the enemy's guns. Five hundred thousand sheltered with in rear of the Christian lines at my own point. All houses which are roofless, and windows blown out were fiercely defended by the enemy for two days before they were driven out. Need more cities of tents, and 30,000,000 rations..... All the Angelinian and Calvernian relief committees are doing all in their power, but the stock of undamaged provisions are exhausted and even the besiegers are short of stocks and even ammunition, and with all the millions of people housed, we need extra force of doctors to keep every one in sanitary condition. Relief is urgently requested or said siege will be broken."

The Sec Secretary therefore sent the many government revenue cutters and some big fleet of trampo transports from the river passage way of Dorothy Gale to carry supplies to the besieging armies and send more armies to help them, and also notified King Robert Vivian of the situation at Vivian Wickey and General Hanson Vivian also.

The day the appeal was made the Acting Secretary of War at Angelinia Agathia, authorized the chartering of special trains from Pandora (Angelinia) to carry an enormous amount of quartermasters and commissary supplies to the help of the besieging armies, while General Robert Vivian who received the news of the retirement of Mansion from Command urged Concentinian Aronburg to hand on to Vivian Wickey like 'Damnation.' Mansion who retired temporarily from command was received at Angelinia Agathia and given high honors. Orders were also issued by the Angelinia Agathia War Department and by Mansion himself for the immediate shipment to the besieging armies at Vivian Wickey of 22,456,855 tents, and 56,899,000 rations. The these immense stores and supplies were divided between Angelinia Agathia and Vivian Wickey a distance of 10,000 miles please. On August 12th 1914 Governor General Blander issued the following statement to General Mansion himself who took charge in person of the camps there and at Dorothy Gale and Osma;

Jennie Vivian (Calvernia) August 12th, 1914.....

Conditions at both sections of Vivian Wickey at Julio Gallo and Norma Catherine are discovered to be fully worse than at first reported. Communications however by our own men have been reestablished between both places and the main Christian lines, and if the enemy don't interfere it is evident transportations of supplies will be less difficult.....

The work of clearing most of the wreckage in the streets of both sections of the city is progressing fairly well despite the attempts of the enemy to stop them, and Adjutant General Henry Darger the Main Gemini leader under the direction of his brother in law General Constantin Aronburg is having his men patrol the two bombarded sections of the city for the purpose of preventing depredations by rebel raiders or glandolinian spies, and vandals. The most conservative estimate as to the number of deaths places them at the battle of Norma Catherine at two million. Generous contributions from citizens of the State of Angeline Vine and also from other states of Calvernia, and Angeline are coming in rapidly and liberally, and I'm sure it is confidently expected that within the very next ten or eleven days the work of as much reconstruction as possible by the soldiers and engineers and people of the city will have begun in very good earnest and with energy and success as soon as the fortress sea of Thumbelina and Gertrude Angeline are captured, and whose guns are pounding the city all the time.

Of course the terrible destruction of property in both sections has been very great from the effects of the whole siege, and the damage by battle and bombardment not less than 96,000,000 nine hundred and ten million dollars for Julio Gallo alone, and 41,100,000 dollars for Norma Catherine, but it is hoped and believed that even this great and most unusual loss will be overcome through the energy and self reliance of the Angolinian and loyal Calvernian people."

Henry Joseph Sawyer, Governor General."

On the very same day the Norma Catherine relief Committee sent out this statement of the condition of affairs:////

"We are receiving numerous telegrams of condolence and tremendous offers of assistance. All near by cities and towns of Calvernia which had escaped the devastating effects of the rebellion are supplying and will supply food, clothing and other materials, for immediate needs as soon as they can get it through the stricken Calvernian states to us. Cities too far away cannot I'm sure serve us as too many armies in Calvernia of the rebels are doing all in their power to frustrate the results of the siege. But cities farthest away in Angeline almost free of insurgents can serve us best by sending money under guard. Checks should be made payable to John Gohlson, chairman of Angeline Agathia Finance Committee. All supplies also should come to H.A. Whittier, chairman Relief Committee of Norma Catherine. We have over twenty five million persons with the rear of the besieging Christian lines to clothe and feed for many weeks. and to furnish with army or household goods. Most of these are homeless, and the army and even refugees will require assistance of all kinds and money to make the wrecked residences habitable as soon as portress Gertrude Angeline and Thumbelina are captured and the enemy there disposed of. This Committee will from time to time report our needs with more particularity and caution. We refer to dispatch of this very date of Major General Lawrence, which the Angelinian Relief Committee fully endorses here at Norma Catherine. All communicants will please for the sake of the besieged non combatants accept this answer in lieu of direct response, and be assured of the heart felt gratitude of the whole national army and of Vivian Wicks entire loyal population."

General Crowley."

General Amos S. Randall, assistant quartermaster general, stationed at the fortified city of Dorothy Gale, was informed by army contractors the day the appeal was sent out that the Vivian girls Violet and her sisters then at Angeline Agathia saw to it with their own efforts, that fifty million army rations were sent out for the sufferers of the siege and army together. The rations were started from the summer Anna railroad station in Angeline Agathia of the Mid-Holchester and Pandora Railroad at six A.M. The same day. Violet and her sisters went directly to the army contractors who supply the Angelinian armies with provisions and commanded or asked them to send rations identical with those furnished soldiers, and others, consisting of bacon, bacon, canned meats of all kinds, beans, bread, coffee, and of every description we know of in all large warehouse stores. Angeline Agathia sent $25,000,000 to the governor general of Norma Catherine, Robert Vivian himself who commanded the armies in person all over the war stricken nation, gave out of his own $20,000,000 in cash, his brother, cabled from Dorothy Gale to his assistance assistants at Omaha Omaha town to send $1,000,000 dollars at once, which was done, Pandora (Calvernia) sent $1,600,000, $1,600,000 dollars, until the money coming in was reported even at the start to be about $222,500,000 which was believed necessary to carry the sufferers through the remainder of the siege and until the end, for hundreds of thousands of the refugees and even soldiers were ill, and unable to provide or do anything for themselves. There were fully fifty million old men women and children in other sections of Calvernia or Vivian Wicks I mean still held in the bondage, who were dependent upon charity.

Angeline Agathia started immense train loads of supplies north westward as also did Gloria, Dorothy Gale, and Omaha, Betty Bobbin and Trot, the railroad hauling that ten mile long line of cars free of charge but under guard of armored cars and batteries on rail, all kinds of newspaper concerns in those cities, either gave money or started relief trains of immense size, also with doctors, nurses and medical supplies, with orders to beat the best records time to Vivian Wicks and to fight through all enemies even they had to go through inferno of holes to do so, the city of Gloria gave one million dollars, and subscribed that amount daily for many days, Betty Bobbin, telegraphed twenty two million five hundred thousand, and then made it fifteen million more, and thirty million rations, and nine hundred thousand Abyssinian army tents were sent from Eminio town, from the officers of the National Angeline Agathia Quartermaster, the mayor of Angeline (Angeline) was told by the citizens there to send two million dollars at once, and he sent $10,000,000, nearly all the pleasure places now closed on account of the war reopened to give true benefits, the State of Omaha having five hundred million left in its World War Famine Relief fund, sent that by mail, people of the State of Herdrude sent fifteen million, to the governor at Jominia, Vivian (Calvernia) raised two million dollars in cash, the governors of nearly all the Angelinian, and other hispanian states issued proclamations calling upon their people to subscribe to the relief fund as soon as possible, the mayors of all the cities doing the same--the consequence being that in one night time the governor general Sawyer at Norma Catherine had $250,000,000 in hand in cash, with several hundreds of millions of dollars more in sight and within call, a great deal more than he had ever expected. By the following day he heard of there being nine hundred dollars in nine hundred million dollars on the way in addition to which there were thousands of trains of carloads with supplies of all sorts--provisions, medicines, disinfectants, fruits, clothing uniforms, wines for the wounded and sick, tents, by the countless numbers, tons of bandages, army stoves, oil, everything that could possibly be needed to supply the besiegers and help them take care of the immense droves of refugees from both sections of Vivian Wicks.

On the night that most of the food and provisions had arrived Governor General Sawyer decided upon two of the most important plans of action according to Constantin Aronburg's advice. The first was that he would allow all the food and clothing shipped from the east and south to be concentrated within the main Christian lines for the use of the refugees within the rear and the army also, and that he would also grant the city of Norma Catherine the use of thirty million laborers or engineers fully armed for a period of thirty days, the same to be paid one dollar an hour per man for that time out of the government funds. In addition thereto all requests for money from the many Relief Committees in Norma Catherine and Julio Gallo were to be granted. His second main decision was that he would personally look after the needs of the thirty million destitute within the rear of the Christian lines, provide them with all supplies possible and keep them going until they got on their feet again. A chairman dealer of the Norma Catherine Committee was to keep track of the Vivian Wickey and Aronburg situation, while the governor general and other commanders looked out for the many outside points. That night local Committees from both points was sent to Angelina Agathia and Dorothy Gale by the swift east train to take charge of the reloading and distribution of supplies, that was sent from there by for the army and the sufferers of Vivian Wickey. A most serious matter confronting the authorities not only at all the river and seacoast points, but in the captured towns and within the very Christian lines itself near Vivian Wickey was the rapid secret gathering of gangs of Glandelinian spies which after the Dix disaster entered the lines to find out under any conditions what the purpose of the besiegers was for further operations against the besieged. Others drifted into Concentinian Aronburg lines opposite Norma Catherine and on to the neighboring points by the hundreds in the hopes of robbing officers of secret plans, maps, and so on and the like among crowds of soldiers. All this gathering of spies made many of the officers rather uneasy and everything they had in their possession in their headquarters was stricken strictly guarded. The military police, picket lines, and guards, and troops in Vivian Wickey and within the Christian lines were always on the alert to keep down spy trouble and prevent all possible leaking and they did not get the upper hand of this most dangerous element until they had shot a score of hundreds of or more. These fellows would even slyly plan to bomb and destroy the provisions and supplies sent by the generous people from the outside, and so whenever caught were shot without delay. The following was sent out from Norma Catherine on August 15th 1914.

This showed how serious the situation was; ; ; ;

Norma Catherine. (Calvernia) August 15th 1914.

General Mansion at Angelina Agathia;

Dear sir and friends;

After the fullest possible investigation here we all feel justified in saying to you and through you to all the Angelinian people that no such disaster as this great siege, and war has ever overtaken any country, any community or any section of the world in the history of all worlds and nations. In the five big battles here with Concentinian Aronburg armies and Mic-Allister Stanoks Glandelinian armies the loss of life is more appalling than can be believed, and yet never can be accurately determined or estimated. It is estimated as far as possible at about eight million dead among the combatants of the Angelinians and five million dead among the Glandelinians, and 56,000 dead among noncombatants.

There is not a home in both sections of Vivian Wickey, Norma Catherine or Julio Callio that has not been injured, while hundreds of thousands of buildings not touched by the great conflagrations of the siege has been destroyed. The property loss represents accumulations of one hundred hundred and sixty years and more hundreds of millions, than can be safely stated. Under these conditions with ten million people among the refugees, homeless, destitute, sick, and wounded, with the entire population of the uncaptured portions of the city, under a stress and strain difficult to realize just now, we appeal directly in the very hour of our great emergency to the sympathy and aid of mankind.

General Mic-Cann.

Commander Angelinian Department of Norma Catherine."

General Mic-Cann when he looked over the two sections of the city of Vivian Wickey three days after the disaster, had wired the War Department at Angelina Agathia that perhaps 11,000,000 had perished. He was one of the most conservative men in the Angelinian armies, an army officers always usually are, and when finally he signed a tremendous statement saying probably 18,000,000 persons of the army fighters had lost their lives during bombardments and the series of great battles entirely his signature carried great weight with it. Not only did the people of all of Angelina, Abbeanna and her other states sympathize deeply with all the unfortunate sufferers of Vivian Wickey, but those of many other Christian nations as well. President Iowanna of Protestantia sent the following kind message to Robert Vivian who at this time was for a month at Angelina Agathia directing a preparation for a tremendous campaign for Lorianna there;:

Dorothy Gale Presidentialia;

August 12th, 1914.

To His Excellency and Supreme Majesty, King of Angelina

Robert Angelic Vivian of the Loyal states of Abbeanna;

The news of the horrible disaster and siege of Vivian Wickey and all its terrible effects, and of the bombardments which has just devastated a good part of the city of Vivian Wickey had deeply moved me. The sentiments of traditional friendship which unite the two nations can leave no doubt in your mind concerning the very sincere share that the Protestantia President, the government of the big Republic, and the whole Protestantian nation take in the worse calamity the world ever seen that he has proved such a cruel ordeal for the whole Angelinian nation and homeless families of the city. It is natural that Protestantia should participate in the universal sadness, as well as in the joy of the Angelinian people of over the disasters, and great victories. I take it to heart to tender your Majesty our most heartfelt condolences and to send to the stricken nations all provisions and supplies we can spare.

Emilie Iowanna."

Robert Vivian sent him this answer the following day;

Executive Angelinian Great Palace, Dorothy Gale, D.O.A.A. August 13th. 1914.

His Excellency, Emilie Iowanna, President of the Republic of Protestantia,

I and my whole nation hastens to express, in the name of the millions who have suffered by the disasters at Vivian Wickey, as well as in behalf of the whole Angelinian Nation, heart felt thanks for your touching message, of great sympathy, solace and condolence and the provisions.

King of Angelina.

Robert Angelic Vivian."

Even the millions of school children of the nation helped the sufferers with their pennies and sacrificed everything they loved to do it. Violet and her sisters wrote letters to various towns of Angelina, and suggesting through news papers, and books, and magazine, that all the school children and so on give some of their pennies to the victims of the greatest siege on record. The idea was carried out, and several million dollars was raised in this way in Dorothy Gale alone. The plan was also adopted in many large cities and towns throughout Angelina and Calvernia, not in possession of the enemy. When the first suggestion was made Gertrude Angelina herself then being at Pandora (Calvernia) wrote to Violet and her sisters;

"My dear friends;

"I was reared in Vivian Wickey before being captured by rebels and made a child slave lived there from my infancy, until the time when I escaped and joined the army at the service of a girl scout, and until my sister Anna Aronburg got killed while doing her services in the cause of Angelina. When Angelina Agathia had its great fire about the time of the Cadernine horror, the people of Calvernia who could, even the escaped persons of Vivian Wickey and even its besiegers sent a very generous subscription, and with it was one made by the boys and girls of the boy scout troops I commanded. Our commissioner boy scout commander gave us all a furlough for the purpose, and the thousands of boy and girl scouts organized themselves into a number of soliciting committees. I was on the committee with our friend Poirer, now one of our best and leading Boy Scouts of all, and we two succeeded in collecting eighty eight dollars. In all for our work within a day we got together over twenty thousand dollars, which was immediately turned into the general fund, raised by the committee of the Calvinian nation.

In the year or so that has followed since Angelinia Agathia pulled half of its half of its two quarters of burned area out of the ash ashes and risen to a high place among the world cities, this disaster has now occurred. Many forces have been brought to bear to accomplish the recovery of Angelinia Agathia, but now possibly the most potent one was the helping hand of the neighbor when help was needed. Among those who helped with their little mite many the school children of Pandora, Calvinia, and other big cities in Calvinia and Angelinia be remembered.

I most heartily second your suggestion that the school children of Angelinia Agathia and Dorothy Gale and other towns and cities be given an opportunity to add their little surviving brothers and sisters in Calvinia, and the refugees of Vivian Wickey, many of whom are naked and orphaned by the terrible disaster that has come to them, and pray to God and His blessed Mother that some means may be discovered by my uncle General Concentinian Aronburg for the capture of Thumbelina and Gertrude Angeline and all of the Lucilla "ik" is soon fortifications.

Evangeline Aronburg

Alias Gertrude Angeline.

Command of girl and boy scouts of Angelinia.

Chapter 75
Supplying the Nation

On August 13th, 1914, Angelinian residents and visitors in other Christian nations especially in Protestantia, together with Yormunians whose sympathies were aroused by the three years horror of Vivian Wickey and the disastrous battle storms around her contributed many millions of dollars in their own money in thirty minutes, for the relief of the sufferers and for the purpose of helping the Angelinian armies besieging Vivian Wickey to capture her as soon as possible. The Angelinians held a meeting in the greatest Angelinian cathedral in the world at Dorothy Gale which was largely attended. The Angelinian generals there were leaders among those there who proposed to organize for the work of aiding in the relief.

The Angelinians who were residing in Pickensville at the time many scores of thousands of miles away across the Whirlian seas perfected a great organization, and elected one of their members James Henderson, President, George Halloran, the banker, treasurer, and Francisanna C. Monroean Secretary. The subscription list was then opened and fifty million dollars raised. The authorities at Vivian Wickey were informed by cable of the result. The same day H.H. Handandonia Member of the Bluelinia Parliamt of Landorinia Blon Landinia nation, and head of the Vivian Wickey line of steamers, cabled nearly a million dollars in their own kind of money to Vivian Wickey and Calvinia for the relief of the sufferers.

Many Members of the Angelinian colonies in London, Concordia held a meeting August 16th, at the Angelinian Angelinian Embassy and raised five million dollars. Angelinians in Bluelinia subscribed $10,000,000, and many theatres in that country gave benefits. The rulers of every nation and nearly all the heads of state in the Christian section of the world cabled truthful condolences, and all the legislative bodies of many foreign nations then in session passed resolutions of great sympathy. By that time Glorianna twenty miles northeast of Dorothy Gale had raised $174,000,000, Angelinia Agathia $91,000,000 more, together with continual carloads of supplies which were sent as special trains guarded by armoured trains, and hundreds of cities in Angelinia, and elsewhere contributed many millions of dollars. As stated before the total for four and half day altogether amounting from the time the appeal was issued over eleven billion dollars was contributed, while an additional nine hundred million dollars was not long in following. In no case did the railroad then running yet charge for carrying the cars over any of the longest lines.

Navigation and other laws were set at naught by the Angelinian Angelinia Agathia authorities in order to do all possible to help in the capture of Vivian Wickey and help the Vivian Wickey and other battle battles, flood, and fire affords. On August 14th 1914 the following telegram was referred to general Concentinian Aronburg by General Robert Vivian:

Angelinia Agathia via Dorothy Gale, A(Angelinia)
August 12th 1914;

To His Excellency General Concentinian Gertrude Aronburg
Chief general in command of besieging armies,
Vivian Wickey and vicinity;

In consequence of said calamity of which you reported to me and my brother of, and fear of sickness numerous people wish to leave the city. All your rail communication before the city I heard has been cut off, and your losses in the battle are dreadful, but don't give in yet. More armies are being sent you, and a man who is relieved for a much needed rest will direct you from here by wireless telegraph or mail. All of the enemy fleet heard in the river is already disabled, and no landolinian ship immediately available except in the bay so you are gaining more than is comprehended. We authorities of Dorothy Gale therefore request you to instruct the proper authorities at Angelinia Agathia to see to it that all captured rebel ships are fitted out and the one damaged, repaired and sent to Wickey Bay and elsewhere to blockade much stronger. Very thing possible will be carried out to bring on a speedy downfall of Vivian Wickey and Angelinia Aronburg. And do not make any further assaults upon Thumbelina or Gertrude Angeline unless you can push on ahead beyond Julio Gallo and strength on the garrison at Norma Catherine. Have fortifications of Lucilla Jackson and others bombarded by fleets night and day without intermission.

GENERAL ROBERT VIVIAN.

GENERAL HANSON ANGELIC VIVIAN.

GENERAL CONCENTINIAN EVANS.

JACK AMBROSE EVANS.

GENERAL SPUALDING.

GENERAL Concentinian Aronburg at once returned an answer stating that everything advisable will be done. On that same evening Governor General Gawar stated that the tremendous work of relief relieving the battle, fire and flood sufferers of the two sections of the city was making excellent progress. He declared that the most generous contributions were coming in from all parts of the country of Calvinia, and Abbeisannia and her other states sufficiently large enough to relieve the immediate wants as to food, provisions and clothing, and that in the meantime the refugees from Julio Gallo and Norma Catherine were recovering themselves, and declared he had no hesitancy in expressing the very firm conviction, that a very strong reaction from an almost mortal blow to the city and besieged had already set in, and that as soon as the city could be captured and taken under the Christian authorities in general it would soon be restored in a condition to once again resume its normal and progressive position in commercial life. After one of the biggest conferences ever held in the world with many authorized committees of the Christian lines, he felt he was more than convinced that the refugees will be able with all the assistance being given, to handle the Aronburg situation successfully.

CHAPTER FIFTYTH

26

CREATING BODIES BY THE HUNDREDS OF THOUSANDS IN THE STREETS OF NORMA CATHERINE!---THE BRAVEST SOLDIERS FAINT WHILE HANDLING THE DECOMPOSED BODIES---HOW MANY OF SOME OF THOSE ESCAPED WITH THEIR LIVES.
TERRIBLE NUMBER OF LIVES LOST AND PROPERTY DAMAGE SUSTAINED OUTSIDE OF VIVIAN WICKY OR NORMA CATHERINE. ONE MILLION VICTIMS AND MILLIONS OF DOLLARS IN CROPS SWIFT AWAY--- GREAT ESTIMATES MADE.
TRANQUILITY FOLLOWS FRIGHTFUL SUFFERINGS OF THE POOR VICTIMS--- ---FIFTY THOUSAND DEMENTED ONES--- A P APPARENT INDIFFERENCE TO THE LOSS OF RELATIVES.....

FULLY 1,500,000 bodies were cremated in the streets of the city of Julio Callio itself after the Lucilla Ik Isken battle after it began to become apparent that the time necessary to bury them or to cast any more bodies into the river or sea could not be undertaken, owing either to the enemy's fire at all points or to the advanced state of the decomposition of the bodies. Many of the bravest of soldiers who handled the bodies fell from fright and nausea. Many daring volunteers took their places and the work went on, the many soldiers and even volunteer volunteers bandaging their mouths and noses with cotton cloths saturated with disinfectants and were relieved by many other volunteers every hour. Even fires could not be started every place in the Christian lines on in Julio Callio where bodies were found for fear of starting conflagrations. The usual plans was to collect many bodies as possible with in two or three blocks in one spot and then build the funeral pyre. On the remains of many soldiers were valuable watches and jewelry but the men who worked did not attempt to remove the jewelry. It all was burned with the owners. General Gasser and Woodbine reported that their two gangs burned 10,000 bodies, the majority soldiers, but some were women and children. The percentage of deaths even among child victims of the enemy's artillery at once was frightful. General Franklin Monsonia and his Abyssinkilians burned forty thousand bodies many of them children, on one of the river benches near the Christian lines. Thousands of Catholic Priests in charge of gangs reported 10,120 bodies burned. The sanitary experts pushed the work of burning the dead. No other disposition was considered now. People who had even lost relatives and friends made no objections what whatever and looked on the plan with favor.

Disinfectants were used as never before in the world. The horrible smell of the biggest charnel house in the world was driven away and the whole city and the whole Christian lines were filled with the fumes of carbolic acid, lime in solution and other thousands of orders from disinfectants. This was general order issued by Bri Brigadier General Thomas Phelan, commanding the garrisons in the city of Norma Catherine and Julio Callio--

"All guards, foremen of the gigantic gang gangs, and working parties or others acting under the authorities of this department will use all the diligence possible toward preventing any kind of hardships on private individuals, or impressing too many men into the service. The conditions however were so critical, and it is also necessary that all kinds of sanitary precautions be taken to preserve the lives and health of the stricken people of this stricken city of Vivian Wicky, that all individual interests must give way to the general good of all. It is also found feasible to secure any number of volunteers, but if not general impressment will be needed, but the medical fraternity being a great unit in the opinion that further delay will bring pestilence to finish the dire work of the battles and bombardments, the interests of no person, firm or corporation will for one instant be spared to secure volunteers from noncombatants also for work, but failing in this, every able bodied man is to be put to work at any risk to clear the wreckage of both parts, burn the burn the hundreds of thousands of bodies under it or among it or in the battlefields still remaining, and save if possible the lives of all those who yet remain. I trust this position indeed may be thoroughly appreciated and understood, so that all people will govern themselves accordingly."

The miracles of Norma Catherine were many. I believe some of them will never be received with full credit by any one. What has happened when last in August the glandelinians from Lucilla Isken portresses themselves moved forward in tremendous array against the Christians at all points in a fierce attempt to recapture Norma Catherine and Julio Callio. Despite the energy and violence of eight terrific assaults the enemy did not gain the slightest advantage at any point in the region of Julio Callio and were hurled back with most dreadful losses.
But along the point of Norma Catherine they almost gained the victory. They came in a headlong crash upon Vivian Wicky and during the highest fury of the conflict drove the centre and right wing back seven miles, and had almost gained the very outskirts of the western sections of the town before, reinforcements sent by Vivian Wicky from the city finally recovered all the lost ground and half destroyed the assaulting rebel army before it was finally driven back. In this engagement a fugitive or an officer I mean had an experience when trying to get back to his lines when wounded. He was found near the front of the line of battalions the following morning lying beside a disabled glandelinian field piece near general Vivian Wicky's centre. The officer however was only slightly hurt. His story was that his whole regiment remained in the trench to the very last with the enemy all around them. Suddenly while the enemy was pressing on there was a terrific crash, and the works were blown to pieces by an explosion of shells. The officer said he was hot down near the gun but nevertheless was not taken by the enemy who left him lay where he was.

General Gasser and some of his officers also saw and went through more of that sixth terrific battle than fell the lot of millions of survivors who lived to tell it. He had been rallying a disordered regiment division retreating before the headlong charge of the Angelinian rebels only a short distance from Jenita Bridge. When he did succeed in doing so the rebels had approached to within a hundred feet and strove to annihilate the rallied division by firing fiercely into their ranks. At this time the general strove to call up general Vivian Wicky and tell him of the disaster over a secret long distance army telephone but of no avail. This was about two o'clock. At this time he had to withdraw the shattered division through a haze of smoke. At two thirty the general became alarmed at the violence of the enemy's advance, and with the division was compelled to leave the works so bravely defended and start toward Norma Catherine. Some of the officers laughed at the fear of coming disaster. Out of one regiment only fifteen men were saved and all officers were killed. General Bergeman who which his name was compelled to retreat and wade and swim through water for several hundred feet, across the stream until they reached higher ground where they strove to make another gallant defense. One of the officers rode his horse entirely across the river toward Norma Catherine with the purpose of arousing some of the boy scout signal corps, but within three three hundred feet where the start was made in this way the horse got into deep water, and wounded by a shell exploding in the water was drowned and the man had to swim the rest of the way across the water and finally reached the town or city, but when aid did finally come in answer to the call the enemy for a time was not checked. The enemy then were only six hundred feet away but it was the hardest of the conflict, with the air full of flying bits of trees from so many exploding shells, screaming bullets, and a clouded thickly with smoke of cannon and musketry. However in that position the division remained until morning the enemy having been repulsed.

When the sun had risen that morning the enemy had so far receded that the survivors of the division recoiled back to Norma Catherine. On the way one of the survivors found a dead baby girl in a yard of a ruined country house blown to ruins by a shell. It was a trying experience of the general indeed but he and his division came out with colors flying and held its position while all the others had retreated until reinforcements came.

During this strange and terrible battle there happened to be many instances of devotion of private to officer, of officer to private, and of boy scouts could be mentioned. One lieutenant with a squad of private soldiers were caught in the current of the main line when it had been retreating before the pressure of the enemy onslaught. In the confusion and panic the officer became separated from his devoted friends. Both were in the main path of the enemy and each believed by retreated toward Norma Catherine they would find safety. The lieutenant finally managed to reach Jennie bridge, and there taking shelter behind a wall behind a viaduct was pounded by debris, and stones for every explosion of a shell directed at the bridge and had to remain there under such perilous cover until the storm subsided, and then he retreated on and managed to reach a well abandoned house. During a most frightful time he had only one companion with him. He came out of the terrible ordeal out and unharmed while his lone companion was killed.

When their lines went to pieces before the dead dreadful onslaught of the enemy general stubbornly went in his last brigade to rally the columns and stop the foe assault. The brigade managed to stop a section of the enemy line, and the main line of stubbornly being rallied he now felt his line tolerably secure. At the same time one of his guns had hit a small Country Catholic Church near the battle line the explosion tearing away the roof and rear wall of it back of the altar. The wall also collapsed but the altar however was not damaged, and the frail life sized statues on the altar were not harmed or even moved.

For an hour longer the line held, then without warning the enemy with the wildest yells suddenly rushed forward with the most tremendous fury and by the fury and pressure of the assault the christian line was so badly banded back backwards that it finally broke into two pieces and one section began to recoil. The general happened at that time to be far from the point of danger and did not expect the disaster until a courier rode up to him and told him of it. At this moment one of the generals fell mortally wounded.

The general was compelled to appeal for help at once and it was not until two hours had passed before he received any relief and he himself trying to rally the columns received a wound in the leg. The general who took his place then was compelled to withdraw the badly torn division from one line of works to another, by retreating to one, and making a desperate stand and then resuming the retreat. Each work was captured in its turn the attack of the enemy being too reckless to be withstood under any conditions and one of the brigades during the fourth retirement was separated from another and a each general in command believed they all were lost. After three more hours of fiercely battling with the enemy they reached their own works and finally repulsed the enemy.

General Edward Ziegler, and also Thomasonia Parley, and Alexander Turner at the time the enemy was making the assault upon the whole christian line extending between Julio Gallo and Norma Catherine arrived at Jennie Bridge. Section they saw one of the wildest storm of battles ever witnessed by them before anywhere for the length of thirteen miles. As soon as Ziegler had brought his columns to help repel the assault he was struck by a shell fragment and though horribly wounded was assisted by some of the other officers to safety. Another officer who had come to his assistance when he fell was killed. A part of the line of action at this point was getting more severe as General Calveston's army of Scodlers was attacking, and most of the soldiers of the Angelinian had been surprised and attacked so suddenly that they had no time to do anything else but repel the assault or run, and so many hundreds of thousands of men were literally fighting the enemy in only their undergarments.

Some of the Angelinian regiments almost surrounded by the fiercely yelling Scodler Scodlers escaped from a small line of rifle pits on the exposed sections of the battleground, by fighting their way through like a regiment of lions and finally retreated to higher ground where they a mere handful of men held a vast brigade of the Zimmermannians at bay.

One of the officers colonel Ziegler whose regiment was taken so completely surprised that they were fighting in their undergarments, was completely naked, and even many of the other fighting soldiers wore only night garments, when they advanced to the works to repel the enemy attack, but their appearance was similar to that of hundreds of thousands of more, many of the wounded soldiers who were being taken to the rear had to even be clothed. At noon that terrible day the enemy had been pressing the Angelinian columns so hard that in their slow retreat through a plain they had sufficient space to move around in comfort and were almost penned in on all sides by the rapidly advancing Scodlers and their officers were becoming anxious indeed. Four hours later the other works in the rear were congested with crowds of retreating soldiers, and the frantically attacking enemy.

Even so hastily was the retreat that many women and children who happened to be near those works were forced to follow the retreating soldiers and so every space was covered with crowds of hysterical women, crying screaming children and frantic scared men all covered by the retreating soldiers. The separation of families caused by the sudden panic produced very pathetic scenes, when many mothers mourned their offspring, and men lamented the loss of all dear to them. Among the non-combatants there was not even so much confusion as there was among the retreating soldiers, only a clinging closer to together without any discrimination of class or sex, as the enemy advanced onward foot by foot, and the roar of cannons and musketry slackened or grew louder as the case may be.

Late in the afternoon through the enemy was finally checked by the arrival of Angelinian reinforcements the misery deepened, and the refugees occupied all the outer ruins of Norma Catherine, and approaches and other places but receiving reinforcements a salvo the enemy resumed the successful advance, and many of the Angelinian soldiers at this point had to retreat even into Norma Catherine where buildings and stores were thrown wide open to provide refuge for the soldiers in the lower and upper stories from which they could fire upon the terribly exposed enemy as they strove to enter the city. The men placed the refugees further on in the rear where they would not suffer from exposure to the enemy's fire. An hour later conditions became worse, and amid the uproar of wilder conflict and as many enemy guns shelled the city with boom and bang like a million thunder roars many women became demented, and one woman, crazed by fear and excitement seized a gun from one of the soldiers and would have run out into the streets and fought the enemy herself if she had not been grabbed and held and then placed under care. In other buildings many women thinking the enemy would surround Norma Catherine and capture it before Viviananna could receive reinforcements kill kissed each other and said good bye, and during all the uproar prayed and sang hymns in turn. With such terrible announcement that the enemy were still striving to press on and that there were so no signs of them being worsted many men and women who witnessed the horriblescene gave up to the terrible mental strain and fainted.

The survivors of the battling soldiers even paid a high tribute to the utmost bravery in the face of death of many of the women refugees of the battle, and stated that although abject melancholy had fallen over all that the spirit of fortitude displayed by the women and even children never nerved the men non-combatants and inspired the soldiers to much greater efforts. The horrors of that terrible day were equalled on the succeeding days as the enemy receded. Of all the great heroisms and dogged tenacity of purpose noted in connection with this Norma Catherine battle storm, none was greater than that of Colonel H.L. Lovechild. He was a colonel of the engineer corps and he was working some where with his engineers near Jennie Bridge when the enemy assault struck. Early the following morning when the first news of the fifth battle or sixth battle began to drift in to his Engineering camp Colonel Lovechild announced to his aiding Colonel that he intended starting immediately for Norma Catherine. He went to one of the regiments with which he heard had suffered the most loss and then started with several officers toward Norma Catherine. He went some distance but was soon forced to halt eight miles from Norma B-bridge. He therefore walked eight miles, arriving at the Norma River both Bend in about three hours. There was not a sign of a boat in sight, not even a skiff or a canoe the enemy having seen to that. However he found a large cypress railroad tie near the waters edge, and procuring a coal hook from a large wrecked locomotive that had been blown from the track and damaged beyond repair by some mighty explosion, he got astride the tie after having placed it in the water and therefore set out on a most difficult and dangerous journey across the three miles of salt water near the rivers mouth and facing the enemy's guns. If they should once let go he would be blown out of the water. But he was not observed as it was kind of foggy so thus he labored for nearly seven trying hours, the sun beating down upon him and with his body half submerged in the water, while once in a while he got a jar as a big shell exploded high in the sky like the loudest clap of thunder and fragments dropped in the water all about him. At last the goal was reached and he pulled himself out of the water and stepped on the once fair landing side of Norma Catherine. After having passed on his way more than a score of thousands of decaying bodies of the battle and bombardment victims, the heroic young officer set about to return to his lines and find his own friends and tell what he saw. This he did after having been compelled to recross the river in the same style and this time fired at by cannons and musketry. He however escaped as he had been utterly stripped off his clothing by the force of one big explosion and he certainly had an experience that was almost equal to that of Hans.

The story of General Frank Klee was indeed most pitiful. General Klee suffered the annihilation of his whole brigade when the storming assault of the enemy burst upon him his brigade was far in advance of the main line and when it was surrounded and being slaughtered he was seized by two officers who rushed him from the dangerous zone in time to cheat death among the exploding mines the enemy had so secretly set along his works. Once in the open, with a few of his survivors he was swept on the wild retreat into Norma Catherine among scores of other retreating regiments. He finally rallied his few survivors and held to a precious line of works and by skillful maneuvering, managed to withdraw it close to a stronger position flanked by a line of solid but ruined houses. He saw a haven in these places and ordered the regiments to retreat for the buildings. As he did so he saw one of his best friends Colonel Kimber blown to pieces by the explosion of a high explosive shell. That explosion also destroyed two of his remaining regiments. The awful blow stunned but did not render him senseless.

He retained hold of the position and with six guns only remaining sent a whirling storm of death and destruction upon the enemy, but the enemy charging on sent grape and canister with their advancing batteries whirling among his dying dead and living victims of the attack fury, hoping in time to effect a capture of the remaining force. An hour or more in that deadly position brought the desired end. The little handful of men managed to escape and got to the buildings and the enemy threw himself forward rushing over wreckage and corpses, and then swept to the assault only to meet a withering fire that shot them down so fast that they had to recoil. Ten times this horrible ordeal was repeated, and while the enemy were assaulting so wildly and yelling and blaspheming so terribly for every bloody repulse General Klee saw a little girl rush into the street in the full face of the enemy's fire and despite the danger rushed out to rescue her. As he did so a bombshell exploded in the street, and her body was blown open and disemboweled and he himself dreadfully wounded. The poor brave general remembered nothing until the following night the day after, when he was put into the general's hospital at the main Christian lines. He had a slight recollection of the battle, the fire of explosions, the rush of the enemy repeatedly into the works and the yelling and scream of their devil yells. His brain however did not execute its functions until two days after. Colonel Klee's experience also was a sad one. His two divisions were thrown back two miles by the rushing torrent of German assault, and while being driven with frightful velocity toward the city the general was thrown into the branches of a tree by the concussion of a mine explosion under his retreating troops and wedged wounded as he was firmly between the branches and remained there three days without food or relief until some soldiers out scouting saw him and came to his rescue. He did two days later. Another officer was saved from death at the expense of the life of his brother. The general was in his trenches when the hurricane rebel attack struck. He was severely wounded at the outset and his brother seeing him fall, seized him and guided him to the rear of the lines, but in doing so received a wound which later proved fatal.

General Daniel Jones who was sent to the scene of the latter conflict by General Grant the day after the big battle to investigate the conditions of Norma Catherine reported to the General in chief on August the Twenty Seventh and said in his report:—

"The sanitary conditions of the city is still very bad. Large quantities of line and other things have been sent to the two sections, but I doubt if any one will be able or will be found to unload it from the various vessels, and attend its distribution when it arrives. The stench is almost unbearable. It arises from piles of debris so still containing the bodies of human beings and also animals when more bodies added to the list by the last battle it is being complicated. Of course these carcasses are being burned whenever it can be done with safety, but little of the wreckage can be destroyed. There is no water protection despite the river rivers going through because the enemy have disabled all the fire department systems and ruined the fire department engines and buildings destroyed all the hose lines, and should a fire now break out the destruction of the whole entire city would be complete. When the search parties come across a human body it is quickly taken into some open place and wreckage piled over it and set on fire and the body slowly consumed.

The order of the burning bodies is horrible. The relief work however despite all the attempts of the enemy to frustrate it is well organized even under fire. Nothing has been accomplished except the distribution of food among the needy. About one half of Norma Catherine and one third of Julio Gallo is totally wrecked, and many people are still living in houses that are wrecked and who are now being moved out and sent toward our lines being moved from the city as rapidly as possible. It will take three or four more days or even still more yet before all have been removed from the city. A remarkably large number of horses belonging to our army survived the battles but there is no supplies for them, and many of them will soon die of starvation. I am thoroughly satisfied after my spent spending so many days here that the estimated from five to eight million dead among soldiers is too conservative indeed. It will now exceed that number. No body however can ever estimate or will ever know within one thousand of how many lives were really lost. In the city, and battle fields all around the numerous dead bodies are being got rid of in whatever manner now possible. They are burying the dead in front of the works. At one place on a line of works two miles in length two hundred and fifty thousand were found and buried on the following days. There must be hundreds of thousands of dead bodies back on the battle smitten prairies that have not yet been found. It is impracticable to make a search, too dangerous. Bodies have been found as far as six miles from the river shores. It would take our whole besieging army to search that territory on the shores of these three big rivers. The waters of the rivers and their mouths are still full of dead bodies, and they are always being cast upon the beach by the waves. On my trip to and from the quarantine gun I passed a large procession of uniformed bodies of both sides going seaward. I counted fourteen hundred of them on my trip from the works of battle, and it is apparent that this procession is kept up day and night. The captain of one of the besieging warships in Wick-Wickey Bay who had just reached out lines informed me he began to meet floating bodies fifty miles from the islands.

As an illustration of how near the enemy got to success, a division of troops which had been the last to recoil before the enemy assault, tried to prevent the enemy from moving on toward Norma Catherine when the main storm of assault came on. The division of troops defending the works bravely drove the enemy back for some distance but was soon driven back itself. Everything was smoke from the heavy firing, and all the main line of works held by the Angelinians had soon been obliterated. The strength of the main assault could not be determined, and the attackers were driving in so furiously at the Angelinians that the enemy soon overran everything and the whole division was driven back into Norma Catherine.

One of the most thrilling of descriptions of personal experiences with the fearful battle of Norma Catherine ever written was that of Jennie Turner and Angelina Riches who happened to be in the city of Norma Catherine at the time with the intention of learning of what the enemy intended to do. Jennie Turner herself wrote an account of her adventures and her friends Violet and her sisters who were at that time for a short space of time at Dorothy Gale;

My dear little Princesses of Angelina and friends;

"I suppose before you may have received my telegram you will know that I and my friend are safe. However this has probably been one of our most terrible experiences. I hope I and even you will be spared any such again. Brave as I and my companion are we are just nervous wrecks--fever blisters over my mouth, eyes with hollows under them, and we are shaking all over as if with the agues. When I close my eyes suddenly I cannot see anything no matter where I go outside of Norma but piles of naked Angelinian soldiers dead or in only underwear, and also in full uniform, seas of dead glandelinians wreckage of every description, and wild eyed men, and women and children. I supposed dear Vivian, I had better begin at the start at Ann Angelina Riches advises me but just now I'm sure I cannot write with any common common sense I'm so shaken with my experiences.

All day long at on August 24th I and Angelina heard an awful noise far away to the west of Norma Catherine as if there were a great battle raging but as it was far at that time we did not pay any attention to it. At about eleven o'clock in the afternoon the enemy from fortress Gertrude Angelina and Rhumbelina and also Maroccello began to rain shells into the front sections of Norma Catherine, and in the distance a noise like the distant scream of a coming typhoon was heard. So great was the shell storm that all the soldiers in the city who remained and who were not elsewhere took shelter in the under sections of the houses, or in cellars and in street barricades, and we sat in a window like place watching the effects of the shell storm with dread. All at once Angelina cried to me:

"Look at all those soldiers rushing into our city. It must be the Angelinians retreating. They are beaten."

"There was indeed an enormous torrent of troops coming into the city, and they wedged forward for every house they could reach, and those already in the ruins began firing like mad at something further off in the distance. The uproar of firing at such close quarters arose rapidly to a terrific din as we watched the scene in exop excitement, and one of the others who were in the building with us sent us all to go to lower quarters saying the whole city is liable to be under storm. Then we could see some strange lines of men coming forward from the outskirts of the city toward the main interior, and the Angelinians began to rush forward to that point, while men on horse rushed back and forth putting men behind barricades and into houses to defend all parts should the rebel flood burst through. The shelling, firing of musketry, and yelling of the combatants rose to a furious whirlwind of horrible sound, and all the time it seemed as if more and more Angelinians were coming into the city on a retr. grade motion and that the enemy in the distance came nearer and nearer. I Angelina Riches and many soldiers all crowded into the hall of a big house--a big three story one--and from the concussion of an explosion some where though far away the building for a second rocked like a cradle. About five o'clock a shell blew off the roof, another shell struck the front of the house tearing off the blinds of six windows with one explosion, and all the windows were blown in and sixteen men killed and twelve wounded in the room we were in. We were ourselves showered by broken fragments of glass and mortar and other debris but outside of a few cuts and scratches we were not injured though the crash nearly made us deaf. When another explosion occurred glass was sent flying in all directions, and a bomb entering one of the rooms blew all before it like a cyclone killing every one in it. Fearing that the building was an exact target of the enemy's guns the men who survived in our room told us we and they would have to leave and go to some houses further up the street at the end of the block, a big strong one. Angelina Riches was wild about the attack of the enemy, whom she feared would recapture Norma Catherine in one rush, and the telephone wires were all down. The men told us we must cover our heads with large pillows to save ourselves from injury if possible from shell fragments and that we could take only a few of things in a little bundle. I took my small wrist watch, and railroad ticket, and what little money I had, and pinned them in my inside my dress, took off everything from my waist down but an undershirt and my linen shirt, and covered myself with something like albatross, wore no shoes or stockings. I put the rest of the clothing what I could find in my little trunk and locked it. Tell Jennie, Vivian, the little Bear that the last thing I put into the trunk was her picture, for I thought it might be injured. It took two men to each woman there to get her across the shell swept street and down to the end of the block. Trees thicker than than any in our yard were hurled down across the streets by big explosions, pine logs, boxes, trunks, wreckage, and drift wood of all sorts swept up past in the river, and the scene looked as if the end of the world had come. Angelina and I went across on the second trip. As I started down the street with a big pillow on my head tied to it, I was hooked by a horrible crash as if all the heavens were exploded and the bomb which it was hurled sand and gravel into my face which felt as if it hit like a knife. It was going like going down into their grave, and I never was so near death, unless it was once or twice before during my sorties against the enemy. It was getting dark by this time, and the men put their arms around us, and across the street we went with the shells crashing like thunder in a violent thunderstorm high above us or at intervals in the streets or a among houses and on house tops. Angelina Riches was crying about the way the enemy were pressing into the city, and I was begging one of the men not to turn me loose. One man brought a bundle of clothing such as he could find for us to put on, wrapped up in a mackintosh. He had to dodge in between shells or be killed. I spent the whole night such a horrible one, wet from shoulder to my waist from sweat and from my knees down, and barefooted. No body there had any shoes or stockings to fit us. Angelina herself did not have anything but a thin boyscout trousers and blanket wrapped around her from her waist down. Another girl like girl like ourselves had a small lawn wrapper or something like it and blanket and the soldiers who helped us had a pair of purple trousers and a light yellow shirt and vasalao fa barefooted for the street had water from a flood deep up to my shoulders when he went across after us. The house we went to was packed with soldiers ready for the enemy should they come on. This house had a large basement and was of brick. The windows many of them were blown out by blast and concussion, and for every thunder of shell it rocked from top to bottom and the flood waters came into the first floor. Of course no one not even us slept. About two o'clock in the morning the sound of cannonading had changed direction and the flood had receded as suddenly as it had come and as we stood at the windows watching it we saw crowds of soldiers wading the streets and heard a man called Lieutenant J. J. call out to us:

"Rest easy girls. The enemy have long ago been repulsed. Only the fortifications are firing."

It was an immense building we were in though a part of the roof and one story had been blown away by shell fire and during the height of the flood the water came up to the second floor. The building was four stories high. As soon as the shell storm began to show signs of abatement and the flashes were not so frequent or the detonations less noisy and near we started wading back to where we came from, such a place. The water had risen ten feet in the house, and the roof being gone we feared in case a thunderstorm would arise from the effects of the battle the rain would pour in and we would have no shelter whatever. I and Angelina did not have a dry rag but only a dirty purple skirt and an undershirt with it and it was full of holes. We were half naked, and we did not have anything to eat since noon the day before, and we had to live on whiskey. Every time the soldiers happened to see us they would pop a bottle of whiskey at us and make us drink some. All we had all the following day was crackers and whiskey. We were all so weak we knew we could not get back to the Christian lines yet but finally having received some rations we started. It was awful to view the battle fields of the day before. Dead horses lay everywhere by thousands the streets were filled with fallen telephone poles and brick stores blown down. Hundreds of women and children from Julio Gallo and men were crowding toward the Christian lines crying for lost ones and half of the soldiers nearly who had gone through the battle were injured. Wild eyed, ghastly looking men hurried by, and told of whole regiments by scores annihilated and scores of generals killed or wounded wounded.

I and Angelina Riches could not stand any more whatever and made some of the soldiers bring me and her to the christian lines. When to make us recover they poured whiskey down us and the only effect it had was to make my head ache. I and she had about got straightened out when a party of officers and one general came to the house--relatives of some, kind of General Constantine Aronburg--he had lost their regiments, and he his brigade of men, and all the provisions, and artillery they had and two line lines of works. Though brave officers they almost had hysterics, and every one cried and I had another pell. All day long wagon trains passed filled with dead soldiers--most of the soldiers without a thing on them--and men with stretchers with dead bodies with just a sheet thrown over them, some of them little children please. We waited every single moment to have bodies brought here. Here was a brave little boy in the house with us a boy scout that spent the night in the flood water clung to his own property. He is all alone. Last night one of the soldiers directed us to another house which was not in ruins and where we could receive better attendance and a dry bed and food. One of the officers who escorted us swam in the streets all the way. He is nearly wild with a toothache caused by the noise of the battle. I cannot write any more. Am coming to general Robert, Vivian's army as soon as I can."

Jennie Turner.

Angeline Fiches.

General Stubbs with his three divisions, consisting of Abyssinkilians, punchkins, and Winkies were in their works when the great enemy assault appeared. They were driven from their works but found refuge on a high rise of ground. This line of works was carried however, and one of the retreating divisions was driven in one direction, while the other two retreating divisions in another. One of the Winkie brigades was fairly blown from the works but toward evening all the divisions of what remained of them were reunited and drove the enemy back with the help of reinforcements. General Walter Watkins became a raving madiac as the result of his wounds. His whole brigade was swept away. Colonel Stealer when his company was driven from their works sought safety and safe defense in six successive works, which were demolished by the enemy's shell fire. The column of troops eventually climbed up to the top of a narrow ridge and were saved from further attacks. Lieutenants Henry Jones and with fifteen other Angelinian soldiers finding the army they were in were about to fall back before the pressure of the enemy's assault made their way to a little woods and here withdrawing waited for the main line to come but had to keep themselves behind trees to prevent themselves from being blown to death by grape shot. General James Chaplin and Colonel Kennedy with their single two brigades resisted the enemy assaults without falling back once all day, cutting down whole columns of assaulting Glandelinians twenty men deep by cannon and musketry. Finally when the enemy came on in a fierce attack in overwhelming numbers they had to at last retreat but receiving reinforcements they drove the incoming tide of Glandelinians back. The two generals declared their brigades were fearfully depleted and all the survivors were fearfully bruised. All regimental commanders were killed or wounded. A very pathetic incident in the search for the dead occurred after the battle. A squad of Angelinians discovered in the vicinity of two wrecked centimeter guns fifty five bodies. Among these bodies was one which a member of the Angelinian burial party recognized as his own father. The bodies were hastily buried while the son assisted with partial like firmness. At the same time an Angelinian bridge engineer started to walk toward the Jennie Bridge. He found a little girl which he picked up and carried for miles. On his way he discovered the bodies of many soldiers. These he covered with grass and other material to protect them from the Glandelinian vultures until some arrangements could be made for their interment.

So far as up to now and the effects of the whole siege entirely from its beginning the whole proper property loss of Vivian Wickey and vicinity was hardly less than three hundred million dollars, outside of that city and other points where the siege also extended together with the agricultural and stock raising districts, the property damage was nearly half that amount, or in the neighborhood. Probably in the vicinity of Vivian Wickey seventy five villages and towns were turned into fortifications with all their buildings by the besiegers, and in most of these places during the artillery and mortar of the enemy where there was some loss of life. It was however reliably estimated from so many reports received at Angelina Agathia, from the region of Vivian Wickey and these places also that the loss of life on the side of the death list of all of the opposing armies during the siege before Aronburg arrived, and Garrison was in charge would come to about 10,000,000 men for the enemy and over 23,678,937 for the Angelinians. In the many towns turned into fortifications by the Angelinians the percentage of killed by artillery duels exceeded that of the numbers of men in the main batteries on the main christian line. Several of the towns used as numerous fortifications from their houses were swept out of existence by shell fire and conflagrations. The scene of horror and desolation from the whole siege in the devastated districts before the arrival of Aronburg, and the relief of Garrison was terrible to witness. The besieging lines extended for more than two hundred miles in length, the path of destruction was more than thirty miles in width, and even extended as far as Angelina Aronburg and Feder Federal town sections of Vivian Wickey, a distance of over two hundred miles in length. To make sure the besieged would receive nothing from the land side outside of Vivian Wickey the crops of all kind were either in the hands of the besiegers or completely ruined. The scene was true even of rice and cotton crop growing outside of Vivian Wickey. The districts were only keenly felt however by the unfortunate noncombatants, and small rebel farmers throughout the districts. In Andran and vicinity by shell storms and by the fire conflagration that once immolated violet and her sisters, the damage was not figured at over $400,000,000. At Norma Catherine by the fire there with the destruction of the Delia-Mell-Tell-Mell prison and others and by bombardments, $1,200,000,000 four sections of the big section of Vivian Wickey known as Norma being virtually destroyed by that big fire alone and six million in people in that section deprived not only of shelter, and food for over a month, but all prospects for a safety to come, and over 5,000,000 persons including numerous child slaves abandoned by the enemy perished. Violet and her sisters also had a narrow escape from this wildest of the sieges and conflagrations.

On the fifteenth of August General Wing Baggotter sent out the following statement and appeal from Angelina Agathia itself at which he had been visiting, after a thorough investigation of the situation in and around Vivian Wickey during the time general Garrison was in charge:

"I arrived as a spy in disguise in Vivian Wickey from Randall and was astounded and bewildered by the sight of fires, and devastations on every side.

